AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

Judging from recent experience we should say that autobiography is by no means the least popular form of modern literature. To the autobiographer himself it has certain obvious recommendations. The veteran who has worked hard all his life retires at last, and finds his retirement irksome. Nothing is more natural than that he should unearth his old letters and diaries, and write something that shall justify his existence before he leaves the scene, and perhaps keep his memory alive afterwards. Various motives may influence him—ennui, vanity, love of controversy, and so forth; but at the bottom of all is the desire to state in his own way, as if for the convenience of the recording angel, what his life has been, and what he has done with it. It will be something if his Recollections make even a thin volume; better still if they grow to a stout one; and best of all if they expand into two volumes, for which last and best result large print and small details are generally wanted. Then, as books of this kind are seldom quite unreadable from cover to cover, a few favourable reviews soothe the writer's declining years, and assure him that he does not lag superfluous on the stage.

And, though the genesis of autobiographies is not always beyond reproach, the public as often as not gets full value for its money in the shape of information that would otherwise be beyond its reach. The autobiographer may have his faults, but he is as truthful on the whole as the biographer, and far more personal. For instance, if his father was no more than a dissenting preacher at Nusquampton, he will say so plainly, while the polite biographer will describe him as "coming from a Nonconformist stock long settled in Nusquamptonshire." The one will tell good stories of his early struggles; the other will refer to them only as evidences of honourable poverty or indomitable perseverance. In short, unless the biographer writes with prejudice, he too often presents us with a colourless or a flattering portrait, which his departed friend would be the first to resent. Thus, while biographies may be misleading from beginning to end, no autobiography is ever wholly untrue. Allowances, of course, have to be made, but one soon learns to make them. The half-crown with which the young man came to London was in reality £50, with as much more in reserve; there was nothing miraculous about his lucky first brief, it came from a well-to-do uncle; and the beautiful and penniless bride had in fact £500 a year of her own. With deductions of this kind, the autobiography is often more to be trusted than the life that comes straight from the workshop of the interested friend. Both should be read critically, but the right places for the grains of salt are more plainly indicated in one case than in the other, so that, whatever the autobiographer's intention may be, every word of his narrative tends to exhibit his true character.

Not long ago the autobiography of a well-known demagogue was given to the world. He did some good in his generation, and some harm also. He worked hard for his cause, and did not greatly misuse his influence. His life, therefore, deserved to be written; but no biographer could possibly have supplied the wealth of detail and the personal touches that enable his readers to do him absolute justice, and to see him in all his mingled courage, honesty, bigotry, vanity, and littleness. After all, "what know we of the secret of a man?" It is only the man himself who, consciously or unconsciously, is able to tell us that. The biographer may do his best, but in his case also deductions have to be made for affection or antagonism, and sometimes for the perversity which prefers to create a striking picture rather than a true portrait. For this reason attempts have been made to whitewash such criminals as Tiberius and Judge Jeffreys, the original tendency having been to lay the colours on too thick; but no one ever seeks to excuse a man who, like Cellini in fact and Barry Lyndon in fiction, brags of his own vices. Still, autobiography, for want of dry light, is not always an unimpeachable historical record. Facts and dates may be correct enough, but the events of one's past life may not stand out in their right proportions. A man may easily be mistaken as to the real causes of his success or failure, the real measure of the esteem in which he was held, or even as to his own strength and weakness. It is not every one who can say offhand, like the Egyptian in Herodotus, what has been the cleverest and the wickedest action of his whole life.

Candour, of course, is the supreme virtue of the autobiographer. True, one does not expect a man to say, "I was a failure at College; I made slow progress in my profession; I owe everything to my luck, my wife, or my subordinates; I have been rewarded beyond my deserts." Candour does not involve confessions of this sort, but it does at least imply a just view of one's environment throughout life, and a recognition of the fact that there is more than one able man in the world. There is much candour in such an autobiography as that of Gibbon, which was written for his amusement. The reader, often availing himself of the writer's permission to "smile," sympathizes with the disgusted Oxford student and the captain of the Hampshire grenadiers. Sympathy, again, is the feeling excited by such a book as Mr. Crozier's "Inner Life," which we notice elsewhere, in which he describes his intellectual difficulties and his search for truth. It is the history not so much of a life as of a mind, not of terrestrial travels, but of the circumnavigation of the sea of literature. It is a spiritual autobiography, and sincerity is its principal charm. Among statesmen, there seems to be a disappointing conspiracy of silence. Is it regard for friends, or forbearance towards enemies, or disbelief in themselves that seals their lips? In a general way, their biographers have done them substantial justice. But a few honest indiscretions, possible only to an autobiographer, would often be worth more than the utmost historical accuracy. For instance, the world would give much for the full autobiography of the statesman who told his son that "accident, my boy, accident" had made him a Liberal. Volumes, perhaps, could not say more, but they would be very entertaining volumes, and their sustained candour would excuse all minuteness and prolixity. The fact is, as Gibbon suggests, that an autobiographer may be almost as prolix as he pleases, if only he is sincere. On that condition, even an undistinguished life may deserve study, and the homeliest "Portrait of a Man," with no more dignified title, may be esteemed a masterpiece.

We publish, in another column, some interesting suggestions towards a contemporary record of our literature, so arranged that students could, without difficulty, ascertain what books existed on any subject which they were investigating. The proposal our correspondent makes for an annual re-arrangement of the periodical lists of accessions to the British Museum Library strikes us as the most practical that has yet been offered. But a problem of equal interest is that of sorting and classifying the books published in the past; and the question is—Would it be possible to subject-index the whole of the British Museum Library, just as the accessions from 1880 to 1895 have already been subject-indexed by Mr. Fortescue?

The vastness of the undertaking, no doubt, suggests some principle of selection. As our correspondent says, the wood might be obscured by the trees. But Mr. Fortescue's magnificent index practically represents the unaided work of one man, who could not even devote the whole of his time to it. What could not have been achieved, in the same period, by ten men who had nothing else to do? And the wood and the trees difficulty might perhaps be got over by only attempting, at first, to deal with the books that appeared comparatively recently. Mr. Fortescue's index only covers five years in each volume. Before 1880 the trees were not so thick—books did not appear in such numbers as they do now—and it might be possible to work backwards at the rate of a decade to a volume, and so gradually build up a subject-index that would be invaluable by reason of its completeness, and convenient by reason of its chronological subdivisions.

The fashion of the "biographical edition," it appears, is beginning to spread. Mrs. Richmond Ritchie's example is, so it is stated, to be followed by a "biographical edition" of Charles Kingsley's works, with introductory essays by his daughter, "Lucas Malet"; and, man being an imitative animal, probably other similar announcements will shortly follow, and there is even talk already of a "biographical" Dickens. We do not know, of course, at present how far Mrs. Ritchie's plan is to be exactly followed, but any following of it is hardly to be encouraged. In Thackeray's case there was a special justification. There was no authorized Life, and the novelist had expressed the desire that none should be written. Mrs. Ritchie's introductions satisfied a legitimate public curiosity in what was perhaps the most legitimate and feasible way. But, as a rule, such piecemeal biographies must be unsatisfactory, and frequently superfluous—if not impertinent—adjuncts to works of art. A great book is a thing that should stand or fall on its own merits. To tack on to it personal matter about the circumstances under which it came to be written seems hardly more reasonable than to embellish the margin of an engraving or the pedestal of a statue with irresponsible small talk about the painter or the sculptor whose work it is.

Mr. Swinburne is one of the few literary critics who can put his criticisms to music. Here are some fine lines on John Webster in "A Prologue to The Duchess of Malfy" which appears in the January Nineteenth Century:—

Round him the shadows cast on earth by light
Rose, changed, and shone, transfiguring death and night.
Where evil only crawled and hissed and slew
On ways that only shame and bloodshed knew,
He bade the loyal light of honour live,

And love, when stricken through the heart, forgive.
 Deep down the midnight of the soul of sin
 He lit the star of mercy throned therein.
 High up the darkness of sublime despair
 He set the sun of love to triumph there.
 Things foul or frail his touch made strong and pure,
 And bade things transient like to stars endure.

The true distinction of lines like these compensates for the characteristically extravagant apostrophe on Shakespeare with which the poem opens. When one poet hymns the praise of another, it is rather hard, both on his idol and on his readers, that he should ostentatiously turn his back on his intelligence.

When Shakespeare soared from life to death, above,
 All praise, all adoration, save of love,
 As here on earth above all men he stood
 That were or are or shall be—great and good,
 Past thank or thought of England or of man—
 Light from the sunset quickened as it ran.

We commend this to Mr. Frank Harris.

But the lines on Webster show, from the point of view of mere style, the superiority as a literary critic of Mr. Swinburne the poet to Mr. Swinburne the prose writer. We turn to his essay on John Webster—"one of the imperishable and ineradicable landmarks of literature."

All the great qualities apparent in "The White Devil" reappear in "The Duchess of Malfy," combined with a yet more perfect execution, and utilized with a yet more consummate skill. No poet has ever so long and so successfully sustained at their utmost height and intensity the expressed emotions and the united effects of terror and pity. . . . Its wild and fearful sublimity of invention is not more exceptional than the exquisite justice and tenderness and subtlety of its expression.

Mr. Swinburne, it must be confessed, is a stylist in verse, but not in prose. His habit of re-duplicating every adjective and substantive could, of course, be illustrated in hundreds of passages more forcibly than it is above, but it never fails to weaken, and sometimes to vulgarise, the effect of his prose as a work of art. We would much rather he spoke to us about the Elizabethans, as he does now, in verse. His fine poetical rhapsodies on poets make an interesting comparison with the terser and sometimes saner lines of another poet who criticised in verse—Matthew Arnold. Webster, by-the-by, is less sympathetically dealt with in an essay, preceding Mr. Swinburne's poem, by Miss Margaret Maitland on Vittoria Accorambona, whom Webster depicts, but, so Miss Maitland thinks, fails to depict truly, in "The White Devil."

It is curious to note how old are the newest literary devices. Mr. H. G. Wells is a modern of the moderns; yet the new story of his which is beginning to run its serial course has taken its machinery from one of the oldest of popular tales—that of a man who falls into a trance which lasts for years or centuries. It was familiar to the nurseries of Greece and Scandinavia. Pliny and Plutarch both relate the singular case of Epimenides, who was going a journey one summer day and turned aside into a cave to rest. There he fell asleep, and did not wake for fifty-seven years. Pliny adds, as one might guess, that this prehistoric Rip Van Winkle was a good deal surprised when he reached home. Multiplied by seven, Epimenides gave us the Ephesian sleepers. Teutonic mythology is full of stories of great men who are still asleep and waiting the awakening day—Charlemagne in Hesse, Frederick Barbarossa in the Thuringerwald, Tell near the Lake of Lucerne, Thomas the Rhymer beneath the Eildon Hills. Mr. Baring-Gould sees in the myth a version of "the repose of the earth through the seven winter months." That ought to suit Mr. Wells, who is, above all, scientific.

Roman Society in the Last Century of the Western Empire. By Samuel Dill. 9½ x 6 in., 382 pp. London and New York, 1898. Macmillan. 12/- n.

There are signs of a revival of interest in the history of Imperial Rome. The last few years have seen the founding of periodicals in Russia and Germany for the study of the Byzantine Empire; something is being done, and more will be done, by way of editing texts which are important for the East, and perhaps we may look to see a corpus of historians which shall really be what Niebuhr's professed to be. We have had a new edition of Gibbon, and some able studies from the pen of Professor Bury. And now we welcome an important book on the Empire of the West; a special study of social life in the fifth century. This period has been hitherto somewhat neglected; unaccountably so, when we consider its importance. For the fifth century is really one of the turning points of history; it beheld the death-struggle of the old order and the birth-pangs of the new. We are met with the awful spectacle of a great nation destroyed; and with another spectacle, less awful but more remarkable—an ancient religion, sacred by the associations of a thousand years, giving way to a new. Such a period cannot but be of interest, and the historical interest is here the least. For us, the trustees of a greater Empire than the Roman, there may be a lesson here. Can we see the true causes of Rome's downfall? If so, do they exist in England? A timely warning may save us, if we have started on the downward path; or, if not, we may be enabled to guard against the dangers that beset greatness.

The subject of the work is (in the author's words) "the inner life and thoughts of the last three generations in the Empire of the West." The beginning of this period is marked by the passage of the Goths across the Danube; it ends with the practical extinction of the Roman power. During a part of the same period the pagan spirit awoke for its last struggle with Christianity for the dominion over men's minds. By a fortunate coincidence, we have exceptionally full material for judging of men's "inner life" at either end of the century—first, in the letters of Symmachus and the poems of Ausonius; and, last, in the works of Sidonius. This information has been supplemented from the Code of Theodosius, from Macrobius, St. Jerome, and St. Augustine, from the inscriptions, and from all the modern literature of the subject. So far as we have observed, nothing of importance has been neglected. The peculiar value of such studies as this is that they throw light upon obscure movements. It is very often those tendencies which no one observes at the time which decide the fate of nations. As in the eighteenth century England conquered continents and colonized half the world "in a fit of absence of mind," so the Romans of the fifth century lived a life which seemed to them not different from the life of the previous thousand years, save in external and unimportant events. Yet it was these things which really decided the fate of Rome. We may consider one or two of them.

What was the cause of the downfall of Rome? The superficial student will most likely suppose it to be the Gothic invasions. Yet Professor Dill makes it clear that Rome had withstood more dangerous enemies before; others she had absorbed into herself without changing her nature. But now things were different; the barbarians were not stronger, but Rome had grown weaker:—

best answered by an appeal to the Imperial Code. In the voluminous enactments issued from Constantine to Majorian, the student has before him a melancholy diagnosis of the maladies which, by a slow and inevitable progress of decay, were exhausting the strength of Roman society. He will see municipal liberty and self-government dying out, the upper class cut off from the masses by sharp distinctions of wealth and privilege, yet forbidden to bear arms, and deprived of all interest in public affairs. He will find that not only has an Oriental monarchy taken the place of the principate of Augustus, but that an almost Oriental system of caste has made every social grade and every occupation practically hereditary, from the senator to the waterman on the Tiber, or the sentinel on a frontier post; and that human nature is having its revenge in wholesale flight from a cruel servitude and the chaos of administration.

In a new sense, Latifundia perdidere Italiam; cruel indeed was the state of the small proprietor or the provincial merchant. The general weakness and corruption was most fatal in the civil service. Justice was not to be had, and the most infamous venality and tyranny were used by those who had to do with the State finances. Poor men were taxed to ruin, and fled to swell the bands of brigands which infested the high-roads. The sense of personal responsibility and patriotism was gone, along with political freedom. The middle class of merchants and traders dwindled and weakened; the poor man felt, much as the Turkish subject now feels, that the Government was only an instrument of oppression and extortion, and lost not only his allegiance, but his interest in life. The upper classes did not bear arms; they were degraded by gladiatorial shows and by all sorts of indulgence; the only manly exercise they knew was hunting, and this was not practicable for all. Thus Alaric found opposed to him no homogeneous body, but a disintegrated mass.

Another point of great interest is clearly brought out by Professor Dill: that Christianity had a serious rival in the cults of Mithra and Isis. The old Roman religion could not be expected to keep hold of the minds of intelligent men. Its puerile superstitions and its gross legends were bound to lose their power in time, as those of the Hindu religion are losing their power to-day; it survived so long as it did mainly because of old associations, and in particular by the influence of literature. There was nothing in it, moreover, which appealed to the emotions of the mass. But the Oriental cults, especially that of Mithra, were full of mystery and symbolism, and excited the worshippers in the highest degree. To us the Taurobolium seems so disgusting a rite that we forget that the worshipper was too much absorbed to think whether it was disgusting or not. A worshipper of Mithra might perhaps have thought many Christian hymns as disgusting as we think the Taurobolium; he might have shuddered at a God who was supposed to gloat over the torments of the damned. Professor Dill makes it quite clear that the Mithraic initiate attached high symbolic meanings to his rites. The same is true of the mysteries of Isis, so brilliantly described for us by Apuleius. With much sympathy Professor Dill traces these and other attempts of the devout to feel after that God who reveals himself in many ways. He can admire the greatness of Julian's attempt to restore the glories of Paganism, foredoomed though it was to failure. "It was no ordinary man," he writes, "who dreamt of regenerating the ancient worship by borrowing a dogmatic theology from Alexandria, an ecstatic devotion from Persia, a moral idea from Galilee." In the same spirit he points out how grave a fault it is

To fix one's gaze on the baser side of past ages, and to ignore whatever there is of hope and promise in the slow and painful development of humanity. Such is not the habit of a sound and scrupulous historical spirit. Nor is it the attitude of a truly religious mind. It shows but little faith in the Father of all souls to believe that He consigns whole generations of His children merely to the worship of devils, without any glimpse of Himself, and to dwell on their blind aberrations of superstition in groping towards the light, and on their frantic efforts to calm the terrors and the longings which are inspired by the ineradicable faith in a world beyond the grave. Rather should we welcome indications that God never utterly forsakes the creatures of His hands, and that in the decay of ancient heathenism there was a moral and spiritual life, which was to be nourished in an unending future by the divine ideals of Galilee.

The picture here presented of the religious aspect of pagan society is a very interesting one. Professor Dill shows how the study of ancient literature contributed to the survival of Paganism. The reverence then felt by educated men for the old writers has perhaps no parallel save in China; and thus the Pantheon continued in a kind of shadowy existence.

These are only one or two of the topics discussed in this book. We can only allude to the excellent series of portraits Professor Dill gives us of Symmachus, of Ansonius and his family circle, of Paulinus and Sidonius; his description of University life in the provinces, or the life of a country gentleman; the daily routine of a Bishop; and many other such matters, which help the imagination to reconstruct society in that age. Professor Dill is not concerned with modern instances, or he might have found a remarkable parallel in China to the state of Rome in the fifth century. There we have the spectacle of a literary aristocracy, appointed entirely by success in examinations, who despise the profession of arms. That nation has lately looked on while a victorious enemy threatened the capital, and yet has felt no more disturbed than the Roman provincials were at the invasion of the Goths. In China we see the same hopeless corruption of the civil service, the same poverty, oppression, and injustice. On the other hand, when we apply the lesson to our own Empire, we are filled with hope. There are not wanting those who prophesy its downfall; but we can see that none of the corrupting influences of Ancient Rome are to be found here. External foes are the least of dangers to any nation; and even the tendency to luxuriousness which wealth brings is largely counteracted by a severe climate and a national delight in athletic games.

We have little to add by way of criticism. Professor Dill's method is so lucid, his care and accuracy are so constant, that the few minor points we have noted may be left alone. It is true, as he implies in his preface, that some faults may be discovered. There is little said of the life of the commercial class, and of those remarkable trade-guilds which have been described by Liebenam. We might have preferred a little more directness in some passages where the author assumes too much, or falls into an allusive style; chronological order might have been more carefully observed in certain sections of the book. But as a whole the book is thoroughly satisfactory, and is likely to be regarded in future as indispensable for the student of this period.

The Silence of Love. By Edmond Holmes. 8×6½ in., 50 pp. London, 1898. Lane. 3/6 n.

Several years have elapsed since the author of these fifty sonnets made his first essay in poetry with the publication of a small volume of distinct promise, showing a true feeling for nature in all her aspects, combined with no inconsiderable gift of poetic expression. Since then, acting no doubt upon an excellent principle—not sufficiently respected by many of his contemporaries—that it is better to say nothing till you feel you have something to say, he has refrained from following up his early success. A visit to Oxford, however, if we may regard his dedicatory lines as autobiographical, has apparently revived his inspiration, and the result is to be found in "The Silence of Love." It is in a totally different poetic key from that of Mr. Holmes' earlier volume, and one which calls for the display of quite another form of poetic power. It belongs, in fact, to the poetry of passion, as distinct from that of contemplation; which is the same thing as saying—since the former, unlike the latter, admits of few or no changes of mood—that it undertakes to maintain the same level of intensity throughout, and to keep the "sacred fire" from ever, even temporarily, dying down. This is no light task, and it would be going too far to say that Mr. Holmes has been uniformly successful in its accomplishment. The difficulty is increased for him by the fact that the entire poem consists practically of fifty variations on a single theme. The idea which runs through them all, and has, of course, determined the title of the poem is that the beatitude of Love resides essentially in its character as "impulse," and that its satisfaction would be its destruction. "Does not love die?" he asks.

Does not love die?—O dark and awful thought—
Die of achieving all that it has sought?

And so haunting is this dark and awful question that it reappears in one form or another in almost every one of Mr. Holmes' fifty sonnets. In the thirty-seventh of their number he is still asking it with unabated insistence, and here, at any rate, with something of the Elizabethan mixture of dignity and naïveté in the expression.

Men ask what is the issue of my quest,
I answer "This—that issue there is none :
The energy of love may never rest,
Its life were over if its work were done.
Love were not love if it could win its prize,
Love were not love if it could reach its goal ;
Love were not love if in the loved one's eyes
I could not find unfathomed depths of soul.
Love is enough : I love nor ask for more :
Love is its own desire, its own delight :
Love is the atmosphere through which I soar :
Love's are the wings on which I take my flight.
Love—silent, unrequited, unconfessed."
This is my pride ; in this my life is blest.

Here and in many other places the note is impressively struck, but the effort of sustaining it at its full value throughout fifty sonnets is too severe a trial even for the author's remarkable activity of imagination and his ample command of the technical resources of his art. A certain impression of monotony was inevitable, and the reader—especially towards the end of the volume—rarely escapes from it altogether, even where the poet is singing his best. He comes nearest, perhaps, to escaping from it in those sonnets in which a purely passionate utterance is exchanged for the language of imagery, and Mr. Holmes draws once more upon those powers of nature-painting which he displayed in his earlier work. As thus :—

I asked the wind to tell my heart's unrest ;
With frenzied blast the fierce autumnal gale
Rushed landward from its cloud-world in the west,
Then died away in faint despairing wail.
I asked the sea ; its billows shook the shore
With deafening boom—then rocked themselves to sleep.
I asked the thunder ; but its crashing roar
Became at last a stillness dread and deep.
Faint voices all ! My love was still untold ;
No storm could measure its tempestuous might :
Thus in the heights above I saw unrolled
The calm majestic pageant of the night ;
And in its silence caught the only strain
That tells alike love's passion and love's pain.

In the forty-fifth sonnet, however, a deeper and more solemn chord is struck, which even for the great Puritan critic himself would perhaps have redeemed "The Silence of Love" from the reproach of being a "vain amatorious poem":—

What has life taught me ? Will the Judge Most High,
When dawns His splendour on death's deepest gloom,
Ask me this question, and with searching eye
Read in my heart my answer and my doom ?

O when I stand before God's judgment seat,
Before His throne of glory and of grace,
With what confession shall I dare to meet
The sad, the stern reproaches of His face ?
What did I learn ? My passions to control,
To conquer self, to quench the fire of lust,
To seek Thy will, to purify my soul ?—
Not these alas ! But O Thou Judge Most Just,
Thou God of Love ! I learned Thy mystic lore—
I learned to love, once and for evermore.

Taken as a whole, the little volume contains a good deal of work of no little beauty and power. We look forward to meeting Mr. Holmes again under conditions which impose less severe limitations of the scope of his undoubted poetic talent.

THE DISTRESSFUL ISLE.

Irish Life and Character. By Michael MacDonagh. 8x5½in., 332 pp. London, 1898. Hodder & Stoughton. 6/-

In his preface Mr. MacDonagh suggests that it is his desire to do for Ireland what Dean Ramsay's "Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character" has done for Scotland, and he has not failed to carry out his intention in so far as his observation permitted, but his recollections and experiences are not quite so varied nor so racy as those of the Dean. Mr. MacDonagh is perhaps at his best in those sections of his book dealing with "bulls," with the national humour, and with love-making. In the chapter on The Old Irish Squire we do not get much that is new ; and the story "of an Irish squire of the old days" who threatened to cut his son off with a shilling and was answered with, "Where will you get the shilling?" has been told these many years of the Sheridans and others. Still no chapter is without its amusing stories :—

An old Irish nobleman, when dying, was told by the clergyman that life and its vanities would soon pass away, and he was therefore exhorted to repent. "Repent ! For what should I repent?" cried the old lord. "I don't remember that during the whole of my long life I ever denied myself anything."

There are tales in plenty of the great claret-drinking days ; the days of a doubtful hospitality which forced certain guests to fall back on the Jack-the-Giant-Killer-like subterfuge of pouring wine and whisky, while pretending to drink it, down the stiff stock or cravat which was then worn high to the chin. The chapter on "Some Delusions about Ireland" is of value, and should, at least, dispose of the idea that the Irish peasantry say "prate" for "priest" ; if it does so much, Mr. MacDonagh has not written in vain. The "Irish Bull" has been popular with laughter-makers for many generations ; for centuries, indeed, if its origin is correctly traced to Obadiah Bull, an Irish lawyer of the time of Henry VII. who is supposed to have circulated an enormous number of amusing blunders of this kind. The subject has been very fully treated of late in Mr. G. R. Neilson's THE BOOK OF BULLS (Simpkin Marshall, 3s. 6d.), which includes Dr. and Maria Edgeworth's "Essay on Irish Bulls." In this particular branch of accidental drollery Mr. MacDonagh has been a fortunate collector.

On his first visit to Kingstown a hairdresser begged him to buy some hair-wash—

"What sort of stuff is it?" I asked. "Oh, it's grand stuff," he replied. "It's a sort of multum in parvo—the less you take of it the better!"

A friend said to an Irishman, "Well, Mick, I've heard some queer stories about your doings lately." "Och, don't believe thim, Surr," replied Mick, "Sure half the lies tould about me by the naybours isn't thue!" Bulls, Mr. MacDonagh holds, oftener spring from mental quickness than mental sluggishness, and perhaps in some degree from a general Celtic inclination towards "a reaction against the despotism of fact." This form of humour is, however, not unknown among English politicians, and one of the most eminent of our younger statesmen has spoken of welcoming the dawn with open arms, and is reported to have said on one occasion, "We are not out of the wood, but we have a good ship, a good crew, and a good captain." The Irish unconscious attempts in this direction are, however, very much better. We do not remember ever to have seen in print the following:—An Englishman was saying to an Irish friend that, although the Saxon often made "bulls" somehow, they had not the humour of the Irish variety. "Perhaps not," said his friend, "You see the Irish bull is always pregnant." One experience of Mr. MacDonagh's is excellent. He had the good fortune to hear a man suspected of agrarian outrages described as one "whose heart would be touched by the bleatin' of a bruised worm." But for other, and perhaps better examples we must refer the reader to this amusing book. One of Mr. MacDonagh's stories, by the way, is a dramatic anecdote of an Irishman in Limerick whose existence was made miserable by a drunken wife. By a curious coincidence the same story was, if we remember rightly, admirably told by Mr. George Moore in the Daily Chronicle on Boxing Day two or three years ago. We cannot quite agree with Mr. MacDonagh when he says in his introduction that he has admitted into his collection only anecdotes that are "truly genuine, really humorous, and certainly characteristic of the Irish people," but his book is full of acutely-observed facts and crowded with stories which should make the fortune of many an old-fashioned diner-out.

THE LATE EMPRESS OF AUSTRIA.

Elizabeth, Empress of Austria. A Memoir by A. De Burgh. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ in., 383 pp. London, 1898. Hutchinson. 6/-

The contemporary history of the Courts of Europe contains no more romantic figure than that of the late Empress of Austria. The tragedy of her death is too fresh in the memory for her chronicler to gain a critical attitude or the perspective necessary for historical accuracy, and thus this carefully-arranged volume contains little more than warm eulogy supported with reminiscences of the Empress and of her devoted entourage, pictures of her castles, her homes, and the places she cared to visit. It may be impossible ever to unveil the true mental life of this remarkable woman. Failing this, Mr. De Burgh gives us a very complete and interesting account of her life from the happy days when she played through the rose gardens of the Castle of Possenhofen, where her father, the Duke Maximilian of Bavaria, and his wife, the proud and ambitious Duchess Ludovica, lived as country gentlefolk, through all the varying phases of a life full to the brim with incident, power, passion, victory, tragedy, and regret. The pictures Mr. De Burgh draws for us of her youth and happiness, of the coming of the young Emperor to woo her—he had been intended for her elder sister, but had fallen in love at first sight with "Lisel"—and of her early married life are full of charm. Later in the volume some of the incidents of a complicated period are treated with inevitable reserve. We are given some glimpses of the strange temperament of the Wittelsbach family. Of their high gifts—spirit, courage, and quick sympathy—the Empress Elizabeth was a remarkable example. Here is a typical action illustrating the chivalric ardour with which she inspired her immediate circle:—

Once when the Archduchess Marie Theresa, the sister-in-law of the Empress, was staying at her country residence, a fire broke out in a village in her neighbourhood, whereupon she instantly ordered her carriage, and drove to the scene of the conflagration; there she learnt that in one of the rooms of the house a little child was imprisoned; seeing the men standing around reluctant to risk their lives, she dashed up the burning staircase before anybody had time to prevent her, returning in a few moments with the child practically unhurt in her arms. The brave Princess's hair was scorched and burnt, and her hands were badly injured, but she refused to receive medical aid until the doctor had satisfied her that the little one was unhurt.

Such incidents as these showed the sincere feeling for others which the Empress did so much to cultivate among her companions and friends. She belonged to a family whose historic past and early training alike made them daring in action, strong in affection, unselfish and devoted in sorrow, eccentric in all things.

The chapter entitled "The Empress as Sportswoman" will interest English readers who remember her in Meath, Cheshire, or Northamptonshire. It is twenty-one years since she first hunted with the Pytchley, of which Earl Spencer was then master. The late Mr. H. O. Nethercote spoke thus of her first appearance in the hunting field:—

It was at once remarked by the large field, which respectfully saluted her on her first appearance with the Pytchleys, that her seat on horseback was extremely graceful, that her hands were perfect, and when the hounds began to run in earnest that there was no fence big enough to stop her.

The Empress was a most thoughtful and judicious rider, and always considerate for her mounts. One peculiarity was observed in her costume in the days when she rode here accompanied by Prince Liechtenstein and piloted by the late Captain "Bay" Middleton—namely, that she carried, besides the crop, a small fan, which she used after a run was over. Mr. De Burgh's book shows Elizabeth of Austria to have been a many-sided and always interesting woman. Apart from her duties as Empress and Royal mother, and her intense love of sport, she devoted much time to architectural work, to travel, to her children's education, and to philanthropy. She sought out and assisted young and struggling artists and littérateurs. Her great delight was in Heine, to whose memory she built a temple at the Achilleon in Corfu. Mr. De Burgh tells us that she read with pleasure Miss Florence Marryat's "The Blood of the Vampire" and other writings of popular English novelists, so that her tastes in literature were sufficiently catholic.

The chapter which tells of King Ludwig II. of Bavaria gives some account of the romantic intercourse between "The Dove and the Eagle," the respective names used by the Empress and the King. The description of the "Rosentusel" where they sometimes met has the true charm of romance. The numerous pictures that illustrate Mr. De Burgh's book are mainly reproductions from photographs of the Empress and other members of the Austrian Imperial family. The late Empress had an absolute dread of the itinerant photographer, and the author must have taken great pains to collect so complete an album of portraits, from those of the earliest days down to a "snapshot" taken a short time before the Empress's death, in which she is guarded against her enemy with the camera by both a sunshade and a fan.

MONT BLANC.

The Annals of Mont Blanc. By C. E. Mathews. 9 x 6 in., xxiv. + 308 pp. London, 1898. Unwin. 21/- n.

English mountaineers have hitherto discharged a good deal less than their fair share of the task of writing up the history of the mountains. The best history of Mont Blanc comes from France; the best history of Monte Rosa comes from Austria; the best information about such early climbers as Petrarch, Dante, and Leonardo da Vinci is only to be read in Italian. By the publication of the encyclopædic volume now before us Mr. Mathews to a certain extent redresses the balance in favour of his country; but it is not with the really ancient history of his subject that Mr. Mathews seems to be most familiar. Though he professes to trace the records of the Valley of Chamonix from the earliest times, he neglects to quote, or even to refer to, the first traveller who wrote an account of its glaciers and snow-fields. This is René le Pays, Sieur du Plessis Villeneuve, who wrote a letter to an unknown lady, dated "Chamouny-en-Fossigny le 16 May, 1669," and published it in "Les Nouvelles Oeuvres de Monsieur Le Pays," printed at Amsterdam in 1677. Neglecting this document—which is moderately long and exceedingly interesting—Mr. Mathews speaks of no visitor earlier than the Prince of Sulzbach, whose journey took place as late as 1727, and who, apparently, did not think it worth while to put his experiences on paper. Nor is Mr. Mathews entirely satisfactory when he proceeds to recount the more famous excursions of Windham and Pococke, and Martel. He speaks, for instance, of the famous Oriental traveller as "one Dr. Pococke"—which is much as though one should speak vaguely of "a Polar explorer of the name of Nansen"; and he gives us practically no information about Martel, though he might have found plenty in an article which M. Dufour contributed a little while back to the Echo des Alpes. Even the delightful Bourrit is dismissed with less attention than he deserves, seeing that he acquired such a renown as the Historian of the Alps that Princes and Princesses made pilgrimages to see him.

The best part of Mr. Mathews' book is that which deals with the first ascent of Mont Blanc by Jacques Balmat and Dr. Paccard in 1786. Here the special knowledge of the practical mountaineer comes into play, with the result that Balmat's story of the climb, reported in Dumas' celebrated interview with the great guide, is raked with damaging criticism. That story, it will be remembered, is so told as to make Paccard look a perfect fool; and Mr. Mathews analyses it closely, showing its inconsistencies and absurdities. The well-known statement that Balmat left his companion behind at the Petits Mulets, got to the top alone, and then returned to fetch his companion is clearly demonstrated to have been the merest bit of brag. No hint of it is contained in any of the contemporary narratives of the ascent, and it involves improbabilities so glaring as almost to amount to impossibilities:—

It is scarcely credible, [says Mr. Mathews] that the doctor could have survived an hour-and-a-half's exposure whilst sitting alone on the snow in the bitter cold, still less that after such an interval he could have resumed his journey with success. Even a benevolent critic, on carefully considering Balmat's story, must feel disposed to put the tongue of incredulity into the cheek of derision.

Mr. Mathews has been particularly fortunate in obtaining access to a MS. diary by Dr. Paccard. Unfortunately this adds little or nothing to our knowledge of the ascent of 1786; but it contains many interesting notes on previous attempts and subsequent triumphs. Here is a note on the attempt of 1783:—

"I started with M. Bourrit, the miller Marie, and Jean Claude Couttet; we went and slept at La Tournelle, but arrived only at the glacier, which was much crevassed. Mont Blanc was covered with clouds, and M. Bourrit did not dare to go on the ice."

The view of Bourrit's mountaineering capacities thus taken by the doctor may, perhaps, go some way towards explaining the fact that Bourrit, almost alone among contemporary mountaineers, sided against the doctor in the controversy with Balmat.

ANTIQUITIES OF THE RIVIERA.

The Romans on the Riviera and the Rhone. By W. H. (Bullock) Hall, F.R.G.S. 9½ x 6 in., x. + 194 pp. London and New York, 1898. Macmillan. 6/-

This is rather a series of essays than a book, and is somewhat wanting in concentration. There is no room in a work of this compass for details of Roman castrametation, and digressions on the Catilinarian conspiracy, the Triumvirate, and the death of Cicero, or Plutarch's life of L. Aemilius Paullus. Mr. Hall holds, with support from high authority, the opinion that the French nation is principally sprung from an Iberian stock, overlaid by Celtic and Teutonic additions. A type of dark, small, round-headed man is found in all Central and Southern France, and a similar type in Spain, Brittany, and Wales. The theory which assumes identity of race may be carried to an absurdity; but ethnological difficulties are diminished if we admit the permanence in the greater part of Western Europe of a strong non-Aryan element. Among the non-Aryan races are to be reckoned the Ligurians of the Mediterranean seaboard, to whom Mr. Hall devotes an interesting chapter. The Ligurians occupied not only the coast and neighbouring mountains from Etruria to the Gallic border, but are found also on the head waters of the Po, in the islands of the Western Mediterranean, and even on the coast of Spain. They appear to have been originally a seafaring people, and had a high reputation for courage and endurance in war.

The most interesting part of Mr. Hall's volume is that connected with the Roman roads in the Riviera and Rhone district—the various sections of the Via Aurelia. This name, which he applies to the whole coast-road from Rome to Arles, properly belongs to no more than the first section, from Rome to Vada Volaterrana, not far from Leghorn. But the name pushed on with the road, "as main lines of railway swallow up the subsidiary names" of their successive sections. The local name, "lou camin Ourelian" in Provence, is good evidence against the silence of the Itineraries and the Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum. From Vada Volaterrana onward the sections of the Aurelian road, built at different periods as the result of military and colonizing extensions (as Mr. Hall points out), are successively named Aemilia Scauri, to Vada Sabata or Sabatia (Vado near Savona), a section which included a long detour from Genoa inland to Dertona (Tortona) and back to the coast; Via Julia Augusti, constructed by Augustus 12 B.C. as far as the river Var, and continued, probably on the lines of an old Greek road made by the Massilians, as far as Forum Julii (Fréjus); thence the Via Domitia, to Aquae Sextiae (Aix), and on to Arelate (Arles), by two routes—one by Marseilles, the other direct, across the plain of la Crau, thus completing the continuous coast-route from Rome. Mr. Hall has been over the whole ground, and supports his conclusions not only by the evidence of the Itineraries and Tables, but by milestones, arches, and masonry found in situ. He would have written a better book if he had kept history and topography separate, and if he had made a clearer distinction of subjects, and given us a complete map of the ancient roads in the Ligurian district. As it is, his work owes its chief value to accurate local knowledge applied to the study of authorities.

FLY-FISHING UP TO DATE.

Salmon and Sea Trout. By Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart., M.P., F.R.S. (The Angler's Library.) 7½ x 5 in., xii. + 272 pp. London, 1898. Lawrence & Bullen. 7/6

"How to propagate, preserve, and catch Salmon and Sea Trout in British Waters" is the theme of Sir Herbert Maxwell's pleasant and useful book. As to propagating these valuable fish, we can only refer the reader to the work itself. The natural history of the salmon cannot be briefly discussed. But it does appear that the salmon is not of a different species from the common (or at one time common) burn trout. In him, good conditions (which he rarely meets with) produce silvery hues and firm, pink flesh of a salmon-like character. Lord Granby, however, found that Scotch trout would not thrive in his English water; they grew lean, surly, Covenanting kind of fish. On the other hand, we have known tiny burn trout which, by accident, got into a lochan thrive to two or three pounds weight. Suppose them to acquire a habit of taking change of water in the sea, and the rise to salmonhood seems feasible. The common finger-marks on parr and small trout indicate a common ancestry, while hybrids between trout and salmon are proved to be fertile.

On the question whether salmon feed in fresh water Sir Herbert has long entertained the opinion now sanctioned by the Blue-book of the Scottish Fishery Board. They do not, that is, they do very rarely, swallow food, but the body does not "digest, absorb, and utilize it." What then do we make of Colquhoun's salmon, which regularly swallowed young martins as they fell out of the nest; and what do the Dee salmon intend when they rise, like trout, at March Browns? And why do some American salmon reject fly, minnow, and so on, but feed so greedily on salmon roe that it ceases to be amusing to catch them? Salmon roe does not excite their curiosity by "wriggling," like the worm. On the other hand, in fresh water the membrane of the stomach and intestines degenerates as the reproductive organs develop. Probably the salmon retains a vellété for food, in fresh water, but only pecks at it occasionally—more is the pity. On the colour sense of fish Sir Herbert has made well-known experiments. Trout will take scarlet or sky-blue May-flies (artificial) as readily as accurate imitations. But this may be set down to the fanaticism of the boom in May-flies, and we shall be yet more certain when Sir Herbert has caught Test or Itchen trout on red and blue quills and duns. As to salmon, the fly imitates nothing, and it is size and shape, not colour, that tells—in spite of local superstitions. John Macbeth on the Helmsdale caught, with a Popham, a fish with four broken Pophams in his mouth by carefully guiding him down the fall on Beat No. Six. John is a truthful man, but it does not follow that the fish had a marked preference and was a Popham collector. The people who favoured the Popham were the fishers.

For the rest, both in its advice and its anecdote, Sir Herbert's book is excellent; also in the merit of the illustrations. He is a fly-fisher, and cares not for minnow, prawn, and other abominations. Observe, especially, the right and wrong ways of giving the butt, and (p. 57) remark the results of neglecting to carry the Maxwell gaff; c'est faire une gaffe. From the topic of preserving, or rather not annihilating, the fish, any one who knows Tweed turns to

Scots wha fish wi' salmon roe,
Scots, wha sniggle as ye go,
Wull ye need the Bilie? No!
Let the limmer die!

So runs the poem of Independence.

THE INDIAN MUTINY.

The Sepoy Mutiny, as seen by a Subaltern, from Delhi to Lucknow. By Colonel Edward Vibart, late 15th Bengal Cavalry. 8½ x 5½ in., x. + 308 pp. London, 1898.

Smith, Elder. 7/6

Recollections of a Highland Subaltern, during Campaigns in India in 1857, 1858, and 1859. By Lieut.-Colonel W. Gordon-Alexander, late 93rd Highlanders. 9 x 5½ in., x. + 360 pp. London, 1898.

Arnold. 16/-

The story of the great Indian Mutiny and Rebellion of 1857 will always prove interesting. During the last few years much has been added to our knowledge of the operations for the suppression of that terrible uprising, but even now the subject has not been exhausted, as the fine volumes under review clearly prove. Especial interest attaches to them, as they are written by actors in the events recorded, and from notes made at the time. Colonel Vibart, who was, at the time of the outbreak at Delhi, a young subaltern in one of the native regiments stationed there, took an active part in many of the tragic events which happened inside that city, and afterwards served in the campaign of 1857-58 from Delhi to Lucknow. He has, moreover, in his possession a number of letters which he wrote to his relatives in England while the revolt was progressing, and these, together with the very permanent impression made upon his memory by the events of the Mutiny, enable him to give a full and trustworthy narrative. Colonel Gordon-Alexander served throughout with the gallant Highland Brigade, and recorded, as he assures us, all the events he witnessed or heard of at the time within a day or two at latest of their having taken place.

The first ten chapters of Col. Vibart's work contain an account of the horrors enacted in Delhi on May 11th, 1857; the exciting escape of ten Europeans (five officers and five ladies) from the Main Guard of the Cashmere Gate; their wanderings, exposure, and suffering during a week in the jungle; and their rescue by Lieutenants Gough and Mackenzie at the head of a remnant of the 3rd Native Cavalry which had remained faithful. It would indeed be difficult to find in the pages of any book more exciting chapters than these. The writer next records the siege and capture of Delhi, and after dealing with Cawnpur and its sad memories, passes on to an epitome of those stirring events in which he took part with the avenging army under Sir Colin Campbell for the final conquest of Lucknow. This excellent work should be read by those who seek a graphic and thrilling account of some of the most stirring events from Delhi to Lucknow.

The author of "Recollections of a Highland Subaltern"

landed with his regiment at Calcutta in September, 1857, the day that Delhi fell. Sir Colin Campbell was at that post, having arrived the previous month, at a time when affairs were at their worst; for the North-West Provinces were then lost, the Punjab was in a state of ferment, Central India on the verge of rebellion, and the very existence of British power in India dependent upon the capture and fall of Delhi. Without delay the 93rd marched up country to Cawnpur, and the author, who was observant of all that passed by the way, gives the reader glimpses of the irregularities that existed at that time in India and no doubt contributed much to bring about the deplorable events of the rebellion. He gives (from his diary) an account of how some of our men had, in their just wrath, pitched a naked fakir, whom they found walking about the station, into the Ganges, whence he swam to shore again like a duck. Before the Mutiny, these repulsive-looking holy-men were allowed to parade themselves about European stations, their presence often leading to breaches of the peace and the arousing of racial and religious rancour. Another source of mischief was the slackness of discipline amongst the European officers of the disbanded Sepoy regiments. The story of the Slaughterhouse of Cawnpur has often been told, but seldom with so much force as in this work.

And thence Colonel Gordon-Alexander leads us on to the Relief of Lucknow, the storming of the Sikandarbagh, the Battle of Cawnpur, the Siege of Lucknow, the advance into Rohilkhand, and the campaign in Oudh; and if at times he deals somewhat harshly with the older authorities on these subjects, and gives special prominence to the doings of his own regiment, we must attribute the former to the bluntness of a soldier who served through rough times, and grant that there is some justification for the latter. The plans of the different actions are simple and intelligible to the general reader, and there are portraits of some of the most distinguished officers under whom the author served.

NAVAL.

Life of Vice-Admiral Edmund Lord Lyons, G.O.B. By Captain S. Eardley-Wilmot, R.N. 9½ x 6½ in., xv. + 437 pp. London, 1898.

Sampson Low. 21/-

We venture to think that we are not far wrong in supposing the original causes of the appearance of this life of the first Lord Lyons to be certain passages in Sir Edward Hamley's short history of the war in the Crimea. Sir Edward, who was at no time, and in no relation of life a very charitable judge of his neighbour, wrote of the sailor with all the candour of the other service. These remarks of his, condemnatory as they were, and thrown off with that precision and confidence proper to his style, have naturally been unwelcome to the very distinguished representatives of Lord Lyons. Hence Captain Eardley-Wilmot's commission to write a life of the admiral who succeeded Sir W. Dundas in command of the Fleet in the Black Sea. We are induced to form this opinion by various considerations—and chiefly by the prominence which the author of this biography gives to Sir Edward Hamley's strictures. It also strikes us as improbable that his life would have attracted a biographer at this distance of time, if Lord Lyons were not represented by those who are not only willing but able to speak with the enemy at the gate.

The early life of Sir Edmund Lyons, as he was during the greater part of his active career, Lord Lyons as he became shortly before his death, was that of a naval officer who began too late to share in the glories of the Napoleonic war. His capture of the Dutch fort of Marrack, in Java, was a dashing feat, and a fine example of the kind of operation in which our naval officers found chances of distinction after the French fleets had been driven off the sea. The same sort of thing was done five hundred times round the coast of Spain during the Peninsular War, and was, in fact, the daily bread of the crew of the "Impérieuse" during her famous cruises under Cochrane's command. The middle period of Sir Edmund Lyons' life was spent as Minister at Athens.

Captain Eardley-Wilmot passes over this, which was, indeed, a subordinate part of the widely ramifying, ever shifting, and never as yet to be settled Eastern Question, somewhat lightly. Few firm touches are to be found in the two chapters he devotes to it—except these two. First he tells how Sir Edmund took offence at the high and dry manner of the Great Elchi, and showed his feelings with the frankness of a sailor. Then he gives a quotation from a letter of Lord Palmerston's which is curious reading in the light of later experience. We find Palmerston telling the Minister at Athens that if Greece had a constitution she would be happy. The world knows now what happiness her constitution has brought Greece, but the sentence has historic value as showing how deeply even shrewd and able men of the middle period of the century held the strange creed that any pinchbeck imitation of those institutions which have been the growth of centuries with us, and work well because they are so, will work for good when it is planted amid an alien race with another past, another training. A brief tenure of insignificant diplomatic posts at Berne and Stockholm was followed by the return of Sir Edmund Lyons to the sea, when he was appointed as Second in Command to Sir William Dundas in the Mediterranean.

His life from this time forward becomes identified with the naval side of the Crimean war. Its interest lies partly in the relations of Sir E. Lyons to Admiral Dundas, partly in the question whether General Hamley was, or was not, right in saying that his influence was for evil, and not for good, on certain occasions. As to the first point, Captain Eardley-Wilmot does not affect to deny that an unbroken Naval tradition has it that Lyons played the part of impatient heir-apparent to the senior Admiral. He only says he can find no expressions of ill-feeling in Lyons' letters. Most readers of the book, we take it, will incline to think that Naval tradition is not far wrong, but if they are fair judges they will add that the fault, if fault there was, lay with the Admiralty. Lyons was sent out with a promise of the succession, because he was a younger and more energetic man, and because my lords, to put it plainly, thought Admiral Dundas better fitted for a peace than a war command. If they had wanted to reproduce between these two the bitter relations of Hood and Rodney they could have chosen no better way. That Lyons does not fill his private letters with the rancour of Hood only proves that he was a well-bred and kind-hearted man. Of Sir E. Hamley's criticisms, one is avowedly based on mere hearsay and is of no importance; another is to the effect that Lyons was wrong in urging on the premature and useless bombardment of Sevastopol, and that he tacitly condemned himself by not renewing it when in command. This makes Captain Eardley-Wilmot very angry, but it has no great meaning. Lyons did no sin in urging vigorous action, and if, when experience showed him that a particular measure was of no value he abstained from taking it, he was very much in the right. The third criticism, which is that Lyons caused mischief by persuading Lord Raglan to take Balaclava as the basis of our Army, is serious, and Captain Eardley-Wilmot's answer strikes us as weak. It amounts to no more than this—that Balaclava is a nice little harbour, and that if the Army could not get at it conveniently this was a military consideration, which a seaman could not be expected to take into account. But this is precisely what he ought to have considered. The finest anchorage in the world is of little use as a place of transit if it is difficult of access from the land. Of course, Lord Raglan and his staff ought to have seen as much; but if they were weak and shortsighted, that does not excuse Sir E. Lyons for judging as a mere seaman when he ought to have taken what Rodney called "the great line" and have looked at the whole field of war. As the book is professedly a biography we have confined ourselves to the biographical interest. Of the Crimean war on its naval side Captain Eardley-Wilmot gives a full and valuable account.

Memoirs of Admiral the Right Hon. Sir Astley Cooper Key, G.C.B. By Vice-Admiral P. H. Colomb. 9 x 5½ in., 511 pp. London, 1898. Methuen. 16/-

It is a pleasant surprise to find Admiral Colomb turning to the new and evidently congenial paths of Naval biography. His Memoirs of Sir Cooper Key are in many ways eminently satisfactory, as an intelligent record of both the man and his work. It is curious, perhaps, to find him discoursing upon the career of an officer who never comprehended that larger policy of defence which he has almost devoted his life to elucidating. But Sir Cooper Key lived in a period of momentous change—no other than that of the birthtime of the modern Fleet—and the opportunity was not to be lost of recording the successive steps by which the ironclad, steam-propelled Navy emerged from the earlier state of the days of wood, canvas, and hemp. Indeed, Admiral Colomb is at pains to depict his hero as the product of environment working upon natural character, and this gives him the opportunity of writing several most interesting chapters, which are not the least valuable in the book. He is perhaps less at home where he deals with personality, and we think at least that the parallelism which he sees between Nelson and Cooper Key will elude even the most discerning.

It is as a Naval administrator that posterity will regard Sir Cooper Key. Very few officers have ever had so wide a knowledge of every Naval department as Sir Cooper Key when he went to the Admiralty in 1879, to continue in office under the Gladstone Cabinet with Lord Northbrook as First Lord. Yet his great experience had never given him any conception of the real function of the Navy. He admired Nelson, but was ignorant of Naval history. Ideas of the larger policy of defence were foreign to him. Having risen to a foremost position in the Navy, he was yet—and he was the exponent of a school—so blind to its significance that, as Admiral Colomb says, "he had looked to military forces as at least a possible alternative to its defensive power." He had been an advocate of the policy that brought about the prodigious waste of money and the huge misdirection of effort when the mania for coast fortifications was indulged in in 1859. "He appears to have narrowed his conceptions in a remarkable degree in this instance," comments his biographer. They were not materially widened, we may remark, a few years later when he regarded the "Staunch" class of gunboats as a sufficient defence for the Channel ports.

Therefore, as First Sea Lord, upon larger matters of policy, Sir Cooper Key, notwithstanding the most conscientious attention to his duties, proved a failure. The country, if not the Admiralty, was keenly alive to the weakness of our Naval defences in 1884, and when the Government took no step to remedy the crying evil, indignation was loudly expressed, and, in the Navy at least, Sir Cooper Key became extremely unpopular. It was held that he had not used his position to demand a dominant Navy, and he keenly resented the imputation, declaring to Sir Geoffrey Hornby that he had protested against the proposals as insufficient. The pity of it was that he did not enforce his protest by resignation. But, in truth, Sir Cooper Key had no policy. The Admiralty did not know what kind of ships to build, and the First Sea Lord was unable to tell them. Design was unsettled, no doubt, but that the ships of the emergency programme were unsatisfactory does not, as Admiral Colomb seems to argue, absolve from blame those who were then responsible for Naval policy. There was similar hesitancy in the matter of providing breech-loading guns, and Sir Cooper Key took a short-sighted line, though it is true, as his biographer points out, that he had not our modern types of guns before him to guide his judgment. Apart from the highly-interesting historical and practical features of this valuable biography, perhaps the most curious of its attractions is the scope it affords for studying the strange limitations of a singularly acute and vigorous mind, like that of Sir Cooper Key, in the very field where he might have been expected to take a wide outlook and to give the country the benefit of great perspicacity and practical wisdom.

Letters and Papers of Admiral of the Fleet Sir Thos. Byam Martin, G.C.B. Edited by Sir Richard Vesey Hamilton, G.C.B. Vol. II. Printed for the Navy Records Society. 1898. (Subscribers only.)

deciding to produce the second before the first volume of the Letters and Papers of Sir T. Byam Martin. Still, the reason given in the preface, which is that the Admiral's papers for the years 1808-1813 deal with "events on which History has not dealt as fully as it has done with the more brilliant portions of the great war" (sic), has an odd look. If the other volumes contain nothing original, there would seem to be no particular reason for publishing them at all. If they do they might as well have come in their order. Yet it does not greatly matter in this case whether the centre leads into action, or the van or rear (to use a naval figure) of a naval book. We may be satisfied with what we have. The matter of the volume is abundantly interesting. The operations in the Baltic are, perhaps, better known than the editor allows. They are, for example, described by Ross in his life of Saumarez. Still, Captain Martin, as he was in the earlier period, Rear-Admiral Martin as he became later on, played such an active part that his letters are valuable. As much may be said of the later portion of the book which deals with the naval operations on the north coast of Spain during the campaigns of Vittoria and of the Pyrenees. The Admiral's letters throw a good deal of light on a really important part of our world-wide struggle with Napoleon. Sir James Saumarez, with his subordinates, Hood, Keats, Martin, and others, were largely employed in directly or indirectly counteracting the Berlin decrees by which Napoleon strove to exclude our commerce from Europe. They did it by covering the immense smuggling trade we carried on, with the zealous though concealed help of the natives, and in defiance of Napoleon's agents. At the same time they were employed in what may be compendiously described as "keeping up the wicket" by encouraging the French Emperor's enemies, and protecting them whenever they could. The actual fighting done was largely subordinate, though the capture of the Russian liner Levolod and the cutting out affair of Porkola Point were brilliant pieces of work. The task our officers had to do was rather diplomatic than military. The Danes were real enemies, but there was a large element of make believe in our so-called wars with the Swedes and Russians, who were in fact potential allies forced to appear to act against us by the "Corsican tyrant." We cannot speak highly of the editing of these papers; misprints are, indeed, very rare, and every attention has been paid to dates. But much has been included which might have been spared. There are, for instance, many pages of second-hand report of the operations of French, Russian, Austrian, and Prussian armies in 1809 and 1812. A good deal which calls for explanation is left unexplained. For instance, one would like to be told something of the concealed agents of the British Government in Northern Germany to whom Sir Thomas Martin is found sending accounts of the defence of Saragossa and other news likely to prove injurious to Napoleon.

Mr. William O'Connor Morris, whose interest in military and naval history has often been displayed, has written a very good little account of THE GREAT CAMPAIGNS OF NELSON (Blackie, 3s. 6d.), in which he follows Captain Mahan with an exactness that puts his work beyond criticism. His endeavour "to glance at theories as to the impregnability of England, and her absolute safety from invasion," which seem to him "questionable and dangerous, should the nation rely on its maritime power only," can hardly be discussed here; but the intelligent reader will probably find himself quite in accord with the views of Mr. Morris and Captain Mahan.

FOR COLLECTORS.

Books.—Book-collecting, as Carthew's butler used to say of philately, "makes all collectors kin. It's a bond, Sir; it creates a bond." From the millionaire who walks into Mr. Quaritch's shop with a liberal cheque-book, down to the impecunious book-hunter for whom the ardour of the chase has to be its own reward, all devotees of the Goddess whom Dibdin worshipped will take an interest in the very readable little book THE

ROMANCE OF BOOK COLLECTING (Stock, 5s.), in which Mr. J. H. Slater has found a recreation from his severer bibliographical labours. Mr. Slater begins with a dissertation on the utility of catalogues, and goes on to a subject with which no man should be better qualified to deal—a comparison of the modern prices of various classes of books with those shown in historic book sales. One's mouth waters as one reads his chapter of lucky finds; how one envies, for instance, that Melbourne gentleman—

Who only a few months ago picked out of a box labelled "Fourpence each" a first edition of "Sordello," with an inscription in the handwriting of the author himself. Browning had written on the flyleaf, "To my dear friend, R. H. Horne, from R. B.," which, though certainly autographically less important than if he had signed his name in full, is yet a very pretty and cheap souvenir of an eminent poet.

All the same, it was not very nice of the author of the once famous farthing epic to leave his "Sordello" behind him "to the mercies of the Melbourne streets." Are we to gather that he could not understand it? Perhaps the most interesting of Mr. Slater's chapters is that which describes the "Forgotten Lore Society," of which he was a member while it lasted. This was an association formed among bibliophiles "to search the country for neglected books in the hope that something at least might be discovered among the heaps of ancestral rubbish that time and the elements are fast bringing to decay." Each member was assigned a certain portion of the country in which to hunt, with the funds of the society at his back, on the understanding that "any advantage was to accrue to the benefit of the members as a whole." It is interesting to note that the society was an entire failure, and had to be abolished, because its members knew too much of literature and too little of current prices. On "the rules of the chase" and "the vagaries of book-hunters" Mr. Slater writes in a very entertaining manner. Bibliomania, which often shows itself in exceedingly Philistine and illiterate manifestations, has no better justification than in the case of books with a history attached to them, like "the shabby copy of 'The Eve of St. Agnes,' which the luckless half-immortal thrust into his pocket as the Don Juan was sent to the bottom of the Gulf of Genoa." The book of which Charles Lamb "made a perfect wreck," and the volumes of Young, "distinguishable at a glance by the multitude of turned-down leaves," would be dearer to many collectors than the cleanest and tallest of untouched copies. Finally, one reads with a shiver that it is a "most usual thing" for Mr. Slater to receive "a bundle of title-pages as samples of the volumes to which they belong," with a request for information as to their value. And yet people try to persuade us that this is an age of general civilization!

VIOLINS.—The Rev. H. R. Haweis contributes to the "Collector Series" a volume on OLD VIOLINS (Redway, 7s. 6d. n.), in which he discourses pleasantly enough on the history of stringed instruments, the lives of famous makers, the characteristics of their work, the associations of Cremona, Mirecourt, Mittenwald, and Markneukirchen, the long-lost secret of making amber and crimson oil-varnishes, and the humours of the auction room and the dealer's shop. Those whose interest in the subject is only partially awakened will find Mr. Haweis both amusing and stimulating; and if his lively pages bear only too plainly the marks of a desultory habit of mind and an overmastering sense of his own high rank as an authority, he has at least made amends by adding a very good bibliography, and directed his reader to trustworthy sources of information. For the benefit of intending purchasers Mr. Haweis lays down two rules. The first is "never buy a fiddle at the owner's valuation." To follow this rule would be to lose almost every opportunity of acquiring a really good instrument. Such instruments are almost always bought up by dealers of high reputation and abundant capital, and after being put in order are offered for sale, with a warranty, at what is practically a fixed price. In nine cases out of ten he who aspires to the possession of a Stradivari is confronted with Hobson's choice—he must either give the dealer what the dealer asks, or abandon all hope of the coveted prize. Good instruments, nevertheless, are occasionally to be bought at auctions ; and here Mr. Haweis' second golden rule comes in.

If you buy at auction, always go a few pounds better than the highest bid offered by a dealer, and if you win you will be in luck.

Does not Mr. Haweis know that dealers who find themselves somewhat overstocked, and wish to turn their capital over more quickly than can be done by waiting in the shop for customers, will sometimes send instruments, a few at a time, to the auction room? Here, in effect, the reader is advised to walk straight, with his eyes wide open, into what was once a very common trap for novices. Better counsel would be: Cease bidding the moment you see a respectable dealer, who always has a long purse, pertinaciously bidding against you. You will get the instrument more cheaply by letting him buy it, and giving him a fair profit on his purchase. Mr. Haweis' pages show a good many misprints and inaccuracies. Thus, in his alphabetical list of makers we read :

"HAMMIG, W. H. Leipzig, tenth century ; good work."

And a few pages further :

"Orro, Carl Christian, second son of J. A. Otto, 1792 ; Halle ; repairs old instruments."

If Carl Otto at the age of 106 is still repairing old instruments, we can only say that he "goes thirteen years better," as Mr. Haweis would put it, than Stradivari himself, who is said to have made a fiddle with his own hands at the age of ninety-three. The best things in the book are the collotype illustrations, which include a remarkably fine specimen of Maggini, the Queen's Amati tenor, Paganini's Joseph Guarnerius, and the group of Stradivari instruments belonging to Dr. C. E. Oldham of Brighton

ANTIQUES.—Mrs. Andrew Lang's translation of Count Michael Tyskiewicz's MEMORIES OF AN OLD COLLECTOR (Longmans, 6s.) is full of interest to the lover of art, especially, perhaps, to such as are at once connoisseur and plutocrat. M. de Tyskiewicz was, as is well known, a fortunate collector of the antique, and he tells most pleasant memories of his victories as well as of his occasional failures and mistakes. He is, too, very candid, and many of the secrets of that prison house of æsthetic treasure, the British Museum, are laid bare for our edification.

In his green youth Count Michael Tyskiewicz had a passion for antique engraved jewels, and bought from Alessandro Castellani, who was himself new to that branch of fine art dealing, a collection of these gems costing £5,000. After a time two-thirds of them proved to be modern, and soon they were resold to Castellani for one-fourth the original price. Later Castellani took out the palpably false gems, left the doubtful, added some new, and sold the lot to the British Museum. This transaction appears to have been one of the Count's great lessons. The story of the recovery of the bronze Hercules originally found at Foligno, in various pieces, shows how an apt pupil grew into that most sagacious being, the wise collector. He gathered each part of this Hercules from diverse people and places, and eventually sold it to Napoleon III., through whose hands it found its way to the Louvre. Mrs. Lang gives various reproductions of works of art at one time in the Count's collection, in the selection of which she has received the help of Mr. A. S. Murray, of the British Museum. Of the nine designs seven are from originals in the Great Russell-street collections, and of these the Bosco Reale silver bust of Antonia and the bronze figure from the Lake Bracciano are most interesting in themselves and by reason of their histories. About the original of another illustration—the Græco-Phœnician earring—there hangs a delightful drama, in which the wit of a Rothschild is pitted against the acumen of the famous Castellani ; the Rothschild won and the "Memories" will tell you how.

ARMOUR.—Mr. Starkie Gardner's volume, ARMOUR IN ENGLAND (Seeley, 9s. n.), is divided into two monographs, the first on English work and the second on foreign armour in England. The historical part at the beginning is addressed rather to intending collectors than to those who are already equipped for the struggle. But to informed and novice alike the chapters dealing with the Britons, the mailed warrior, the transition period (1272-1399), and the age of plate armour, up to the time of enrichment beginning with Edward VI., will be of great value. Mr. Gardner's book deals very fully with that engrossing period after 1512 when armour became overlain with ornament and grew to importance as the basis of a decorative art. The utilitarian days were over at last. In the long struggle between armour and arms, the latter had conquered and neither mail nor plate was any longer of value in war. Then was the period of ostentatious display, and magnificent armour became the only wear. Henry VIII., Philip of Spain, the favourites of Elizabeth have bequeathed armour which enables us to judge of their taste and their passion for personal decoration. Mr. Gardner's chapters on the great period, artistically speaking, of armour are made more valuable by the coloured reproduction of designs from the Jacobe Album in the art library at South Kensington, which has helped to identify many of the original wearers of the present extant specimens of Tudor armour. This book once formed part of the Harleian Library ; it was lost for a time and discovered again by Baron de Casson, the well-known collector, in Paris ; it was sold at the Spitzer sale, acquired by M. Stein, and eventually bought by the South Kensington Museum. The second part of the work gives an excellent account of the foreign armour in England, showing what admirable work was accomplished in Germany and Italy—at Milan especially—at Innsbrück, Augsburg, Nuremberg, and, in less degree, Florence, Brescia, and Venice. England did not produce much, owing partly to the fact that the country was governed by Queens at the time when enriched armour reached its culminating point of grandeur. Mr. Gardner gives some words of warning :—

Concerning the history of the vast bulk of the armour that falls into the possession of the collector, all is speculation, and its very nationality, perhaps, matter of conjecture. The place whence it has come is often purposely concealed by the dealer, and a legend concocted to invest it with a higher market value.

A chapter on firearms and gunlocks, by Major V. A. Farquharson, at the end of the volume, is, like the rest of the book, admirably illustrated.

CHINESE PORCELAIN.—Mr. W. G. Gulland's efforts to produce a handbook for the use of those who ride their hobby in pursuit of the wares of old Nankin have proved successful. In his work, CHINESE PORCELAIN (Chapman and Hall, 10s. 6d.), he has formed an invaluable guide to the collector :—

We are very much in the dark as yet on many points [says Mr. Gulland] and cannot determine with certainty the age of much of the china we possess. However, we will find less difficulty, and perhaps more amusement, in studying the motives we see thereon, as also in discovering the purposes for which the various shapes were originally designed. The more we understand our china, the better we shall like it and value it.

It is in this catholic spirit that the author attacks his subject ; to give us more pleasure in our china he explains technical terms, expounds the symbols and charms of the East, and sketches, in an informatory way, the entire history of Chinese porcelain, at least from the Ming dynasty (1368-1644) until the present time. In doing this is shown the influence which religion—Taoism, Buddhism, Mahomedanism, and even Christianity—have had, and the effect of the drama, poetry, and romance upon the ceramic art of China. In 1280 Marco Polo saw porcelain made in China and stated that it was sent all over the world ; but it is not until the time of our Queen Elizabeth that we can find any trace of authentic pieces of the Ming dynasty in England. The name of the ware was given it by the Portuguese, because the polished surface was like that of the cowrie shell—known as porcella, or little hog. Mr. Gulland gives 485 illustrations from carefully-printed photographs. These, of course, lack colour, which it has been found too costly to reproduce. Many of the examples are of great beauty ; among the more unusual are some of the "Jesuit china" produced under the influence of the Society of Jesus. In one plate given, the motive is the Crucifixion, apparently a copy of some majolica plate supplied by the Fathers. In the British Museum there are one or two examples of this influence of Christianity, but they are of little value from the decorative point of view. The Eastern is always at his worst when he copies the art of the West.

The collector will learn in this volume all about the various attempts made in Japan, France, and other countries to imitate Nankin. On this subject Mr. T. J. Larkin, who adds many valuable notes, says :—

The Chinese are engaged at the present day in making desperate efforts to imitate every class of old porcelain prized by themselves, and amateurs have to be on their guard against these.

But, as he says in effect elsewhere, imitation is carried out in every branch of art, and it is this very difficulty of distinguishing between the spurious and the true which helps to make the pride of the connoisseur. Mr. Gulland adds a useful chapter on decorating with china, at present an art too little practised. His main advice is ;—avoid mixing your polychrome with your blue and white, see that the background is suitable, avoid combinations with heavily-framed oil painting. With Mr. Gulland's book to guide him, no amateur of Chinese ceramics need fall a victim to the sellers of the sham antique.

PHILOSOPHY.

My Inner Life: a Chapter in Personal Evolution and Autobiography. By John Beattie Crozier. 9×5½in., 562 pp. London, 1898. Longmans. 14/-

In a book chiefly concerned with Mr. Herbert Spencer's philosophy, Mr. Crozier acts upon Mr. Spencer's dictum that each man should utter that which he thinks the highest truth, because his opinion is a unit of force, constituting, with other such units, the general power which works out social changes. In other and older words, a man must not hide his talent in the earth. But Mr. Crozier's book needs no sort of justification. It exhibits, with the utmost frankness and simplicity, the mental struggles of a man who "faced the spectres of the mind, and laid them," till he came at length not to orthodoxy, nor, indeed, to any definite religious belief, but to principles from which some kind of rudimentary religious belief is deducible. The unsympathetic reader will not realize the importance of this apparently small result; but to Mr. Crozier, a free thinker, untouched by Christian theology, it was as the recovery of a lost ideal, almost as the recognition at last of angel faces which he had "loved long since and lost awhile." Previously, he had discovered no flaw in what he calls Mr. Spencer's pure and undiluted materialism, though he had spent years in the attempt to escape from it. It loomed large in his view, and oppressed his imagination as a compact and impregnable edifice, "a great granite pile sunk deep on the bed-rock of the world," from which it was impossible to dislodge one single stone. It was only after a long study of ancient and modern thinkers of all schools that he was led, by an ingenious and penetrating argument, to deny the sufficiency of Mr. Spencer's method, and of science itself, as an organon, that is, in the explanation of the problem of existence. His present position, which it is not easy to define, seems to be that of agnostic theism—agnostic in the main, although his acknowledgment of a deity, and of a human conscience, or "scale in the mind," almost necessarily involves further and more precise inferences. He does not, it is true, use the word "conscience," but his "scale in the mind"—the measure of quality and of what is "high" or "low"—is, to all intents and purposes, a conscience and a sense of right and wrong. It is just one of those philosophical expressions that may be translated, without violence, into the terms of religion; and it is full of suggestions that belong rather to religion than philosophy. Mr. Crozier, then, has probably reached, not the end of his journey, but only a halting-place. He has circumvented the great boulder of materialism that barred his progress, and now moves along a happier path—moves, for no thinker can say to his mind, "Thus far, and no farther."

Rarely have we seen so candid a disclosure of the inner life of any one, or so pleasing and unaffected a study of an inquiring mind. The genuine mental distress caused by some phases of Mr. Crozier's speculations is recorded, but not emphasized. There is no deadly combat with Giant Despair, but only a perpetual effort to find a weak place in his armour, and only a modest triumph afterwards. In short, the temper of the book is as admirable as its style. The story of the author's early days as a schoolboy and student in Canada, the account of the Presbyterian Sabbath, and the episode, delightful but irrelevant, of Uncle James, are marked by frequent touches of comedy. But in the whole autobiography, the whole situation, the whole sincere and unpretentious search for truth, will be found delicate humour and unconscious irony. It seemed natural enough to Mr. Crozier, as a young man, to ignore Christianity, his experiences of which had not been favourable; but it was intolerable to be pulled up in the midst of his intellectual career by the dead wall of materialism. There was nothing for it then but to search for the Lost Ideal, and to become a knight errant, like Don Quixote, or those who sought the Holy Grail. From this point it becomes a story of intellectual adventure, of seeking for truth in science and philosophy, often where it was not particularly likely to be found. It is not surprising to learn that ancient philosophers and modern metaphysicians were in vain, and that Mr. Spencer's doctrines remained unshaken in all their awful significance. Finally the "Poetic Thinkers," such as Bacon, Goethe, Carlyle, Emerson, and Newman, though none of them commanded Mr. Crozier's entire assent, supplied him with the desired clue, and enabled him to achieve his object, he being then 29 years old. Then came various painful experiences with editors, publishers, and critics; failure at first, and, after a good many years, a well-deserved reputation. Mr. Crozier has written other books, as every one knows; but the Autobiography, now complete as far as it goes, was always the child of his heart. Undoubtedly, it pleases by virtue of its style, its literary judgments, its originality, its candour, and its simplicity. Its philosophical conclusions are stated none too clearly, but one cannot fail to be impressed by the author's courageous independence, and his persistent wrestling with intellectual troubles. He himself seems to fear that others will not follow in his footsteps, that serious inquiries no longer interest people as they did in his younger days. "The only form of serious work," he says, "which still flourishes is the purely scientific." If so, we can only urge that the present generation has much to digest and assimilate, and that a period of rest may be necessary. But, as the explanation of the universe has been the sole object of philosophers ever since the time of Thales, we may expect the pertinacious human mind not to run away after knocking at the door, but to stay for an answer.

In his sketch of THOMAS REID in the Famous Scots Series (Oliphant, 1s. 6d.) Dr. Campbell Fraser, the veteran editor of Locke and Berkeley, has paid a fitting tribute to a sound and earnest thinker of the eighteenth century. Our generation has still something to learn from Thomas Reid. Writing before Kant appeared upon the field, he formulated an answer to the fashionable scepticism of his time, which, if less daring and suggestive than Kant's, is also less paradoxical and, as far as it goes, more helpful to faith and common sense. Dr. Fraser presents his author's views and their relation to contemporary thought briefly but forcibly, and, in the biographical part, has enriched his book with much unpublished material, which helps to give a pleasing picture of a diligent and blameless life.

Dr. Sidis' PSYCHOLOGY OF SUGGESTION (New York: Appleton, $1.75) is an interesting and original study of those strange phenomena of hypnotism and subconsciousness which have now passed securely from the domain of quackery to that of science. He defines suggestion as "the intrusion into the mind of an idea; met with more or less opposition by the person; accepted uncritically at last; and realized unreflectively, almost automatically." All men are, it seems, more or less "suggestible"; while a few, the "subjects" of hypnotic séances, are suggestible in a high degree. In ordinary life the conscious and the subconscious self are indistinguishably combined, but by hypnotism we can make, as it were, a split between them. During the hypnotic trance the operator gets hold, so to speak, of the subconscious self, and implants therein ideas which are automatically carried into execution when the patient is awakened. The author has a chapter on the great and absorbing problem of personality. These new investigations, it seems, in opposition to the views of anti-metaphysical psychologists like Professor William James, lead us back to the old view that self-consciousness is the central point of personality. The last part of the book deals with the psychology of the crowd. Crowds are suggestible as men are suggestible, and this is the secret of the success of stump-orators and emotional revivalists. From this standpoint Dr. Sidis explains, while he ridicules, the religious crazes and financial panics of modern America and popular delusions like demoniacal possession and the fear of witches in the Middle Ages.

In contrast to the foregoing, Dr. Schofield's work, THE UNCONSCIOUS MIND (Hodder and Stoughton, 7s. 6d.), is one of no great pretension. Its object is to set forth, in a popular form, the nature of unconscious mind in man, and the value of a study of it in regard to such important matters as education and health. The work is mainly a compilation, and in many parts, as the author himself remarks, "appears to be little more than a collection of extracts." Where he does write with the freshness of personal contact is on the medical side of the subject. His professional experience has suggested to him many interesting reflections on faith-healing on the one hand, and the power of frightening oneself into an illness on the other. There is a decided vein of mysticism in the book, as when we read that the recognition of the unconscious mind gives us the key to the moral and spiritual world, "showing where our highest spirit life and moral sense dwells, and whence proceeds the voice of conscience and, shall we say, of God." It is amusing to contrast Dr. Sidis' pronounced remarks on the "brutal nature" of the subconscious self with Dr. Schofield's conviction that in that self lie "mental faculties, deeper, wider, loftier, truer" than anything we have in the conscious life. The author is wrong in supposing that the unconscious mind is a neglected topic. There is no province of psychology where so much original work is being done. As tending to popularize this study Dr. Schofield's book is not unseasonable at the present time.

In attempting to write an account of the PHILOSOPHY OF GREECE CONSIDERED IN RELATION TO THE CHARACTER AND HISTORY OF ITS PEOPLE (Grant Richards, 6s.) within the compass of 300 pages Mr. A. W. Benn has set himself a task which could only be accomplished successfully by a man of genius. Renan could have done it; but men of Renan's peculiar gifts are scarce in France, and in England perhaps scarcer still. It is no reproach to any one that he is not a man of genius, and so it is not a serious reproach to Mr. Benn that his arduous effort is not entirely successful. In the first place, his style and handling are more suitable to his previous big two-volumed work on the "Greek Philosophers" than to this short sketch of Greek philosophy. It is overburdened with "isms" and "ologies," which are likely to deter the general reader, while the special student will prefer a more thorough treatise. We may, however, be thankful that he has not allowed himself to be dominated by any barren abstract antithesis such as that of subjective and objective, and has not tried to force all his facts to suit some a priori scheme. He has really tried to see the facts for what they are and has illustrated the philosophy of the nation in an intelligent way from its art and literature. Nor is his central conception ill-chosen. Sophrosyne, or self-knowledge with self-control, is, he tells us, the key to Greek life and thought. But one would like to know, what Mr. Benn does not fully tell us, how the Greeks chanced upon so happy a conception. Apart from this, there are grave omissions in the matter of the book. The city-system, slavery, and the subjection of women were the three dominating conditions of Greek life. To the first the author accords some recognition, to the others none at all. Yet, without them, how can we understand Greek thought, more especially in its difference from the thought of the modern world?

In his setting forth of Leibniz's MONADOLOGY (Clarendon Press, 8s. 6d.) Mr. Robert Latta modestly assumes the part of an editor rather than an author, though his original contributions form more than half the book. It consists of a long introduction containing a biography of Leibniz, followed by a sketch of his general principles, a detailed statement of his system, and an account of its sources and of its influence upon his philosophic successors. Following the "Monadology" are translated portions of Leibniz's other writings illustrating various points of interest. For the way Mr. Latta has performed his task we have nothing but praise. The translation is admirably done. Its conscientiousness and felicity show that it was really a labour of love. The notes are helpful, the introduction most lucidly and happily expressed. In short, any one who is interested in Leibniz has now the opportunity of mastering his philosophy with the minimum of trouble. For Leibniz, unhappily, left no complete exposition of his system. It has to be pieced together from a multiplicity of sources, including letters, essays, and occasional papers like the "Monadology," which was a short statement prepared for the use of the famous soldier Prince Eugene. Leibniz's main interest lies, perhaps, in what Kant afterwards made a matter of accusation against him — viz., that he "intellectualized phenomena." The great anthropocentric revolution in philosophy, of which Kant himself is the protagonist, owed much in its earlier stages to Leibniz. Previous thinkers had regarded matter as essentially antithetical to thought. He saw that it must be viewed as essentially of the nature of mind, and the theory of Monads is a bold constructive attempt to show how this is possible. Leibniz's idealism was the culmination of the great philosophic movement of the later seventeenth century; after his death followed the trough of the wave. The next crest comes a century later with Kant and Hegel. Nearly a century has passed again since then, and idealism is reviving once more on the growing hand. That is why our interest in Leibniz is more than the interest of history.

In Mr. E. P. Evans' EVOLUTIONAL ETHICS AND ANIMAL PSYCHOLOGY (New York: Appleton, $1.75) we have another popular book whose main object is to plead for the better treatment of animals. The higher they are in the scale, he argues, the stronger claims they have to kind and considerate treatment. Moral progress has meant the extension of moral obligations to a progressively wider circle. Let us, therefore, argues the author, make the moral circle wider still by including the higher animals in it. On the subject of animal psychology Mr. Evans tries to show that the stiff line of demarcation which theologians and philologists like Max Müller have tried to draw between animals and mankind has no real existence. He touches on a great variety of questions—whether animals have a conscience, whether they reason, whether they can talk, and whether they have the sentiment of religion. He deals with them all in a chatty, unsystematic way which is not unpleasant and which puts no great strain on one's intellect or attention.

Mr. Carveth Read's LOGIC: DEDUCTIVE AND INDUCTIVE (Grant Richards, 6s.) is a useful class-book, drawn mainly from standard authorities and supplemented by the author's own practical experience in teaching. The style is bright and the illustrations are copious and happy. Strange as it may seem with so old-established a study, there are not too many good helps to logic. Students and teachers will welcome this well-arranged and trustworthy compendium.

Another well-arranged work of the same scope is Professor J. E. Creighton's INTRODUCTORY LOGIC (Macmillan, 5s. n.), which, as he tells us, has grown out of his lectures to undergraduate classes at Cornell University. In the part dealing with formal logic Professor Creighton's book is not so rich in elaborate technical detail as Mr. Carveth Read's. On the other hand, he has carried his treatment rather further by including chapters on the philosophy of knowledge, the main results of which are inspired by recent idealist logicians like Messrs. Bosanquet and F. H. Bradley.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

THE LIFE STORY OF THE LATE SIR CHARLES TILSTON BRIGHT is told by his brother, Edward Brailsford Bright, and his son, Charles Bright, in two volumes (Constable, 63s. n.). Born in 1832, Charles Bright, after a brief career at Merchant Taylors', entered the service of the Electric Telegraph Company at the early age of fifteen. At twenty he became chief engineer to the Magnetic Telegraph Company, extending its lines throughout the United Kingdom, connecting England and Ireland by telegraph for the first time, and laying the foundation of modern telegraphy in a patent containing four and twenty distinct inventions. At twenty-three Bright became, in conjunction with Cyrus Field and John Watkins Brett, an Atlantic Telegraph projector, and when only twenty-four years old he was appointed chief engineer to the undertaking. At twenty-six he had achieved the great work of his life; on August 5, 1858, England and America were electrically connected. There is but one Atlantic to bridge, and by the side of that stupendous feat the work which filled up the remainder of Bright's short life sounds tame, though for most of us to have played the paramount part in electrically connecting England with India or in laying the submarine cable network which placed the West Indian islands in communication with one another and with the rest of the world, would be in our own estimation an altogether sufficient claim to relative immortality. Bright lived in the heroic days of telegraphy: when to the world at large, and, indeed, to most of its devotees, it was a mysterious cult: when there were still worlds to conquer, seas and oceans to bridge, and giants were needed: when everything was yet to learn and no one felt like the Irishman "altogether bothered for want of preliminary information."

The theme is therefore intrinsically interesting; so is the individual; have the writers succeeded in arousing a corresponding interest in the minds of the readers of their story? To those connected with telegraphy the life-story of Sir Charles Tilston Bright, which has been compiled by his brother and by his son, will doubtless be of value, if only on account of the mass of detailed information which it contains. To the non-technical reader, however, who merely wishes to get some idea of the living personality of the great telegraph engineer and some idea of the technical value of his achievements, we are afraid the twelve hundred stodgy pages prepared for them will prove anything but attractive. The authors have an inexhaustible fondness for unnecessary footnotes and appendices; the latter cover no fewer than 330 pages of small print, including more than fifty pages of obituary notices! Throughout the work there is a constant intrusion of uninteresting detail about irrelevant individuals, and even in regard to Sir Charles Bright himself we scarcely want to know that "on his way to Marseilles he spent a pleasant day in Paris, staying at the Grand Hotel," or that on his return "Sir Charles journeyed direct to Paris, which he left the same day by the tidal train for home." In short, a reader of these two ponderous volumes will learn but little about Sir Charles Bright himself, though he may learn much with regard to his friends and relations. It only remains to be said that the book is well illustrated.

LE DIX-HUITIÈME SIECLE: LES MŒURS, LES ARTS, LES IDEES, RECITS ET TMOIGNAGES CONTEMPORAINS (Hachette, 40f.).

The eighteenth century in France Michelet called the "great age." The Goncourts revealed to their compatriots the charm and variety which render the eighteenth century "great" in another sense—namely, in its art. The book which heads this article is the confirmation of the fine perspicacity of the Goncourts. It is, as it were, a gallery of beautiful relics of that exquisite moment of French civilization. Some 600 engravings, set in an adequate text, recall the chief episodes, names, and products of the art of the period. The anonymous author makes no pretensions of being a learned or original writer. He is rather an extremely well-informed cicerone who has read Duclos and Besenval, and Mme. Campan and the other memorialists, and having, therefore, on the tip of his tongue some of the most amusing anecdotes with which these authors abound, uses them to enliven his explanations as he leads us through the unrivalled collection of documents which his publishers have put at his disposal. What matters it that some of these anecdotes must be taken cum grano salis? They are, at all events, about real people, and they introduce to us their portraits, the old prints in which we behold them at the ball, views of battlefields where they rally round the fascinating figure of Maurice de Saxe, glimpses of old Paris and Versailles, sieges and marriages and theatrical performances, dresses, beds, chairs, necklaces, watches, fans, in fact all the tender intimacies and graces of the life of the salon, the pictures that hang on the walls, the statues that gleam in the gardens, the—but why continue the enumeration? It is enough to say that this volume, prepared in so superior a manner by Hachette, offers the very quintessence of the crowded century which extends from the funeral procession of Louis XIV. to the first days of the Revolution. An evening spent in turning the spacious leaves of this book will give the reader an acquaintance with the period completer and more lasting than if he were to spend months in perusal of the classics.

DR. SOUTHWOOD SMITH (Blackwood, 6s.) is a pious memoir of a man who laboured earnestly and successfully to put an end to the horrors of the "factory system" in England. The citizens of Muggleton, who viewed the slave trade abroad with a righteous horror, petitioned against any interference with the factory system at home, and Mrs. C. L. Lewes, who has written this account of her grandfather, has done well to remind us of the difficulties and the opposition encountered by those who desired to mitigate the misery of the factory slaves.

BOOKS OF REFERENCE.—"The unceasing influence of births, marriages, and deaths among several thousand individuals," says the editor of the new edition for 1899 of DOD'S PEERAGE, BARONETAGE, AND KNIGHTAGE (Sampson Low, 10s. 6d.), "with the constant flow of promotion in the Naval and Military forces of the Crown, have produced their usual striking effects." Their failure to do so would certainly have perplexed social philosophers throughout the world. The changes thus brought about necessitate the new issue of "Dod"—that admirable and handy work of reference. BURKE'S PEERAGE (Harrison, 38s.) is, of course, less handy, but more imposing, and maintains its high standard of accuracy. The editor abstains from expressing any opinion on such vexed questions as that of the honour due respectively to baronets and the children of life peers. DEBRETT'S PEERAGE (Dean, 31s. 6d.), on the contrary—as usual a marvel of exhaustive information in small compass—adds to its usual attractions an eloquent and impressive discussion of this point, and ingeniously indicates a line of policy by which "in all probability much friction with the baronets might have been avoided." There is also a certain amount of controversial matter in Mr. John Lane's preface to the thirty-fifth edition of Herbert Fry's ROYAL GUIDE TO THE LONDON CHARITIES (Chatto and Windus, 1s. 6d.). Nearly all the charitable institutions, it appears, did rather badly in 1898: and the editor attributes the circumstance to "the interest taken in the Prince of Wales' Fund." However that may be, the fact remains that there is a certain amount of philanthropic lee-way to be made up, and amateur philanthropists need wish for no better guide than this little book in deciding as to whom to make cheques payable.

Among my Books.

THE WELL OF PURE ENGLISH.

Most book lovers, however catholic their general tastes may be, will be found to have a few special favourites—a special bed, as it were, divided off from the rest of the garden, which they admire above all others, and to which, when zest in other things flags, they can turn with never-failing interest and delight. To some this may be a particular vein of poetry, to others ancient balladry, mystical writings, fables, or even the collection of proverbs. It is rare to be introduced to a real library, as distinguished from a mere heap of books, without finding a little nook somewhere consecrated to a treasury of this sort. I confess myself to having such a playtime collection—one which is a perennial source of pleasure when the brain has sickened a little, as it sometimes will, of other food. To say that this little garden of delight is composed of dictionaries will, to many, savour of the absurd; and yet I can recommend my hobby as one full of pleasures and surprises, as well as of profit. I should explain, however, that when I speak of dictionaries I include glossaries, dialect books, and, in fact, almost anything that has to do with words—those coins in the realm of thought that are for ever coming and going, now in the fashion and now out, lost may be for a time, then found again, and once more put in circulation.

Additions are continually being made to our linguistic store, partly from what we may call the chance coinage of the street—words that come up as slang, that are eyed askance for a time, but which, from some truthfulness of ring or picturesqueness of impress, gradually commend themselves to the general taste, and so are admitted citizens of the republic. Partly, also, we gather from foreign tongues: whence, with much that we could do well without, we have adopted such useful vocables as entourage, prestige, hinterland, and the like. The last-named acquisition, however, is so English in its components as to be practically but a readmission. By the change of a soft into a hard consonant we have “hinder,” as in “hinder-most,” “hinder-end,” and the Scottish “hinder-night,” yesternight. In Berner’s “Froissart” we read of “the hynder-train of the Scottes,” and when I was a boy the farmers talked of the hinder horse and the hinder season, known also as the “backend” of the year.

Occasionally, too, we get a word back into our literary vocabulary from those “pure wells of English,” the provincial dialects. There was a time when it was considered bad taste, if not actually bad manners, to use a dialect word. Nay, there are even persons who still hold it vulgar to employ a word that is not to be found in a shilling dictionary: as witness the critic who recently put his taboo on “pack,” used in the sense of Shakespeare’s—

“He cannot live, I hope, and must not die, Till George be pack’d with post horse up to heaven.”

“Truly,” remarked this high-minded purist, “Tennyson makes use of the word in one of his poems; but as he puts it into the mouth of a drunken man, he thereby stamps it as vulgar.” How much our English has suffered from these pocket-dictionary people! In the course of my reading for some years past I have been in the habit of jotting down the words and phrases that have been objected to by reviewers or others. It is a curious list, and includes such locutions as, lungeous, churlish, frounce, nesh, scientist, gabbed, weatherly, win out, clem, threap, gear, force (waterfall), chuck, threatful, quick (alive), clip, and the like.

One need not be surprised at the questioning of such provincial survivals as “frounce,” “gab,” and “threap,” although they are all to be found in our old writers; but it is curious to note that while the phrase “a chuck under the chin” readily passes muster, “chuck out” is boggled at as being vulgar. Both “nesh” and “clem” had by this time, one would think, been admitted to full literary citizenship. George Eliot frequently uses the first; and if up to the time of the great Cotton Famine “clem” was a provincialism confined to Lancashire and the adjoining counties it was surely advanced to general acquaintance and acknowledgment by Lord Derby in the famous speech he made at Liverpool on the distress amongst the cotton-workers occasioned by the American Civil War. Even if they had no descent to fall back upon, such expressive words ought to prove an acceptable addition to the literary language. But both find a place in our old literature. In Ben Jonson’s “Poetaster,” we have: “What, will he clem me and my followers?” And in nearly all the older writers we meet with “nesh” (soft, weak) sometimes spelled “ness,” as in Northgate (sermon on Matthew xxiv. 43) where we have “zofthede and nesshede.”

The same is true of “frounce,” “threap,” “quick,” “gab,” and “clip,” the first two in common use in the North, and particularly in East Yorkshire, the others nearly all over the country. To “frounce” signifies to wrinkle the brow, as in frowning or scowling, and is so employed by Gower:

With that sche frounceth up the brow,
This covenant y wille allowe.

“Threap” appears originally to have had the meaning of to call, and appears in that sense in Chaucer. But it had also the meaning of obstinately insisting upon a thing in contradiction to another, as “He threaped me down it was as he said,” in which signification it is still encountered in Lincolnshire and Yorkshire. In the sense of contradiction we meet with it in the fourteenth-century alliterative poem on the “Deluge,” where we read, in the account of those who were to go into the Ark,

Thy three sons withouten threp, and her (their) three wives.

“Gab” was a word of great import in the olden time, and, as we know, is still used in the vernacular in the sense of idle talking and boasting. John Wyclif poured the vials of his wrath upon the bad habit it marked—gabbing, that is, jesting and lying. Possibly from “gab” the French derived their gobe-mouche, as we our “gaby,” both signifying much the same thing. While “gab” may not be a great loss to the language, such words as “clip” are. Clip is distinctly better and more expressive than embrace. We see the strength and beauty of it in such phrases as, "and kest hit and clipped, and oft Crist thonkes" (from "William and the Werwolf").

In the same category I would put such words as "cree," to seethe, used chiefly in regard to grain, as rice and wheat (in making fermenty, for instance); "clatch," a brood of chickens (applied in ornithology, in the form of "clutch," to a nest of eggs); "garth," a yard or garden (one has heard it rather finely used as "dead-garth," for churchyard); "addle," to earn, &c. As to "addle," I remember once bringing it into a sketch of an old stone-breaker in the sentence, "I'll mebbe addle a shiner" (the man's own phrase). I was asked by the editor what it meant, and when the paper containing the piece came out I found, to my horror, that he had substituted the bald everyday English, "I shall perhaps earn a shilling," for my bit of sparkling vernacular.

That is the way our noble language has been clipped and starved—too often by men who, one is apt to think, got their English, as Chaucer's Prioress learned her French, at Stratford-atte-Bow. In sober truth, literary English has in the past suffered greatly at the hands of Cockney editors and publishers. What was not current in London circles was held to be bad English. Thus we have lost hundreds—nay, thousands—of expressive words and idioms that could ill be spared.

Here is an instance in point. A teacher in a Lancashire school, who was giving his class an object-lesson on fires, asked the youngsters what they would do if their home caught alight. One boy replied that he would run for the "degging-can." Said the teacher: "Do you mean a watering can?" The lad said he did. "Then why don't you say so?" returned the pedant. "Degging-can is vulgar." Now "degging-can" is a very striking compound, the first part of it connected with "dag" (Danish), dew, and probably related to "dank," moist. It used to be common twenty years ago to hear Lancashire people speak of "degging" the garden when they meant watering it. Possibly it may be common yet; but one fears that both this word and others like it will soon be stamped out by the pedagogue of the Board school.

It is not the whole of the evil that this word or that is lost, but the "heart" of the language is taken out of it, as Surrey labourers say of the land when everything possible is got from it and nothing put back. The other day a man was turning up a piece of heavy ground and throwing manure into it as he went along. "Ah," said he, "this is the stuff to quicken it!" He meant, of course, to put life into it (from "quick," or "wick," as they have it in the North, alive, living). I once heard a housewife bid her maid "quick" a dead fire with a few sticks. So in Chaucer we read:

As fyr is wont to quikke and go
From a sparke spronge amis
Til all a citee brent up is.

These I hold to be fine and expressive uses of a word that, so far as our literary language is concerned, has become a fossil, being confined to the phrase "the quick and the dead." Many similar instances could be cited in which, amongst farmers, labourers, and others of their class, words are still malleable on their tongues. Though their vocabulary is often extremely limited, it is composed of living materials; and many a word that has become stereotyped in polite speech can be used by them either as a verb or noun, adjective or adverb. As an instance in point, let us take "clarty," a word often heard north of the Humber. It means sticky, also messy. Wet clay is "clarty" stuff, and a child may "clart" itself all over with it. Gum or paste is "clart"; you may "clart" paper on the wall with either; and I once heard a man say of a youth who had got guttapercha soles to his shoes, which were softening on the hot pavement, "How clertily he goes!"

Many such vocables went over to America with the Pilgrim Fathers and other emigrants, and have found their way back to the old home as a surprise. Examples are to hand in "betterment," recently returned, one hopes, to remain; "fall," a word that never went out of use, in the North at least, and is often heard in the beautiful variation, "the fall of the leaf;" "to heft," &c. In New England stories we frequently meet with "chores," another form of our "char," seen also in "charwoman"; and not long ago I had a chat with an American lady who came out with the word "menseful." It gave one a delightful sensation to hear it, for it is a word with a history, and ought not to be let die. I never heard it anywhere but in the East Riding, and it was always applied to a garment that was still wear-worthy both for the back and the eye; and it was in this sense, namely of "graceful," "becoming," that the American lady used it. Our friends across the Border still have "mense," worthiness. The word comes from the Anglo-Saxon "mennisc," human, and it is to be met with in many an old author in the sense of grace, favour, as, for instance, in "William of Palerne," where we read—

The riche emperour of Rome rod out for to hunt
In that faire forest

With alle his menskful meyne, that muche was and nobul.

"Menskful meyne," worshipful company; "meyne" being our "many," originally signifying household; hence company or great gathering. We still hear the illiterate speak of "a many people."

I must call attention to two other striking words, because they are in a sense representative. One of them I have heard from Northants south as far as Berkshire, but have only seen it once in print outside a provincial glossary. I refer to "unked," having the sense of "creepy," "uncanny." It makes you feel "unked" to go through a churchyard at night, and it is a decidedly "unked" sensation that takes possession of you when in a lone house you hear unearthly noises. It has been suggested to me that the dis-syllable may come from the A.S. cythan, to make known, to manifest; and hence "unked" would derive the meaning of something unknown, hidden, strange, and, in its present sense, of uncanny. Something of this unkedness of feeling was once coming over me as I trudged along a North Staffordshire road in the evening time. The weather had been close and heavy all day, and, as dark clouds came up, obscuring the sky, with a sense of thunder about, and the nearest hostelry some miles away, the uneasiness was not without reason. Suddenly a fellow-wayfarer hove in sight from a by-path, and with the greeting "It osses (threatens) for a slobbery onder, sir," passed on his way. Gladness came with the uncouth sentence, for "onder" is a Chaucerian word, to be met with in many old writers; and to have it cast at one thus by way of salutation in that lonesome place was like all at once coming across one of the Canterbury Pilgrims. Curiously enough, being a few evenings later in the town of Leek, I heard a man call to a work-girl across the market-place, "Wheer's te boun?" "To me onders," said she (to my tea). I afterwards learned that the word is in common use in the sense indicated throughout that part of Staffordshire. Halliwell gives it as nearly extinct in Craven, and as used in Cheshire and Shropshire. Cotgrave several times mentions "aunders-meat" as an afternoon refreshment.

As in some of the old stories, the "morril" is "at discretioun." For my own part I would rather have words like "aunders-meat" than "déjeuner à la fourchette," "weritude" than "ennui," &c. I have no objection to words from foreign sources if they fit the need and nothing better is to hand; but it seems a pity to go over-seas for help when we have such quarries at our feet, rich beyond desire, and of the very pith and marrow of our thought.

ALFRED T. STORY.

A RECORD OF CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

The books which for the fortnight before Christmas ensure the retail bookseller his one brief spell of really profitable trading appeal chiefly to the book-buyer who buys only to give away. But for many years past, publishers have shown an increasing inclination to crowd the production not only of these, but of half the books of the year, into the three months from October to December, and in the pause after this outpouring of literature, it is not unnatural to inquire what kind of record is being kept of it.

That the reply is eminently unsatisfactory may perhaps in part be due to the extreme width of meaning attaching to the word bibliography. Such a book-record certainly belongs to bibliography, and if bibliography is flourishing and popular it may be thought that the book-record is naturally being looked to. On the contrary, the pleasant hobby-riders who meet together in bibliographical societies in England and America have concerned themselves very little with any such undertaking. The "Bibliographical Society," par excellence, which has just issued an Annual Report, speaking of a "roll" of members always full and finances eminently prosperous, has never attempted work of this sort. The Monographs, which are its chief publications, relate mostly to printing in the fifteenth century, and, even in the miscellaneous papers which form its "Transactions," the writers seldom come nearer to our own time than 1640. The Edinburgh Bibliographical Society, which, if difficulty of admission is a true test of prosperity, is still more successful, has the same antiquarian interests. Many of its papers relate to early printing, and its chief publications are its two excellent bibliographies of books relating to Mary, Queen of Scots, and the literature of witchcraft. In America, the Grolier Club of New York has issued some pretty reprints, but its "contributions to a bibliography of English literature" have so far only reached "from Langland to Wither." It is a pity that the two British societies have not imitated the Grolier Club by taking names more clearly indicative of their limited ambitions. Perhaps at the outset their aims were more comprehensive, and in the early meetings of the English Bibliographical Society some far-reaching schemes were certainly discussed. Like the Scotch minister in his sermon, the society, having looked the difficulty in the face, may have preferred to say no more about it, and, if so, there is no need to blame it for undue timidity. The cost of a good record of contemporary literature would far exceed the income of a small society, and its compilation would involve much hard and tedious work, by no means of the kind which men undertake gratuitously by way of recreation.

If those who call themselves bibliographers have thus catered chiefly for the wants of antiquaries and collectors, publishers and booksellers have, as a rule, shown no greater public spirit. The records kept in the Publisher's Circular and the English Catalogue, valuable as they are, are necessarily available to only a very limited extent as a subject-index. They contain, also, no analysis of periodical literature, the only annual index to this originating in England being that compiled by Miss Hetherington in connexion with the Review of Reviews. Though the advantage to the trade of bringing under the notice of book-buyers the works published on the subjects in which they are interested might appear self-evident, in practice very little support has been given to efforts in this direction. A pretty little book, recently compiled by Mr. Growoll, on the "Book Trade Bibliography" of the United States, tells a sad tale of the sacrifices at which enthusiasts like Roorbach and Leypoldt have done their work, and in England, within the last year, Mr. Chivers' "Cumulative Subject and Author Index" has been suspended for lack of the support which, despite some imperfections, it certainly deserved.

While bibliographers and publishers are thus indifferent, librarians of late years have shown themselves increasingly anxious to obtain a satisfactory record of the books of the day and their contents. The Transactions of the International Library Conference, held in 1897 at the Guildhall, which were issued to subscribers last autumn, contain many allusions to the subject, and both in England and America there are librarians who practise what they preach. The catalogues of many Free Libraries are admirable examples of the enhanced usefulness which may be given to quite small collections by liberal indexing, while, during his too brief reign at the National Art Library, Mr. Weale raised subject-cataloguing to a fine art. What has been done in small libraries can, though with infinitely greater labour and difficulty, be done in large ones. The printed author-catalogue of the British Museum, once declared an impossibility, is within a few months of completion, and despite the regrettable suspension of its French rival (admirably begun in 1897) during the whole of last year—to which Literature alluded last week—it is impossible to believe that M. Delisle will allow the Bibliothèque Nationale always to lag behind. It is understood that the author-catalogue of the Museum is to be followed by a supplement embodying the accessions to each volume since it was printed off.

No announcement has yet been made as to the taking up, when this supplement has been completed, of a general subject-index, or a series of indexes to special subjects, but it is earnestly to be hoped that the three quinquennial indexes in which, when superintendent of the Reading Room, Mr. Fortescue covered the subject-literature of the years 1880-1895, will be taken as a starting-point for more extended efforts. The three volumes already issued are said to contain upwards of 125,000 entries, and if they do not exhaust every possible subject-heading, at least the experience gained in their compilation must have smoothed the way for future workers. The British Museum already issues, at short intervals, lists of its accessions, arranged under authors and editors, and it is not unreasonable to hope that these may one day be supplemented by similar lists arranged under subjects. If these lists, by means of stereotyping or re-composition, could be re-arranged at the end of each year into two comprehensive alphabets, the problem of a contemporary record of our literature would be solved at once, and solved with the satisfactory addition of a register of all the works published in foreign countries which are thought worthy of being purchased for the national library. Whether the arrears of subject-indexing for the books issued between 1454 and 1880 could be overtaken as satisfactorily as the printed author-catalogue has been carried to completion is a more difficult question. The majority of books so soon become obsolete that for a retrospective subject-index, more especially if the wood is not to be obscured by the multitude of the trees, some principle of selection would probably be found necessary. Many readers would gladly sacrifice a retrospective subject-index altogether for the sake of a contemporary record which should extend not only to books, but to the contents of the unrivalled collection of periodicals which is one of the chief glories of the Museum.

Notes.

In next week's Literature "Among My Books" will be written by Dr. Jessopp.

During 1898 Carlyle's house in Cheyne-row was visited by some 2,000 enthusiasts. So far, the number of visitors has quite justified its being turned into a kind of museum. During the three years it has been open, nearly 10,000 persons have paid for admission. Americans formed a large proportion at first, but of late they have been less numerous.

The dispersion of a library—whether newly formed or not is immaterial—is productive of something more than money and regrets. It has much instruction in it, for the life of a library is the counterpart of that of its founder, and shows the motives that prompted him and the spirit by which he was moved. Year after year some sixty or seventy high-class libraries are sold by auction in London, representing an average value not far short of £100,000, an amount which testifies to the expense and to the labour involved in their formation, for books are now seldom bought by the ton or the yard. The year that has just closed shows no striking variation in any of the rules that shape the ends of the nineteenth-century bookman. In February, the fine Burns collection formed by the late Mr. Lamb of Dundee realized £2,500, little enough certainly, even when compared with the third portion only of the great Ashburnham Library, which followed the beaten road in May. Mr. Lamb was the once happy possessor of the "Poems chiefly in the Scottish Dialect," Kilmarnock, 1786, which brought the record sum of £572. In March, a "miscellaneous collection," consisting of a series of Herbals, Books on Gardening, and a most remarkable collection of works illustrative of the life and plays of Shakespeare, produced more than £7,000. It is odd to find Caxton wedged in between Worlidge with his "Art of Gardening" and the "Eikon"—still more odd, perhaps, to find Mr. Baillie Weaver's books going in March, 1898, for a fraction of what they did in 1895.

The library of Mr. Bliss, sold in April, disclosed a large number of Song Books, as they are called, Playford's "Catch that Catch can," "The Goldfinch," "The Linnet," "The Honest Fellow," and scores more, now remarkable chiefly for the strange haunting of old lays that one time set the table in a roar. Among the superior volumes to be found in the Ashburnham Library were copies of the first five editions of the "Compleat Angler," which sold for £800. They were in their pristine condition, and the importance of this appeared in November, when the late Mr. Snow's set of the very same books, with a few leaves soiled, a wormhole or two, a little mended, and five olive morocco bindings, only produced £235. Defects, though apparently insignificant, work havoc with the prices of books. Let anyone take in his hand the catalogue of the "returns" from the Ashburnham Library, and compare the amounts realized on the 13th December with those obtained when the same books were believed to be perfect, and he will entertain no further doubt on this subject.

To the libraries already mentioned are to be added those of Mr. Arthur Briggs, the late Mr. Alfred Cook, Q.C., the late Mr. W. P. Honywood, Mr. Henry Howard, of Regent's-park, the late Mr. J. Henry Johnson, F.G.S., Mr. H. Sidney, Mr. George Skene, of Skene, the late Mr. R. W. Wilbraham, and, last but not least, of the late Mr. William Morris and the Rev. William Makellar. The latter, with its wealth of old Bibles, Testaments, and Prayer-books, afford boundless scope for the bookman's fancy. They will suggest many curious questions for his consideration. For example: When does Literature cease to be such in the eye of the book-lover? How is it that some books which are clearly not Literature are nevertheless in great demand? Why are distinctly frivolous books often hunted for unceasingly? Who first glorified the literary curiosity, and by enchantment made books of bric-à-brac and bric-à-brac of books?

There is good sense in a recent comment of the Bookseller on the demand for Messrs. Harmsworth's "Hundred Best Books" (a similar list, by the way, is offered by Messrs. Pearson), and on the disadvantages of buying literature in the lump in this way:—

We doubt exceedingly whether any individual of ordinary education, or want of education, can conceivably desire to read, or indeed can possibly derive any benefit from reading, every item in the very miscellaneous list to which Sir John Lubbock has given his imprimatur. The ordinary purchaser, when he receives his hundredweight or so of books, and endeavours to make himself acquainted with the extremely varied contributions to human knowledge they contain, will most certainly find a large proportion quite useless for his individual needs. . . . He will find that he would have been much better off both as to his pocket and as to his knowledge, if he had been content merely to purchase those in the list which he was able to use and to appreciate, and had not encumbered his shelves with volumes which, however appropriate they may be to every gentleman's library, are more fitted for dignified repose on the shelf than for the affectionate handling and companionship of everyday life.

No one possessed of any individual literary taste would make up his library as a stoker makes up his fire. Can it, indeed, be said that there are one hundred books which can be called the "best"? Surely the best hundred books for each individual are the hundred books he likes best.

Yet although there is here a danger of misconception which needs to be pointed out, we should be the last to grudge thanks to the enterprise of the publishers of the Hundred Best Books. No one can deny that they have done good service to literature. The buyers of the select hundred are not supposed to have individual taste; but they certainly take the best means for acquiring it. Whether Sir John Lubbock is an infallible guide or not, his list of books is an excellent investment for any one. The hundred may not be the best, but they are good; and far be it from us to complain of any one who induces the public to buy good literature.

The Master of Pembroke College, Oxford, the Rev. Bartholomew Price, of whose death we regret to learn, had no direct connexion with any other literature than that of the Infinitesimal Calculus, but indirectly he rendered letters no inconsiderable service. To him, more perhaps than to any other man, is due the present prosperity of the University Press. He saw in it a valuable instrument for establishing the financial position of the University on a sound basis, and to that end he laboured untiringly in the capacity of secretary to the Delegates. His grasp of business details was remarkable, and it was he who represented Oxford in making all the practical arrangements with Mr. Henry Frowde concerning the form of issue and mode of publication of the Revised Version of the Bible. It was not until 1882 that Dr. Price was promoted to the Mastership of his College. The result of the voting on that occasion was a tie, and the casting vote rested with the Chancellor, Lord Salisbury, who decided in his favour. Dr. Price matriculated as long ago as 1837, graduated in 1840, won the University Mathematical Scholarship in 1842, and got his professorship in 1853. As secretary to the Delegates of the University Press he was succeeded by Mr. P. Lyttleton Gell in 1884, but in the capacity of perpetual Delegate continued to take an active part in the affairs of that great printing-house.

Mr. Collet Dobson Collet, whose death has just taken place at the age of eighty-five, had an extraordinarily varied career. He was, among other things, a student for the bar, a pupil in the Royal Academy of Music, a contributor to the Musical World, an actor, a singer (we believe in the chorus only) at Drury Lane and Covent Garden, a director of F. J. Fox's choir at Finsbury Chapel, a musical lecturer and teacher of singing, a writer for Vanity Fair, an editor of the Free Press and Diplomatic Review, and a Chartist. His literary importance lay not so much in his contributions to periodicals as in the part he played in bringing about the Repeal of the Newspaper Stamp. It was at his instance that Cobden pushed that measure forward; and he was for twelve years secretary of the Society for Repealing the Taxes upon Knowledge.

The temporary disappearance—we trust it is only temporary—of Cosmopolis is likely to be keenly regretted. It was the only review which definitely aimed at being international, and was therefore invaluable to those who, while too busy to be regular students of the Revue des Deux Mondes and the Deutsche Rundschau, nevertheless wished to keep in direct touch with Continental thought. The mysterious uncertainty which had latterly prevailed as to the date of its publication gave it an additional charm for many readers. There was a piquant sense of adventure in the act of setting out to buy it and wondering whether the bookseller would have it which would have appealed to the man who delighted in travelling by the underground railway because he could always beguile the journey by speculating whether he would have to change at Gloucester-road.

A sixpenny edition of "Robert Elsmere" is published this month. Dr. Conan Doyle's "Adventures of Sherlock Holmes" and "Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes" will also appear in this form, which seems to find much favour with publishers just at present. The sixpenny issue of the late William Black's novels has been quite successful, and of course the "Alice" books with Sir John Tenniel's delightful illustrations have found a large public ready for them. When will the experiment be made of issuing new books at this price?

The celebration in Poland of the centenary of the poet Mickiewicz had its echo in Paris. There he passed some years of exile, and wrote one of the masterpieces of Polish literature, his "Monsieur Thadée." With Quinet and Michelet he became, in the forties, one of the liberal forces of France. But, while the two Frenchmen laboured for that universal patrie of liberty which knew no frontiers, the Pole limited his aspirations to the emancipation of his own people. Michelet and Quinet proclaimed fraternity between the nations, Mickiewicz stands forth as the symbolic figure of patriotism crushed under the heel of tyranny. It is just this character of Mickiewicz's work which makes him interesting to Frenchmen, while the question of Alsace-Lorraine still occupies the thought of Europe. M. Jules Lemaitre, in accepting the presidency of the fête organized by the Polish Association in memory of their poet, made, with the fate of Poland as his text, a long and pathetic plea for the dismembered provinces of France.

His address was of rare literary beauty; a more significant document as to the French état d'âme it is impossible to conceive:—

Les Français [he said] qui ont aujourd'hui quarante-cinq ans et au delà ont pris de bonne heure l'habitude d'attacher à ce nom de Pologne une idée de grâce et de tragique tristesse. Et, depuis, certaines conformités de souffrance ont achevé notre mutuelle amitié. Cinquante ans après les confiantes vaticinations de Michelet et de Mickiewicz, nous voyons que la force brutale est plus que jamais la reine impitoyable du monde. Quelque chose d'irremplaçable manque à l'humanité depuis que la France n'est plus assez puissante pour se porter au secours des opprimés, ni même pour élever la voix en leur faveur. Les événements de ces dernières années l'ont assez prouvé. . . .

N'importe: espérons. Car désespérer du règne futur de la justice, ce serait confesser que l'univers n'a aucun sens ni aucun but. . . . Si le monde a un but (et nous voulons qu'il en ait un), ce ne peut être que l'avènement de la justice entre les hommes et entre les peuples. Sinon, que peut-on voir en lui qu'une énigme médiocrement plaisante?

Mais, pour travailler à cet avènement, il faudrait être forts contre ceux qui le retardent. Et comment redevenir forts? Comment contraindre Dieu à répondre par un signe bienveillant aux sommations de Conrad? En acquiesçant, s'il se peut, ce qui nous manque et ce qui a manqué, dit-on, à nos chevaleresques ancêtres; en joignant à nos vertus propres, sans les altérer, quelque chose de la rude sagesse germanique ou saxonne: la constance, la ténacité, le sens pratique, la connaissance des conditions que la réalité impose au rêve idéaliste, et aussi, il faut le dire, la discipline, la subordination volontaire de l'individu aux intérêts communs, et ce qui crée la presque unanimité de l'action chez les races d'un sang plus lourd.

Lorsque je dis "nous," je songe à vous aussi. Car nous nous mirons dans l'âme de la Pologne comme dans l'âme d'une sœur charmante et triste. Nous nous pleurons en vous; nous nous unissons avec vous aujourd'hui dans une commémoration fraternelle, et, quand nous demandons à votre poète des mots d'espoir et de résurrection, il nous semble que nous ne vous empruntons rien, et que Mickiewicz, ayant exprimé, mieux que tout autre poète, la souffrance, la foi, et le rêve d'un peuple douloureux, nous appartenait, comme à vous, de toute éternité.

The thought of Mickiewicz has in fact, with that of Michelet and Quinet, entered into the thought of France, and had its origin largely in the ideas of the Revolution, in the books of the encyclopædists and of Rousseau. The son was present at the Paris fête in glorification of the father, and he, too, is an exile, forbidden to visit Warsaw for the unveiling of the Mickiewicz monument on Christmas eve.

A review of Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Helbeck of Bannisdale" has just appeared in Die Umschau, a weekly paper dealing with science, literature, and art, hailing from Frankfurt-on-the-Maine. The critic, who unfortunately misleads his readers by describing the heroine of the novel as a Protestant, takes the opportunity to discuss generally the English novel of to-day. He bewails its low standard of artistic excellence. For this he finds a reason. In France and Germany only a small number of people read, and they are highly educated, and so properly appreciative of the great thoughts placed before them by their authors. In England, on the contrary, everybody reads, and thus trivialities suffice. We fear this critic has perhaps hardly an exhaustive knowledge of our language and our literature.

With reference to the letter we published last week on Mr. Rudyard Kipling's Local Colour, "Bifurecus" writes:—

Your correspondent "A Farmer's Son" apparently has overlooked the fact that in different districts different kinds of tools are used. For forty years I have been familiar with two-tined "dung-forks" with handles about five feet long—"pitchforks" on a small scale—both in farmyards and in private stables; and I well remember a case in which a farm labourer died of blood-poisoning from a wound accidentally inflicted by such a fork while moving manure in a farmyard.

FICTION.

IDLEHURST, a journal kept in the country, by John Halsham (Smith Elder, 6s.), is a very charming book of the quiet, restful type, breathing of country air, of roses and lavender. Though the human interest is slight, one of its daintiest passages is inspired by a child friend, a certain little Alice:—

I saw her come in at the meadow gate—a vision of pink frock and yellow hair unbound. . . . She did not see me; and as she came up the grass walk she first of all fell on her knees beside the great clump of daffodils at the corner with an odd little cry of endearment and a caressing way with the hands that nobly refrained from picking and stealing. The moment after, she sprang to her feet and began to dance up the path, at first, perhaps, with some little toe-pointing and the school-chassez not wholly forgotten, but after the first three steps with nothing more than the hop, skip, and jump of a child too happy to be still, the expression of delight in perfectly light and graceful motion. She had a bunch of wild daffodils in her hand which acted thyrsus, and pink frock, hair ribbon, shoe-strap, and all, she might have been the forerunner of the gayest spring procession that ever wound across Greek frieze or vase.

Here, too, is a characteristic passage on country scents :—

There is a pleasure to be gained from the thousand natural perfumes of the country quite comparable to that given by fine colour or a perfect musical interval. . . . To-night every bank and hedge breathed as I passed its proper atmosphere ; every lightest breeze brought something new. The soil threw up incense at every step, the scarcely-budded branches set it afloat, all of the fine and recondite kind. Almost any nose can appreciate hay, or lilac blossom, or even a bean-field, exquisite differences though these be ; but a budding quick-hedge after a shower, or moist young bracken or a larch plantation on a spring evening, require nares emunctæ. As I passed along the wood road, above all the separate notes—notes of primrose clump, bluebell spike, trodden tussock, and wet moss—came the general woodland air, the breath of the very trunks and twigs, of trickling water, of fir bark, of the dead leaves of fifty years.

As I came out into the open I caught the smell of a dusty road in the twilight cool, not unlike the steam which goes up when raindrops begin to run together, and darken the dry soil of garden beds—a smell that brings recollection of drought and timely showers. . . .

It is pleasanter to dwell upon such passages than upon those occupied by social subjects. Conservatism is proper to Arcadia, doubtless, yet need it be a conservatism absolutely antagonistic to the modern spirit ? But it is ungracious to conclude the notice of a fragrant book with a hint of disapproval, for, after all, much more than pronounced conservatism may be forgiven to the man who has planted and loved a garden.

There is stuff enough in A KING OF SHREDS AND PATCHES, by Emily Pearson Finnemore (Lawrence and Bullen, 6s.), to make a first-rate book—fine observation, fine imagination, fine expression. George the ragamuffin, whether double-shuffling on the raft, minding the baby at home, or decoying Fanny with his concertina, has all our sympathy ; but why should he be called a “ King of shreds and patches ” ? Hamlet called his uncle so because he came like a tramp and stole the crown ; but George is a plumber, not a king. The plot is rather artificial. He inherited good blood and had instincts of gentility ; he loved in his own class and above him ; then he heard the Lady was engaged to her cousin ; he married the Woman, and regretted it when he found the Lady was free and loved him. Then the wind sprang up and knocked over a factory chimney that gave the unnecessary woman-wife her quietus and made way for the lady. So it was ordained by a beneficent providence. We would rather such freaks of providence were relegated to the Tract Societies, where faith is proof against temptation. In the modern novel we seek inevitable consequence, incident as the body and issue of motive. Miss Finnemore excels in the detail of human behaviour. Outside this one sometimes longs for Mark Twain's remedy of an appendix :—

Lurid flames splashed up from below the horizon and swept the sky with licking tongues ; faint wreaths of mist, like the exhalations of goblins, curled across the stage and up towards the zenith in scurrying battalions.

This is a fine derangement of metaphors, and the “ prancing breezelet ” in the next line does nothing to sweeten it. Trees may seem more mysteriously beautiful when obscured in a “ diaphane ” of white ; but the expression belongs to physiology, not landscape (“ Diaphane—the cortical membrane of a sac,” says Webster). A writer of Miss Finnemore's intelligence and taste should do nothing to encourage those who like this sort of thing.

MAM'ZELLE GRAND'MÈRE, by Fifiue (Lawrence and Bullen, 3s. 6d.), is a charming little book to be taken rather as earnest than performance. Fifiue has all the minor qualities of a good novelist. At present she looks on at life with an easy half-contemptuous smile, as at a comedy of manners without much feeling behind them. She is too much a woman of the world to know much of life. She tells of a race of men and women who “ move ” in “ sets ” instead of associating with friends and acquaintances like ordinary mortals. But her ideal is not fixed in this gim-crack universe ; time and opportunity may widen her purview and enlarge her interests.

PAVING THE WAY (Gay and Bird, 5s.), by Simpson Newland, deals with the early days of Australia, and gives us a vivid picture of the deadly struggle between the squatter and the aborigines. The pioneers, taking their lives in their hands, drove their flocks on to the lands they desired to occupy ; the Government encouraged them ; all parties hoped that collisions with the blacks would be avoided ; and “ no one really understood that the natives were divided into many hostile tribes, which utterly refused to enter into friendly relations with each other or to permit any encroachment on their respective domains.” Mr. Newland knows what he is writing about and no one can say that “ Paving the Way ” is dull. Roland Grantley is a bold and attractive hero, and his adventures are many and strange. The prevailing tone of the book is sad ; and there are few sadder scenes in Australian romance than the death of David Cleeve, “ headman and convict,” and the shooting of the noble horse, Star.

The confirmed novel-reader athirst for a new sensation will welcome eagerly Mr. A. J. Dawson's BISMILLAH (Macmillan, 6s.), for it introduces us to a country and to characters not overmuch exploited. Morocco and the Riff country form the scene of Mr. Dawson's story, and his characters are diverse enough to suit the most catholic of tastes, and sufficiently well drawn to show careful observation on the part of the author. The delightfully easy philosophy of the Moor—the philosophy that has its root in a deep-seated fatalism—is the keynote of the book ; and to this engaging philosophy Mr. Dawson adds a pleasing style of writing and the power of making his crowd of actors stand out with distinction. Ben Ramar, the Jew, and his charming daughter Rachel ; Martin Ward, the English hero, and his rival, Bensaquin, of doubtful nationality and more than doubtful morals ; Salaam, the Moor, and Baron Oscar Hell, the Swedish Quixote, are all interesting studies of people from whom we part with a touch of regret. “ Bismillah ” makes no pretensions to importance ; but it is well written and well constructed, and it opens up ground that has not been too hardly worked. Mr. Dawson displays a capability for higher things.

HISTORICAL NOVELS.

MARIE DE MANCINI (Lawrence and Bullen, 6s.), is an adaptation from the work of Madame Sophie Gay, a lady whose novels had some vogue in France at the beginning of the present century. Her best-known book, “ Anatole,” seems to have afforded some distraction to Napoleon while waiting at Malmaison for his journey into exile, for on leaving he gave it to an equerry with the remark :—“ To it I owe the forgetting for a moment of my troubles.” Here, with Louis XIV. as the central figure, we find ourselves in an atmosphere of intrigue. Between Marie de Mancini, the niece of Cardinal Mazarin, and the young King there existed a genuine attachment, which was fostered by the ambitious and utterly unscrupulous Cardinal and thwarted by the Queen-mother. Every one knows the end, and this rather detracts from the interest, but Marie makes a pathetic heroine. The book reads more like a statement of fact than a story, the reason perhaps being that the author has made a large use of memoirs and other contemporary records. As a picture of the Court of Louis XIV. it is excellent, but as a novel it will hardly appeal to the ordinary reader of fiction.

Yet another story of the French Revolution comes from the pen of Mr. W. D. Lighthall in A FALSE CHEVALIER (Edward Arnold, 6s.), and a very good story too, although some readers may possibly be disposed to quarrel with Mr. Lighthall for not providing them with a more fortunate ending. The young Canadian, Lecour, who masquerades under the names of de Répentigny and de Lincy, enlists our sympathies sufficiently to make us unaffectedly sorry that he should fall at last into the clutches of M. Sanson and his assistants. Mr. Lighthall's material is so good, and his picture of France in the throes of the Revolution so vivid, that much may be forgiven him; but he has some curious mannerisms. His chapters are remarkably short—there are no fewer than fifty-three in a novel of rather less than the average length—and this gives the book a broken and choppy style. He has also a decided weakness for the split infinitive. Still, "A False Chevalier" is considerably above the average of novels of the day.

IN THE CONFESSION OF CATHERINE SFORZA (Dent, 4s. 6d. n.) Mr. John B. Ruff has taken a too familiar historical name for the purposes of fiction, and one which is likely at the present moment to lead to confusion among library subscribers, since the story of the real "Catherine Sforza" is to be found in Mr. Heinemann's book-list. Mr. Ruff's tale is a modern one that touches incidentally upon Italy's struggle against Austria, and deals principally with a woman's vengeance upon a man. The book ends in the villain getting his deserts, which is the sort of tragedy that pleasantly stimulates the reader instead of depressing him.

"THE WORKERS."

BEN O' BILL'S : THE LUDDITE, by D. F. E. Sykes and G. H. Walker (Simpkin, 2s. 6d.); and A SOCIAL UPEHAVAL, by Isidore G. Ascher (Greening, 6s.), both deal with attempts of discontented workers to rise against the law, but they show the difference between fact and fiction. In the former the authors are so concerned with giving a true history of the events they describe that the plot is of small account. It deals with the Luddite rising in 1812, when power-looms first appeared, and the Yorkshire hand-weavers were in a desperate condition, a series of long wars having impoverished the country :—

Shopkeepers in the New-street [in Huddersfield] stood on their steps looking for a customer as eagerly as a captain for a cap of wind. Round the old market cross the workmen stood sullen and scowling. They had not much to say. They were too far gone even for anger. Their faces were now pinched and haggard. If a man had thrown a loaf among them they would have fought for it. It was said that at that time families had not twopence a head to live on each day. . . . Wheat was eight shillings a stone, and so bad at that, that it could not be baked; the poor-rate was at twelve shillings in the pound.

It is hardly surprising that the weavers, confronted with starvation, should have endeavoured to set matters right in their own way. They met stealthily and armed themselves as best they could. Looms were destroyed, mills were burned, and a reign of terror began. Then the soldiers were sent for, and the end came. Of sixty-six poor wretches tried at York, seventeen were executed, while others were sentenced to transportation. The authors have spared no pains to give a true picture of that stormy period. Many of their details were probably obtained from eye-witnesses. The local colour is good, especially the description of Powle Chapel :—

Up in the loft was the music, the double bass, the viol, and the clarinet. Between Jim Wood—Jim o' Slack—who played the double bass, and his colleagues of the viol and clarinet, contention had raged from the very foundation of the church at Powle. Jim o' Slack maintained that in every true vein of harmony wedded to divinity the notes of the double bass stood for the wrath of Jehovah and were designed to inspire awe and inward quaking. The feeble and futile utterances of the viol and the clarinet, he conceded, might represent the tender qualities of mercy and compassion, and, as such, might be worthy of some consideration among the Methodies, whose spiritual food was as milk for babies, but in High Calvinism, Jim maintained, nought but the bulky instrument his soul loved could convey adequate conception of the majesty of God and the terrors of hell.

The book has the disadvantage of being printed in very small type, but it is well worth reading. It should have a special interest for Yorkshire people.

In "A Social Upheaval" the theme is Socialism. At least, so Mr. Ascher says in his introduction. The Socialists, who meet in a wine merchant's cellar near Regent-street, are "bossed" by three brothers. One of them has managed somehow or other to get into the Church under a false name, while another poses as a country gentleman. The latter invites rich young men to his house and robs them at cards—for the good of the Cause; he plans and carries out big burglaries—for the good of the Cause again; he is finally assassinated by a woman—no doubt for the good of the Cause also. The author has yet to learn that satire, to be effective, must bear some semblance to the real thing.

A CLOUD OF DAWN, by Annie Victoria Dutton (Chapman and Hall, 6s.), strikes us as being a trifle out of date with its apostle of socialism, and its arguments for and against his creed. The author, on the whole, sums these up against the apostle, by killing off the gentle little heroine as a victim to his ideals. The portrait of Pauline Maurice is well done.

SHORT STORIES.

The volume of Indiana stories entitled AN IDYL OF THE WABASH (Bowen-Merrill), by Miss Anna Nicholas, is filled with simple peace and leisured calm. Miss Nicholas is of the school of literary Quietists, but her stories possess no small character of their own. In the first sketch, "The Idyl of the Wabash," we get a picture of Miss Callista Rogers, who comes from her Vermont home to the little Indiana town of Honeyport as one of the pioneer women who followed up the ever-advancing and now for ever vanished frontier. The period is soon after the war; Miss Callista has come to the West to teach, of course, and the sad history of her home and the middle-aged romance of her marriage are told with much delicacy and humour. "An Itinerant Pair" is a tale of the rough fortunes of a Methodist preacher and his wife, who are old and happy, and very, very poor; the sense of simple piety conveyed in the dialogue argues no small skill in the story-teller's art. Humour, shrewdness, and quite inevitable sadness, with a strong sense of character and a feeling for landscape, are the main features in Miss Nicholas' book, and they are clothed with a style at once simple and strong which gives an uncommon charm to her work.

TURKISH BONDS, by May Kendall (Pearson, 6s.), is a set of six short stories linked together by community of subject. The scene is always at Constantinople or in Armenia, and massacres are of frequent occurrence. That the Armenians are regarded more sympathetically by the author than by the majority of English people who have been brought into contact with them does not matter to the literary critic. Their sufferings and aspirations are at least convincingly portrayed, and some of the characters are excellently drawn. Paul Vartanian, the Armenian missionary, with whom an English girl fell in love (though she had not the courage to marry him), is a pathetic figure, effectively contrasted with Phil Warrington, the broad-shouldered, matter-of-fact Briton, who, having a great deal of money invested in Turkish bonds, is in no hurry for the downfall of Abdul the Damned. The book is short and, save for the earnestness of the writer's crusade against the Concert of Europe, an unambitious one. But, in spite of the occasional obtrusiveness of "purpose," it is the true work of a real literary artist.

A ROMANCE OF CANVAS TOWN (Macmillan, 6s.) gives its name to a collection of five stories by Rolf Boldrewood. It is the worst, though mercifully the shortest, of the five. Of late years the author of "Robbery Under Arms" has become sadly dull; his mannerisms have grown upon him, and he has lost the adventurous spirit that brightened his earlier works. False sentiment was always his bane, and it flows unchecked through "A Romance of Canvas Town." The second story, describing the fencing of a sheep-run, is enlivened with plans and a balance-sheet, and may be of interest to the farmer. "Angels Unaware" is perhaps the most readable of the collection, which is quite unworthy of its author's reputation.

What shall we say of Ian Maclaren's volume of short stories published under the title AFTERWARDS (Holder and Stoughton, 6s.)? It is certain, we suppose, to give as much pleasure and edification to his many admirers as any of his previous efforts. Yet we must honestly avow our opinion that the book consists of unrealized studies of a too sentimental type. The stories seldom arouse an emotion or a thought in the reader's mind; and once read, they fade away into the deep inane, leaving him nothing to ponder or to discuss.

RABBI SAUNDERSON, by the same author, from the same publishers (2s. 6d.), is a pretty, illustrated little volume, containing one single short story, which has more merit than any in "Afterwards." It ends, like most of those, in a death-bed scene, for our author loves to show us how a good Presbyterian can die. It is needless to say that Rabbi Saunderson dies testifying, but at least during the 213 pages of his life he was a real character, a poor, pathetic, lonely, over-conscientious, and over-learned old man. He was called "Rabbi" by reason of his scholarship, and we have enjoyed hearing about him, while truly thankful that we never had to sit under him in Kilbogie Free Kirk.

HESTER MORLEY'S PROMISE (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is by Miss Hesba Stretton, known to fame as the author of "Jessica's First Prayer." It is a fairly written novel; but the chief reason why we call attention to it is that it is a reprint issued without the slightest indication that it is not a new book.

We had thought that stories about dogs, like the biographical incidents in the lives of one's neighbours' children, could no longer be made amusing, but Mrs. Dew-Smith, in her volume TOM TUG AND OTHERS (Seeley, 6s.), shows that we have been entirely mistaken. These "sketches from a domestic menagerie" are most seductive reading; you glide from the history of Tug, the bulldog, and his friend the enemy, Abel, to the article on "Feminine Tactics," or the recital of "A Domestic Tragedy," with constant amusement. Mrs. Dew-Smith's style is always engaging, but the numerous illustrations by Miss Elinor M. Monsell are equally agreeable. The artist knows her subject even as well as the author; in conjunction they have produced a volume which will be welcome to all who love domestic pets.

Mr. Alfred Ollivant has, we believe, been heralded by an American literary impresario as likely to become as famous as Mr. Rudyard Kipling. We hardly detect these tokens of latent greatness in BOB, SON OF BATTLE (Doubleday and MacLure). This, too, is about dogs, their competitions in the matter of sheep-driving, and the consequent jealousies of their masters. Written in a difficult dialect, which we cannot identify, it arouses only a moderate amount of interest.

In order to appreciate Mr. E. F. Knight's A DESPERATE VOYAGE (Milne, 2s. 6d.), it is necessary to have a pronounced taste for horrors. Several of the leading characters are eaten alive by land-crabs on the Island of Trinidad, where, as is well known, Mr. Knight himself has had trouble with these same wild beasts in other days. It is a ghastly incident, and Aristotle, with his strong views about τὸ αἰσχροπρὸν, would have disapproved of it. The story itself is a rattling one of an unambitious kind. Though nothing in the way of characterization is attempted, the interest of a reader who can put up with the horrors will not flag.

FROM THE MAGAZINES.—II.

The most remarkable paper in the Contemporary is Mr. Ernest N. Bennett's indictment of the Sirdar, whom he accuses of waging war in the temper, and with the methods, of a Bashi-Bazouk. He tells gruesome stories of the butchery of the wounded, the looting of unprotected villages, and the massacre of non-combatants. He ridicules those who have compared Lord Kitchener to the Duke of Wellington, and he concludes with these strong words:—

If Gordon could have foreseen some of the deeds sanctioned by the general who was sent to "avenge" him, his dying request to the country which abandoned him would, I think, have been to put away all thoughts of vengeance.

This will be, and has been, duly attended to by other eye-witnesses. Of the remaining contributions the most interesting is Mr. John Foster Fraser's "Impressions of a World Wanderer," which deals satirically with "the repellent atmosphere" of Anglo-Indian society.

The fur trade is a romantic theme about which very little has been written elsewhere than in the boys' books of the late R. M. Ballantyne. A fascinating article in Blackwood deals with the pioneers of that industry in the Rocky Mountains, in the old days when they traded, so to say, with their scalps in their hands. The actualities of the hour are represented by an account of the Carlists which treats the well-advertised Spanish Pretender with very scanty respect, remarking that—

As regards the present Don Carlos, what is certain is that scandal has been very busy with his name. It asserts, for instance, that he helped to supply Laudet with material for "Les Rois en Exil." It says also that, when he was in Spain during the last war, his attention was chiefly devoted to the cider of the Basque country, and to a certain lady abbess. The conclusion drawn is that—the Pretender being the sort of man he is—a Carlist revolution is an exceedingly improbable contingency.

The contributors to the Century Magazine continue to be mainly occupied with the annals of the recent war, Naval Constructor Hobson resuming his account of the sinking of the Merrimac, Captain Sigsbee concluding his "Personal Narrative of the 'Maine,'" and Mr. Edmond Kelly describing his experiences as an American resident in Madrid during the period of the hostilities. The latter writer seems to have had a most courteous reception from his country's enemies, and he reciprocates their friendly feelings and professes the highest admiration for the average Spanish citizen. What particularly struck him was the Spaniards' unabated confidence in the integrity of American men of business, and their certainty that the conflict could not possibly have any issue that would prevent the American insurance offices from carrying out their engagements. One American company, it appears, had ensured to the extent of twenty million dollars; and Mr. Kelly says:—

While the war had aroused sentiments of hatred in every Spaniard against all things American, while the Press was daily misleading its readers regarding us with as little conscience as the yellowest of our own journals, while the illustrated papers were publishing lurid pictures of our troops in Tampa, engaged, not only in slaying, but in eating one another, Spanish policy-holders, fearful lest the war should prevent the transaction of business, were crowding the companies' offices, asking to be allowed to pay their premiums. During the entire war not a single policy was allowed to lapse.

Another military article, by Professor Wheeler, describes the battle of the Granicus; while Mr. John Patrick writes of the Carlyles in Scotland, and Mr. F. Marion Crawford contributes the third instalment of his Romance of the Second Crusade.

The National Review, absorbed as ever by the hard actualities of the passing hour, continues to hammer away at the Dreyfus scandal. This month Mr. L. J. Maxse discusses certain international aspects of the affair. Upon its developments, he maintains, "peace between France and England depends far more closely than upon any alarms and excursions in the Nile Valley"; and he expresses the belief that such a conflict, having to be fought out at sea, would be particularly popular with the French Army, on the ground that "while the sailors were being killed the soldiery would be able, in the suggested interests of national defence, to establish the Reign of Terror of which their leaders dream." Finally, he sums up the situation thus:—

There appear at the opening of perhaps the most eventful year in French history to be three alternatives before the French people:—(1) The maintenance of law and the triumph of justice, (2) a pronunciamento followed by a foreign war, (3) a foreign war followed by a pronunciamento. Let us hope for the first, but we shall do no harm by remaining prepared for the second or third.

In Good Words Mr. Neil Munro begins a serial story, and Mr. Edmund Gosse describes a visit which he paid in 1884 to "the admirable Quaker," J. G. Whittier. The picture of the poet in his old age is a pleasing one:—

He struck me as very gay and cheerful in spite of his occasional references to the passage of time and the vanishing of beloved faces. He even laughed, frequently and with a child-like suddenness, but without a sound. His face had none of the immobility so frequent with very aged persons; on the contrary, waves of mood were always sparkling across his features, and leaving nothing stationary there except the narrow, high, and strangely receding forehead. His language, very fluent and easy, had an agreeable touch of the soil, an occasional rustic note in its elegant colloquialism, that seemed very pleasing and appropriate, as if it linked him naturally with the long line of sturdy ancestors of whom he was the final blossoming.

Some gay sayings by Martin Luther are also collected by the Rev. William Cowan.

An interesting literary contribution to Temple Bar is an anecdotal sketch, by Mr. E. Harrison Barker, of the early years of Alphonse Daudet. The account of the novelist's childhood at Nîmes is the best thing in it; but we question whether the author is quite accurate in speaking of his "speedy success in the difficult career of letters." His early prosperity was not due to the sale of his poems and short stories, but to the fact that Empress Eugénie, having heard some of his verses recited, gave orders that he should be immediately provided with a sinecure. The story goes that De Morny wanted to make his appointment to the sinecure conditional on his having his hair cut, but that Daudet would not stand this interference with his liberty. As for his literary earnings, he told an interviewer, some thirteen or fourteen years after his début, that these only amounted to about £200 a year; and real commercial success only began for him with the publication of "Froment Jeune." In another paper, Mr. Arthur C. Hillier presents a critical estimate of Christopher North.

A number of poetical pictures of the celestial city are brought together, to be contrasted and compared, by Miss Pauline W. Roose in the Gentleman's Magazine. "The Poet's Heaven" is the title of the paper; and the singers on whom contribution is levied range from Dante and Milton to Mr. Austin Dobson and Miss Christina Rossetti. "Is heaven fading from the pages of our poets?" is the question to which the author is inevitably brought at the end of her extensive survey. "Those sapphire walls, those star-paved streets whose very dust are pearls, those bowers of unfading bloom, those crystal streams, do the singers of our day reject them as inadequate and childish?" A perusal of the works of many of our very latest poets would certainly seem to justify the answer that they do. But, perhaps, on the other hand, they merely feel that these are old metaphors which have played their part and served their purpose, and that if any metaphors are to be used, new ones must be devised. In that case, and with that qualification, the poets will long continue, as Miss Roose says, "to gaze through the dim stained glass of our mortal life into the mysteries of what lies without, and to beguile our hearts with rumours of the vision."

The most interesting article in the Badminton Magazine is that on the "Early History of the Football Association" by its first secretary, Mr. R. G. Graham. It is curious to note that a game which nowadays flames in the forehead of the evening bills throughout the winter has developed all its importance within a period of little more than thirty years. "In the Field of 1862 hardly any mention is made of the game," and though a good many clubs were then in existence "their matches were of no public interest owing to the divergence of rules, each having its own 'Laws of the Game.'"

In the New Century Mr. Percy Fitzgerald continues his Pickwickian studies. "Who was Mr. Pott?" is the riddle that he asks himself; and he gives reasons for supposing that the able editor of the Estanswill Gazette was no other than Dr. Maginn, though "Pott is not shown to be such a blackguard as Maginn, and Maginn was not such an ass as Pott." The reasons which he gives for his conclusion are only moderately convincing. Another literary article, by Dr. Aikman, treats of the life and work of Lewis Carroll; but this adds little that is of value, whether in the way of biography or of criticism, to what has already been written on the subject. Mr. T. H. Escott's paper "From Xenophon to Bobadil" has very little to do with either of these celebrated characters, but begins with "Father Prout," proceeds to discuss the late Mr. Hely Bowes, and concludes with a eulogy of Lord Kitchener and some remarks on the political situation.

A new quarterly, which claims a cordial welcome, is the Home Counties' Magazine, which has grown out of the Middlesex and Hertfordshire Notes and Queries. It not only presents a great quantity of the lore in which antiquarians delight, but presents it with a consideration for the feelings of the general reader which antiquarians do not invariably display. The opening article, by Mr. W. Heaton Jacob, F.S.A., sums up the history of Somerset-house and enumerates the relics of Old Somerset-house—such as they are—which still remain. No fewer than six interesting old prints are reproduced to illustrate it. On a later page a reprint, contributed by Mr. Francis B. Bickley, of the orders drawn up in 1616 for the conduct of the Hertford Grammar School, shows that reasonable views on the subject of punishment existed, if they did not prevail, even in those early days. For we read that—

In all their instruction, both Master and Usher shall avoid such rigor and frequency of correction as may dull or overmuch discourage or terrify; but shall mix moderate severity with necessary lenity that by his discretion and dexterity, he maye adde life and spirits to weake capacities and slippery memories, which are not to be oppressed, but rather supported by admonitions, reprehensions, comparisons, emulations, and commendacions, than deterred by immoderate and cruell castigation.

The history of Blackheath from the time of the Dunes is another subject treated in an interesting and well-illustrated paper.

The special winter number of the Studio consists of an admirably-written account, by the late Mr. Gleeson White, with copious illustrations, of modern bookplates. The Studio's almanac this year is both decorative and useful. The excellent colour reproduction of a picture by M. Henry Ospovat, which forms its raison d'être, contains two Florentine figures, of the Renaissance period, symbolical, we apprehend, of connoisseurship and the association of art and beauty.

An estimate of King Edward III., viewed as a naval hero, by Mr. Alexander Nelson Hood, is the most notable feature of the United Service Magazine.

The Antiquary begins the serial publication of a diary of travel, purchased in MS. from a second-hand bookseller, and believed to have been written by the William Windham who was the first English visitor to Chamonix. The author of the introduction quotes a vague old story to the effect that Windham ascended Mont Blanc, and naively adds, "If so, he must have anticipated both Balmat and Saussure." But this hypothetical remark is hardly worthy of a usually accurate magazine. In 1741—the date of Windham's trip to the glaciers—the name of Mont Blanc was still unknown to the geographers; while Windham himself, who wrote an account of his excursion, expressly states that the only mountain that he ascended was the Monteverve. The style of the diary, it should be further pointed out, is entirely different from the style of the Chamonix pamphlet; but, as that pamphlet is believed to have been written for Windham by his friend and tutor, Mr. Benjamin Stillingfleet, the discrepancies do not necessarily militate against the authenticity of the former document.

Correspondence.

MR. GOSSE AND FRENCH POETRY. TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—With a charming courtesy which disarms his reproof, M. Davray chides me in your columns for those pessimistic reflections upon the present condition of French poetry which I have ventured to express in the Contemporary Review for December.

I have remarked, it appears, that "it is extraordinary how little place is taken by poetry at this moment in Paris." This displeases M. Davray; yet, in his next sentence, he admits the fact, and asks, "How could a poet publish his verse when everybody is engrossed and exasperated by the endless, the lamentable 'affaire Dreyfus'?" Precisely. But that is what I said; and what can one say further, except "Tant pis pour vous, Messieurs"?

M. Davray, in a very interesting survey of the situation, proceeds to endorse my contention. He admits the silence of the French poets. He gives reasons why the elder writers, one and all, are taking "a glorious rest." But he goes on to say that the younger school are not resting. They do not publish, because no one would listen to them, but in private they are all "absorbed in perfecting their work." I am delighted to hear it, and can well believe it; but how are we foreign devils in London to know the fact if no volumes of new verse reach us?

M. Davray proceeds to give a copious and very interesting list of these secret forces, of these cloistered and sequestered singers who are waiting for revision or revolution to bring back "a time for songs." His catalogue is highly valuable. Every one knows that M. Davray lives in the heart of the poetical movement in Paris and speaks with complete authority. I analyse his list with eagerness, and I find in it six names which represent writers no longer very young and all in more or less degree already eminent. These are MM. Maeterlinck, Verhaeren, Gustave Kahn, Jean Moréas, Stuart Merrill, and Henri de Regnier. None of these is new to me; M. Davray, who follows so indulgently what we in London write about French things, will possibly do me the justice to admit that at one time or another I have endeavoured to make each of these poets better known to English readers.

And yet I cannot help examining this list of young Frenchmen who give special attention to the production of poetry. Are they very Parisian? MM. Maeterlinck and Verhaeren are Flemings, and live in Belgium; M. Moréas is a Greek; M. Kahn is a German Jew; M. Merrill is an American. There remains only one name which strikes me as typically French, that of M. Henri de Regnier. Hardly a year ago M. Davray's own organ, the Mercure de France, took me to task for over-praising M. Henri de Regnier to the detriment of his contemporaries. Is he not French enough, and must we seek for the real Parisian intensity at Bruges or at Bukharest? Certainly, I am impenitent, and cannot help thinking that, for whatever reason, "little place is taken by poetry at this moment in Paris."

None the less, I am delighted to hear from one so competent as M. Davray that appearances are deceitful, that the poets are merely hiding, and that the new century is sure to bring with it

Sculptors like Phidias,
Raphael's in shoals,
Poets like Shakespeare—
Beautiful souls!

I hope I shall not be too old to appreciate and to welcome them when they come.

I am, dear Sir,

Your obedient servant,

EDMUND GOSSE.

APPRECIATION OF FOREIGN LITERATURE. TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Professor Courthope's recent lecture on German literature and Mr. Clement Shorter's article relating to that lecture (Literature, December 17, 1898) are both welcome and additional signs of the growing interest in the study of international literature. A few remarks on that subject by one who, born and educated in polyglot Hungary, has devoted fifteen years to the close observation of the public and private life of the Austrians, Germans, French, Americans, and English, may perhaps be found to contain some helpful suggestions.

For a real appreciation of a foreign literature (taking this word in the sense of belles lettres) one must, first of all, be equipped with what is a far rarer accomplishment than critics are aware of—with a competent knowledge of the foreign language. Of twenty foreign critics who can read with facility a French or German treatise on a topic of history or philosophy, there is scarcely one that knows either of these languages with anything approaching intimacy. Such an intimate acquaintance with Continental languages cannot be obtained without a knowledge of (sit venia verbo) the parlature of Continental nations. French, Italian, or German cannot be fully mastered unless we acquire at the same time not only a knowledge of the sounds and cadence of speech, but also of the gestures of the speakers, the gestures of these nations being explicit elements of their speech, and implied elements of their literary diction.

This remark will no doubt appear absurd to many an Englishman who, as is but too well known to foreigners, despises gestures in general, and those of the French in particular. However, that remark is not a whit more absurd than the acknowledged truth that no one can claim a competent knowledge of English unless he masters the intricacies of accent in English. That accent is one sui generis; it exists in no other Teutonic, Slav, or Latin language. The gesture-hating English naturally developed that acoustic form of emphasis rather than adopt emphasis by gestures as practised by all the other nations of Europe. Accent in English is a stereotyped and, as it were, inner gesture, and without a fair knowledge of it no one can hope to judge English literary diction adequately. For the same reason our insufficient knowledge of those untranslatable particles in Greek, which were in reality gestures expressed by words, is hiding from us many a subtle charm of the old classics. The absence and disdain of gestures in English parlature accounts probably for the all but general belief in England that our comprehension or enjoyment of Shakespeare does not gain by seeing his dramas acted. This is certainly not the case with French, Italian, or German dramas. They are meant to be seen on the stage, and Macaulay disliked Schiller's Kabale und Liebe because he had never seen it well acted. May not Professor Courthope's sweeping condemnation of the German drama be traceable to the same circumstance? Emphasis and timbre being in English less dependent on external help than in French or German, English dramas may perhaps be fairly judged by him who only reads them. Continental dramas, on the other hand, cannot be fairly judged unless the critic has seen them well acted. Parlature has a far greater influence on Continental literature generally, and on the drama especially, than it ever can have on English literature. If this cardinal circumstance be taken into consideration, can anybody seriously maintain that Lessing's Emilia Galotti is not equal to any English or French tragedy written after Shakespeare? He who doubts that need only see a performance of Lessing's great tragedy at the Vienna Burgtheater. It is likewise there that he will learn to speak of Schiller's dramas with the respect and admiration due to the works of one of the world's greatest dramatists. And should that critic repair to near Budapest, he would find that Hungarian dramatists, too, may write on the gates of their theatres: "Introite, nam et hic Dii sunt." This latter statement will, it is to be apprehended, again rouse the wrath of the angry reviewers of my "Hungarian Literature." But what can be expected of people who are both absolutely ignorant of Magyar and sorely vexed at my having told them so in the preface of my work?

Apart from linguistic conditions for a just appreciation of foreign literature, there is another and not less important condition. Each nation's literature is moving in different latitudes. Thus the French rightly count many of their works on philosophy proper, or law, as works of literature. Descartes' "Discours de la Méthode" is literature; so is Montesquieu's "Esprit des lois"; nay, Galiani's charming "Dialogues sur le Commerce des Bleds." In Germany, Schopenhauer's "Welt als Wille und Vorstellung," Hehn's geographical and Riehl's sociological works are literature. Or can anybody deny the epithet of a literary classic to Machiavelli's "Discorsi" or "Principe," or to Galileo's "Dialoghi"? This peculiar extension of literature into provinces of philosophy or science proper is rather rare in England, and English critics in judging the whole of a Continental literature neglect as a rule (Dr. Garnett's "Italian Literature" is a noteworthy exception) these remarkable literary enclaves. The great differences in latitude and frontiers make comparisons of single works of two or more literary nations a task of trying delicacy. Professor Courthope compares Milton's "Paradise Lost" with Klopstock's "Messias." One might just as well compare Lessing's "Laokoon" with Bentley's "Dissertations on the Epistles of Phalaris." Milton's epic can be compared neither with Klopstock's "Messias" nor with "Louise," by Voss; but with all due deference to Professor Courthope it may be said that Goethe's "Hermann und Dorothea" stands to Milton's masterpiece in the relation of the Odyssey to the Iliad. There is a most extensive and useful bibliography of the questions relating to comparative literature in the Revue de philologie française for 1896, 1897, and 1898, by L. P. Betz.

Yours faithfully,

EMIL REICH.

Authors and Publishers.

Few Civil Service benefactions have been more richly deserved than the pension of £200 a year which is, we understand, conferred on Prof. Joseph Wright. He is practically solely responsible, both as editor and supporter, of the English Dialect Dictionary—an undertaking of the greatest value; and his devotion to and services in the cause of philology certainly claim public recognition.

The long-looked-for life of Sir Henry Keppell, Admiral of the Fleet, is now about to be published under the unpretentious title of "A Sailor's Life." The late Sir Oswald Brierley has contributed numerous illustrations.

An important book of travel to be published shortly by Messrs. Constable is "Among the Himalayas," by Major L. A. Waddell. The part of the range visited by Major Waddell was not that lately popularized by such mountaineers as Sir William Conway and the Hon. G. C. Bruce, but the more imposing eminences of that Eastern Switzerland, Sikkim. Nothing of importance has been written on this country since Hooker's Journals, and Major Waddell claims to have got nearer to Mount Everest than any European since Hooker. He believes this inhospitable neighbourhood to contain the richest gold mines in the world, and invites the attention of Alpine-climbers to the Mountain Kinchinjunga, the glaciers of which can now be reached in about five or six days from Darjeeling.

Another notable work which the same house has in preparation is "The Rise of Portuguese Power in India," by Mr. R. S. Whiting, formerly of the Bengal Civil Service. The period covered by the author is from 1497 to 1550, and the subject is one which has never been fully dealt with by any English writer. A complete bibliography of the subject will be a useful feature in this volume.

Mr. M. H. Spielmann has three new books in hand, one of which, a biography of Mr. G. F. Watts, or, rather, a record of the painter's artistic career, is nearly finished. The catalogue of Mr. Watts' paintings, which will form an appendix, comprises nearly eight hundred items.

We mentioned recently that Mr. Byam Shaw was illustrating one or two plays of Shakespeare for Messrs. Bell, and that others might follow. Since then it has been arranged that this artist shall make drawings for every one of the plays. The volumes will be issued by Messrs. Bell in the course of the next two or three years. It is a very large undertaking for Mr. Byam Shaw, and will occupy him for a long time, since there are nearly 300 drawings to be made, not to mention incidental decorations.

What may be regarded as the first of a projected series of reproductions of prints and drawings in the University Galleries at Oxford is being published by the Clarendon Press. This is "The Master E. S. and the Ars Moriendi," a chapter in the history of engraving during the fifteenth century, by Mr. Lionel Cust, with forty-six colotype facsimiles. Mr. Cust argues that the unique series of copperplate engravings at Oxford is the true editio princeps of the Ars Moriendi, and that the illustrations of the Blockbook in the British Museum are little more than enlarged copies, a view which involves reconsideration of many points in the early history of bibliography and xylography.

The Princess Metternich has been engaged for some time past in writing her memoirs. The part she took in politics during the era of Napoleon III., when Prince Metternich was Austrian Ambassador in Paris, has become historical. She had an intimate friendship with both the Empress Elizabeth of Austria and the Empress Eugénie, whom, it will be remembered, Prince Metternich accompanied in her flight from the Tuileries on the 4th of September, 1870.

The story which M. Zola wrote during a visit to this country for the anniversary issue of the Star will appear, with illustrations by Sir James D. Linton, about the middle of the month.

We have received notice from Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode that among their New Year's publications they are about to include a monthly Index to The Times, the first number to appear in February next. It is to be compiled by Miss Nancy Bailey, who has for many years indexed the Parliamentary Debates and Reports of the Royal Commissions for the Government, and she, if any one, knows how to make an index accurate, easy of reference, and complete. The publication will not be merely an alphabetical catalogue of the more important headings in the paper, but an exhaustive table of reference to the subject-matter of every column in The Times.

Dr. George Macdonald has returned to his home at Bordighera, but he is in a very feeble condition and it is scarcely likely that he will write again.

The New York Critic, now entering its nineteenth year, and recently converted from a weekly to a monthly journal, will in future be issued by Messrs. Putnams. The editors, Mr. Joseph B. Gilder and Miss Jeanette L. Gilder, state that they hope to make it the first literary monthly in America.

Lord Ronald Gower's life of Sir Thomas Lawrence will appear in the course of a month or two. It will be an expensive book, as great pains are required to produce it satisfactorily. Lord Ronald Gower, it will be remembered, was the author of the monograph on Lawrence and Romney in the Great Artists Series.

The "Memoirs of Sir Harry Lumsden" will be published by Mr. Murray in the course of this month. The matter has been prepared for the press by Sir Peter Lumsden, Sir Harry's younger brother, who was born in 1829.

"The Coming of Love" will shortly be published in a third edition by Mr. John Lane, with a new preface by Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton.

Mr. Alexis Krausse, whose interesting book on China has been lately published, is writing a comprehensive historical survey of Russia's expansion in Asia.

Miss Mary Kingsley's new volume, "West African Studies," will be published towards the end of this month.

"A Handbook of French Art" is to be the title of Miss Rose G. Kingsley's book, which will be published by Messrs. Longmans.

"The Ship: her Story" is the title of Mr. Clark Russell's new book now in preparation. It is to contain a large number of illustrations by Mr. H. C. Seppings-Wright.

Mr. Augustine Birrell's lectures on "The Law and History of Copyright in Books" will be published shortly by Messrs. Cassell.

Mr. Elkin Mathews is to publish Mr. W. B. Yeats' book of poems, "The Wind among the Reeds," which will probably be ready by the end of the month.

"Fantastic Fables" is to be the title of the new book by Mr. Ambrose Bierce, whose sketches of military life and other stories are popular here and in America. Messrs. Putnams are the publishers in London.

Mr. E. H. Cooper is preparing a collection of stories for the press, in which will be included "Wyemarle and the Sea Fairies," from the Christmas number of the Sketch.

Dr. Douglas Thompson will give us, in his immediately forthcoming volume "Euripides and the Attic Orators," a "Comparison" which is likely to be of special attraction to all classic scholars. Macmillan and Co. are the publishers.

A new Latin grammar, which is likely to be a work of some importance, is to come from the Professor Emeritus of Latin in Harvard University, Dr. George M. Lane, LL.D. The preparation of it has engaged the Professor for nearly thirty years. Messrs. Harper will publish it in England, and it may be expected at once.

On December 24 we noticed that the "Digest of English Case Law," published "a week or two ago . . . in fifteen volumes," was being offered by the publishers on the plan of payment by instalment. Messrs. Stevens and Sons now inform us that the work will be complete in sixteen volumes, the index volume of cases being about to be published this month.

Mr. John Bloundelle-Burton will commence a new serial in Cassell's Saturday Journal on the 11th, entitled "A Bitter Birthright." It will deal with the present day and will be Mr. Bloundelle-Burton's first novel for ten years which is not historical. The scene is laid in British Honduras, and the story will also appear in America.

Besides Dr. S. R. Gardiner's "Oliver Cromwell," another volume of this series (which included Sir John Skelton's "Charles I." and "Mary Stuart," the Bishop of London's "Elizabeth," and Mr. Holmes' "Queen Victoria") is to come from the pen of Mr. Andrew Lang, and M. Frederic Masson's "Empress Josephine" will also be published by Messrs. Goupil in similar dress.

"The Evolution of the English House," just published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein in the Social England Series, is to be followed by "The Evolution of English Household Implements" and by another volume on the English Manor. The series will also include volumes on "Chivalry," by Dr. Cornish, Vice-Provost of Eton; on "The History of the Fine Arts in England," by Professor Baldwin Brown; and on the "Navy," by Mr. W. Laird Clowes.

A new book on "French Literature of To-Day," by Mlle. Blaze de Bury, is ready to be published immediately. It is partly personal and partly critical, and the modern French authors discussed in it include MM. Zola, Brunetiere, Pierre Loti, Guy de Maupassant, Edmond de Goncourt, Paul Bourget, Jules Lemaitre, Anatole France, and Paul Verlaine. Messrs. Constable are the publishers.

Yet another book promised by Messrs. Constable is a volume of essays by Mr. Henry G. Krehbiel, entitled "Music and Manners in the Classical Period." One chapter which should be interesting will deal with Haydn's love affairs, and include some letters which he wrote to an English lady with whom he engaged in a flirtation.

Mr. M. P. Shiel, the author of "The Yellow Danger," promises another story in the same vein of sensational romance, dealing with the men and times of Henry VIII., and he has in hand another one of the audaciously anticipatory kind exemplified in his "Yellow Danger."

Now that Mr. Clement Scott is freed from the duties of regular dramatic criticism, he is going to devote himself to the writing of a history of the stage, to be entitled "The Drama of Yesterday and To-Day," beginning with the time of Phelps at Sadler's Wells and so on through the Charles Fechter period, the days of Chatterton at Drury Lane, the Bancroft renaissance, down to Irving and the latest managements. Great foreign actors in this country will be dealt with, and the whole of the drama reviewed from Shakespeare down to the musical farces.

The scene of the new novel on which Mr. Morley Roberts is now engaged is laid in South Africa, and the book will throw such new light as a novel may on the true inwardness of the political situation.

Mr. John Foster Fraser, who lately rode a bicycle round the world, is about to return to the Gallery of the House of Commons. He will act as lobby correspondent and descriptive writer for the Yorkshire Post.

A work by Professor W. Busch, entitled "Die Berliner Märztage von 1848," will be issued shortly in Munich.

M. Goyau, the brilliant author of "L'Allemagne Religieuse," is to visit England in order to conduct a similar inquiry on "L'Angleterre Religieuse." The result will doubtless appear in the Revue des Deux Mondes.

Count Leo Tolstoi's new novel is published by the Niva (Cornfield), an enterprising weekly journal, whose editor has secured the work for the opening numbers of the year 1899. It is called "Voskressenie" (signifying in Russian either Resurrection or Sunday), and treats of contemporary Russian life. Contrary to his usual custom, Count Tolstoi has sold the work for a very large sum of money for the benefit of the "Doukhoborts." A French translation is to appear, we believe, simultaneously in France.

The Revue Hebdomadaire, published by Plon, Nourrit, et Cie., began in the number for December 24th the publication of the second series of M. Paul Bourget's "Voyageuses." This will constitute a "feature" of the review during the present year. The review will publish also articles by MM. Coppée, the Rosnys, the Marguerittes, Edouard Rod, and André Theuriot, and the final instalments of the "Lettres de Tourgueneff à Madame Viardot."

The Revue Bleue announces a forthcoming book on the life and work of George Sand, a sort of "life and times" of the great lyric writer, in three volumes. It has been written by the wife of a Russian general, Mme. Komaroff, but her name will not appear on the title-page. M. Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, the great authority on Balzac, has written the preface.

The following books by Gabriele D'Annunzio are promised for publication in the near future:—"Gioconda," a tragedy, "Sogno d'un mattino di Primavera," and "Sogno d'un meriggio d'Estate."

A journal appears in Russia this month called Woman's Work. Although many such journals are published in the other countries of Europe and in America, and even one in Finland, Woman's Work will be the first publication of its kind to appear in Russia.

Designers of all kinds will be interested in "Kunstformen der Natur," by Professor E. Haeckel, the publication of which begins this month. It will consist of plates and explanatory letterpress and will be issued in parts at 3s. each.

THE POET'S POET.

It will be three hundred years on Monday since Edmund Spenser died at his lodging in King-street, Westminster, overcome by troubles more than by time. The particular house has long been indistinguishable, and the street itself has lately disappeared from the map of London. Some romantic souls may wish that the Government had let it stand a few months longer, in order that such as are inclined to commemorate the event might have a local habitation for their little festival in honour of a great name. "But this is an unpoetical age," we hear on all sides, and it could hardly be expected that even the poets of to-day would gather in Spenser's honour in the open street as they gathered three centuries ago round his grave in the Abbey, bringing with them odes and elegies to fling in place of unseasonable flowers upon his dust. The modern poet is by no means inclined to waste his autographs, and the useful work of the typewriter would scarcely rise to the dignity of the occasion. Perhaps it is as well, when the season is considered, that the Board of Works should have removed any incentive to an out-of-doors celebration of Spenser's tercentenary. There is, we believe, to be some public homage done to "our sage and serious poet," however: it will be interesting to see how far this bears out his traditional title of "the Poet's Poet." At the end of the century Spenser hardly seems to hold the place in the affection of living poets which he held at its beginning. It is obviously impossible to say whether they read him; but his influence is not apparent in their published work—at least, on a scale comparable with that of Milton and Wordsworth. Perhaps some still inglorious Keats is even now straying in Spenser's "halls and bowers fair, culling enchanted flowers": we wish that he would give evidence of it. But in none of the greater Victorian poets can Spenser's influence be clearly traced, and unless the fashion changes again, the new century will have to find him a new title.

In a wider sense, however, it is safe to say that our poetical literature is full of Spenser's influence. But we can no longer say, as did his contemporaries, that the "Faerie Queene" is "the delight of every accomplished gentleman, the model of every poet, the solace of every soldier." The deplorable tendency is rather, perhaps, to say, with young Mr. Addison of Magdalen, that

The mystic tale that pleased of yore
Can please an understanding age no more.

Spenser is still bought, undoubtedly, as the various recent editions which appeal to both long and short purses testify; but is he read? That is one of the questions to which it is almost impossible to find an answer: few people like to confess that they do not care for an acknowledged classic, and still fewer "give themselves away" with the unconscious candour of Macaulay. The universal popularity of the Elizabethan age, to which he was a mirror and a lamp, can never be Spenser's again: Ben Jonson might say nowadays, in the words with which he deplored the degraded literary taste of the generation that followed Spenser's death, "If it were put to the question of the Water-rhymer's works against Spenser's, I doubt not but they would find more suffrages; because the most favour common vices, out of a prerogative the vulgar have to lose their judgment and like that which is naught." For the name of "the Water-rhymer," whose works, it is curious to note, have been published with great pomp in eight volumes by the Spenser Society, one may substitute that of the patriotic Mr. This or the melodious Mr. That, and the cynical remark would still hold good. But Spenser's glory rests on a surer basis than that of popularity: if Chaucer was the morning-star, he was the sunrise of our poetical literature, and, whether we read him or not, his labours are secure of living with the eternity of his Gloriana's fame.

We should be delighted to be convinced that we do the public and the poets an injustice, and that Spenser is really read in proportion to the spread of education. It is difficult, indeed, to reconcile this belief with the statistics of the most popular journals: there is scarcely room for Ally Sloper and Belphebe in one mind. Yet where, in the nature of things, are we to look for more delightful reading than the "Faerie Queene" affords for those "who appreciate the richness and music of English language, and who, in temper and moral standard, are quick to respond to English manliness and tenderness"? Three centuries have not availed to dim the splendour of Spenser's imagination or the sweetness of his verse; in neither respect has he been surpassed by his followers and his descendants. In his work, too, we find the essence of all the best that existed in Elizabethan England. Shakespeare is cosmopolitan and for all time; Spenser could have been produced in no other environment than that of Gloriana's Court, with its stately ceremonial, its antiquated chivalry, its keen appreciation of the joy of life, its stern insistence upon duty. In the "Faerie Queene" this is all recorded as a possession for ever; through the enchanted bowers and greenwood glades we see the men who bearded Spain, tamed Ireland, and founded the Empire of the Seas. Yet this is not the greatest reason for our honouring Spenser's memory; this was not why Keats revelled in him, or Milton acknowledged him as master. That he reflects the ideas—though not the diction—of a great age counts for less than the unsurpassed melody of his verse, or the beauty of his gallery of pictures. His lofty morality attracts the like-minded; his service to modern English poetry is important to the literary student as his help in depicting his times is indispensable to the historian. But the Spenser whom we love, the Poet's Poet, is the creator of Una and Belphebe and the Bower of Bliss, who leads us with the magic of his dreamy verse to the port of rest from troublous toil,

The world's sweet inn from pain and wearisome turmoil.

Far the most useful among the many manuals for literary aspirants has just appeared in Sir Walter Besant's "The Pen and the Book." It is written to instruct "young persons who are thinking of the literary life," and, strange to say, it actually encourages these young people to do something more than to think of it. For Sir Walter's optimism is in refreshing contrast to the "disinheriting" attitude often adopted by successful professional men towards those who propose to follow in their footsteps. We hope, however, to say more in a later issue about the admirable advice here given on almost every subject of interest to a young littérateur.

Meanwhile, we cannot admit Sir Walter's contention that, as the book is written for the young persons in question, and for them only, it "may therefore be considered as, in a sense, privately printed." Here is matter indeed for "parents and guardians"—to say nothing of a reconstituted Education Department—if an eminent novelist, however well-meaning, is to undertake the instruction of the youth of our land, and admit neither reporters nor critics to his lectures! We need, therefore, offer no excuse for the space devoted on another page to the criticism by a publisher of Sir Walter's chapters on the dealings between authors and publishers.

We need hardly say that we hold no brief for publishers rather than for authors, and the facts and opinions given in the article referred to are those of our correspondent alone. Indeed, we hold as fully as does the Authors' Society that advice, protection, and combination may often be necessary to obtain for authors the due reward for the work, and every one must recognize the valuable aid Sir Walter himself has rendered towards this end. But we believe that the history of our leading publishing houses is, on the whole, one of continuous intelligent encouragement of good literature and that the cause of letters owes an immense debt to them. To show Sir Walter's attitude it is not necessary to go further than the first paragraph of Book I., chapter 1, in this volume, in which the object of the writer, so far as it concerns the dealings of author with publisher, is thus described:—

To warn the reader against the tricks and subterfuges by which crafty persons are always endeavouring to acquire the control of literary property for their own ends; to instruct him how to defeat those tricks; and to explain what literary property really means in the eyes of the law.

When the subject is approached in this spirit, it seems fair that readers of a literary journal should have a chance of hearing the other side.

The results of the annual literary census which has just been taken by the Publishers' Circular will on this occasion, we suspect, give rise to some astonishment. Probably no ordinary student of the daily and weekly record of new publications for 1898 will be prepared to hear not only that there is no advance, but that there is an actual reduction in the number of books issued during the past twelve months as compared with the previous year. But what is more surprising still is the accompanying information as to the particular department of literature in which this decline is most conspicuous. Who would have guessed that it is the novelists of all people who have slackened in their industry? Such, however, is the fact, and no doubt the first feeling which it is calculated to arouse is one of relief. To a sanguine imagination it suggests that the tide may have turned; that the reduction is perhaps destined to be a progressive one, and will possibly continue until the "output" of fiction declines from its present preposterous figure of 1,758 novels per annum, or nearly five a day, into some less humiliating proportion to other products, real or reputed, of the human intelligence.

Unfortunately, however, it would be rash to assume, at any rate at this early stage, that these statistics represent anything more than an accidental fluctuation. Our contemporary, we observe, attributes the general fall in the number of publications to the political disquietudes of the past two years; and, specifically, that in the department of fiction to the disappointment of the hopes aroused in the breast of the ambitious amateur by the substitution of the one-volume for the three-volume novel—a change which seemed to him and her, especially perhaps to her, to offer golden possibilities. We can only hope that the latter of these two explanations is as correct an account of the diminished issue of novels as the former doubtless is of the general reduction. For quiet, of course, will in due time take the place of the present agitations and lure the shy publisher into the market place once more; whereas the effect of the "disappointment" above referred to is likely to be permanent. Moreover, by the very hypothesis, it will operate mainly upon the least valuable, not to say the absolutely valueless variety, of fiction—a welcome circumstance, of which a mere decline in the number of novels would not of itself assure us, since, unhappily, in the struggle of novels for existence it is not necessarily the fittest that survive.

Few things present such an unknown quantity as a man's literary knowledge. The very word "knowledge" has a Philistine sound about it to the æsthete. An ignoramus need never be discomposed by the onslaught of the learned if he has skill and taste enough to conceal his mental vacuum. The scientific ignoramus can never so escape. If littérateur is a vague term to define, much more so is literary training, and Sir Lepel Griffin, K.C.S.I., in his lecture on "Literature and Science" to the Literary Club at Luton, published in the Asiatic Quarterly this month, boldly avoids recommending any particular books. His "one word of counsel" is "to make close and intimate friends of at least two books, the one prose, the other poetry." His own prose book was "Sartor Resartus," his poetry book Tennyson. De Quincey's choice was The Canterbury Tales, and the contrast suggests a striking peculiarity in the study of literature as opposed to that of science. In the sphere of the former two persons may make themselves equally happy, though the studies of one are in the fourteenth, of the other in the nineteenth century.

The lecturer thought that the pre-eminence of literature had diminished in the Victorian era owing to the development of physical science, and had much to say on the deadening influence of the struggle for wealth and material prosperity in the higher life, especially in America.

The old race of writers of distinction, such as Longfellow, Bryant, Holmes, and Washington Irving, have died out, and the Americans who are most prominent in cultivated European opinion in art or literature, like Sargent, Henry James, or Marion Crawford, live habitually out of America, and draw their inspiration from England, France, and Italy.

Certainly, excessive material prosperity—much more, to our thinking, than natural science—interferes with the growth of the highest kinds of literature; but we doubt whether Mr. W. D. Howells, who has followed recent American literature so carefully in these columns, would be quite prepared to agree with Sir Lepel's judgment.

The recent action of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, in sanctioning the reading and study of the history of Ireland by teachers and pupils of National Schools, has escaped notice in the Press. Yet it is a significant fact in the history of primary education in Ireland. The system of national education was established in Ireland in 1831 by the Whig Government of Earl Grey; and it is only now, after a lapse of sixty-eight years, that the Commissioners have been able to allow the study of Irish history in the schools. That the Commissioners have at last taken this step is due to two causes—first, the improvement in the relations between hitherto antagonistic classes and sects in Ireland; and secondly, that Irish history is now being written in the historical spirit, and not from the point of view of the political pamphleteer. The particular book adopted by the Commissioners is "A Child's History of Ireland," by Mr. P. W. Joyce, LL.D., a handsome volume of 507 pages containing over 160 illustrations, published by Messrs. Macmillan. The book is to be used as a reader for fifth and sixth classes.

At a recent meeting of the Library Assistants' Association, the question whether libraries should be allowed to buy reviewers' copies of new books was discussed. One reason urged against the practice was that they were defaced by pencil-marks, which would encourage future readers to add further notes and queries. Sir Walter Besant has pointed out, in the current number of the Author, that there are 670 libraries, and that usually about fifty copies of a book are sent out for review, of which thirty, perhaps, may be offered for sale, thus showing that the question is not a burning one.

Another point, however, is raised by "A Reviewer," who writes to us on the subject:—

I have been greatly interested in the question of pencil-marks in library books. I am, myself, strongly in favour of libraries buying reviewers' copies, at a fair price, and, if the pencilling of the critic will encourage the "general reader" to carry the matter further, so much the better. I have known many a book simply made by the marginal notes. I subscribe to Mudie solely with the view of following such markings, and by that means arriving at some idea of the point of view of the general reader which every critic should understand, so far as his mental equipment will permit. If I find a book I like, my method is to read it, review it myself, read some few other reviews, and then turn, a month later, to a copy from the library, and learn the important views of the real "consumer" from his or her interjected pencillings. A friend of mine, who shares this longing to read the heart of the reading public, travels on a suburban line in a second-class carriage, and enters into conversation with those ladies and gentlemen carrying books from their local libraries; he, too, has collected some data of interest, but I do not like his process. I am content with the marginalia which Mudie can give, and maintain mine is the royal road to the heart of the reading public. You may live for thirty years in Fleet-street and in places round about the Savile and yet never know the soul of the borrower of books, for whose edification all just persons write. Some time ago, when a book called "The Quest of the Golden Girl" was "reading well," as they say at Mudie's, I was delighted to find it to be one of those works which encourage the lead-pencil outpourings of the reader's soul. A passage which I had unsympathetically alluded to in a review as trite I found marked "How true"; a paragraph describing an ordinary experience of no æsthetic value to me was helped by the "Alas, yes, but how beautiful!" of the commentator. I have seen Hardy assisted in this way and George Meredith illuminated. I should like to give you some amusing examples but that they will form an article by themselves. I would, however, urge you to use your influence in making all libraries buy pencilled copies, at good prices, from reviewers, and thus the cult of marginal comment will be sustained, and the great work of showing the conscientious critic something of the heart of the people he tries to guide will be continued.

AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.

THE ENGLISH AND THE AMERICAN STORY.

The American Revolution. Part I.—1766-1776. By the Right Hon. Sir George Otto Trevelyan, Bart. 9 x 6 in., xi. + 468 pp. London, 1899. Longmans. 16/-

In this volume we have the first instalment of that narrative of the American struggle for independence, in which Sir George Trevelyan has decided to merge his continuation of "The Early History of Charles James Fox." His reasons for the step were informally explained some time ago, and he now restates them more fully in his preface. "The story of Fox between 1774 and 1782 is," he says, "inextricably interwoven with the story of the American Revolution. That immense event filled his mind and consumed his activities; while every circumstance about him worth relating may find a place in the course of the narrative which bears upon it. During that part of the great drama which was enacted within the walls of Parliament Fox was never off the stage; and, when there, he played a conspicuous and (as time went on) the leading part. What was done and spoken at Westminster cannot be rightly explained nor the conduct of British public men fairly judged without a clear and reasonably detailed account of that which occurred contemporaneously beyond the Atlantic." This, no doubt, is true enough, but it hardly proves more than that a biographer of Fox would fail to do his work adequately, or, perhaps, intelligibly, without frequent resort to the historical "excursus." We cannot feel that it quite justifies such a biographer in playing the pure historian throughout much the greater part of his volume, and only resuming his biographical functions at intervals in its remaining portion. In "The American Revolution," the incidents, both here and across the Atlantic, which led up to that great historical event, fill pretty nearly seven out of ten chapters, and it is only in the residuary three that the real, if not the nominal, hero of the book takes any part in them at all. Surely it would have been possible for Sir George Trevelyan to have summarized much that he has written with such fulness of detail, and thus to have left himself room for a welcome expansion of what he has been obliged to condense. Possibly in succeeding volumes, where Fox, as he puts it, is "never off the stage," the disproportion may be corrected; but the result thus far undoubtedly has been to give us a book which cannot but prove a little disappointing to the many admirers of "The Early History of Charles James Fox."

This, indeed, was inevitable. Sir George Trevelyan's forte, as is proved by a still more famous and successful performance than the work just mentioned, is biography. To that art he brings both the temperament and the aptitudes which it demands. Strong political partisan as he is, he has a hearty and healthy sympathy with humanity in its weaknesses as well as its strength; and Fox, whose intensely "human" characteristics make the Tory overlook his politics, as they almost make Sir George Trevelyan excuse his private vices, is an ideal subject for a biographer of such a kind. The resultant of Sir George's agreement with his hero's politics, his disapproval of his hero's morals, and his affection for his hero's lovable character, could hardly fail to keep him in the straight course of just appreciation; and, as a matter of fact, it was this "composition of forces" which lent so singular a fascination to the author's study of Fox's early political and social career. But, once out of the track of the biographer and in the groove of the Whig historian, Sir George Trevelyan is less agreeable reading. He seems to part with much of his independence of judgment and not a little of his freshness of style; and conventional praises of Whiggery and conventional denunciations of Toryism too often take the place of those pungent and original comments on men and things with which his writing in its better moments abounds. The ten-times-told story of the perversity of George III. and his Ministers is told for the eleventh time with all the proper expressions of regret and censure, but though these may without blame be left unmixed by an American historian, from an English writer we expect some attempt to place himself at the point of view of those Englishmen (and they were much more numerous than it is the fashion nowadays to assume) who, without being either bigots or tyrants, were in substantial agreement with King and Ministers as to the right, and—within limits—the policy, of taxing the colonies. Johnson's famous pamphlet may not be the most distinguished of his works, but a careful perusal of "Taxation no Tyranny" would be an exercise well worth recommending to some of our glib-tongued modern discourses on the "folly and wickedness" of their forefathers in "losing the American Colonies." And if, after reading Johnson's defence of the Ministerial policy, such persons will attempt to place themselves in the position, as regards economical views and theories of the "colonial" relation, which was occupied by the average Englishman of the late eighteenth century, they will find the argument of this vigorous advocate a very hard nut to crack. We are apt to forget nowadays that the question of taxing the colonies presented itself to the England of that day much more as a question of law than as one of policy. The possibility of enforcing the Imperial right, supposing it to exist, was, of course, assumed. That the effort to enforce it would lose us America was not quite so evident to those who lived before the event as it is to their supercilious descendants who enjoy the advantage of having been born a century after it. Nor does it much matter that some few Englishmen were wise—or lucky—prophets before the event, and predicted England's failure to coerce her rebellious subjects. Eighty odd years later, precisely the same representations were made, but this time erroneously, to the Government of the United States, when preparing to bring back the South to its allegiance by force of arms.

It is with unfeigned relief that we quit these unhappy and still embittered political controversies to return to Fox. For the period of his life through which Sir George Trevelyan has to conduct us in this and in the ensuing volume is that, perhaps, in which it is most agreeable for friend and foe alike to contemplate him. He was emerging from the follies and dissipations of his youth; he had been disciplined by political adversity, and was soon to be further chastened by domestic bereavements; above all he was engaged in a cause which we are now universally agreed to regard as the right one. The great personal qualities of the man—his courage, his generous enthusiasm, his utter singleness of mind and purpose—were at last beginning to impress even the most uncompromising of his adversaries. As Sir George Trevelyan well puts it:—

The esteem in which Fox was held most certainly did not in all quarters result from the blindness of partisanship. Men who observed him from the opposite benches in the House of Commons, if only they had an eye for what was good and great, gradually came to perceive that goodness with him was only a matter of time, and that greatness was there already. Gibbon, who eagerly sought his society, obtained enough of it in the course of that Parliament to make up his mind that Fox's character was as attractive as his abilities were commanding; and he never altered that opinion. "I admired," the historian wrote some years later on, "the power of a superior man blended with the softness and simplicity of a child. Perhaps no human being was ever more perfectly exempt from the taint of malevolence, vanity, and falsehood." . . . Samuel Johnson, who knew the young man well, and viewed him kindly and wisely, testified to his regard for him in a phrase which every well-wisher of Fox's reputation is delighted to recall. "The King," he said, "is my maeter, but Fox is my friend"; and the friendship of Johnson was a prize not lightly awarded, least of all, it may be added, to a "Whig dog."

His whole attitude during the initial stages of the dispute with America, and, indeed, throughout the entire struggle, was such as men of our own day, of whatever political opinions, can view with respect, if not with sympathy. A resolute and courageous supporter of the cause of the colonists, he never allowed his advocacy to degenerate into factious and unpatriotic partisanship; and Sir George Trevelyan remarks with legitimate pride upon the ardour with which, as soon as the struggle involved us in war with a European rival, he rallied to the Imperial side. Though he, in common with Chatham, looked upon the conflict with the American colonies as "a civil war in which no man was justified in ranking himself against those whom in his conscience he believed to be right," yet

When France stepped in, and our country was in danger, Fox took his place among the foremost—nay, it may be said as the foremost—of Britain's defenders; for no public man out of office has ever played so energetic and effective a part in the management of a great war. "Attack France," he cried, "for she is your first object. The war against America is against your own countrymen: that against France is against your inveterate enemy and rival." In a series of speeches replete with military instinct he argued in favour of assuming the offensive against the fresh assailants who came crowding in upon a nation which had already been fighting until it had grown weary and disheartened.

It is melancholy to think of the change which time and party spirit were destined to work in the statesman who could, in the very heat of a political controversy with the British Government, and, indeed, practically with the British nation, be thus promptly brought into line with his countrymen by the first menace of danger from a foreign foe. Truly, the Fox of 1793-1801 differed sadly from the Fox of 1774. We are glad to take leave of him in this earlier and happier phase of his political development, and not to anticipate the day when we shall find him almost openly rejoicing in every victory of our "inveterate enemy and rival."

The Story of the Revolution. By Henry Cabot Lodge. Two vols. Illustrated. 9½ x 6½ in., xv. + 324 + xii. + 286 pp.

London: Constable.
New York: Scribner. 32/-

It is significant of the trend of thought among the English-speaking peoples that within the last few weeks no fewer than five books, which deserve to be taken seriously, have been issued on questions connected with the history of the United States; and it is a fact worthy of no less attention that two at least of these are the work of Englishmen whose names are well known alike in literary and in historical studies. The two handsome volumes at the head of this notice we owe to the pen of that Senator with whom just three years ago were connected the more confident of those semi-official utterances which drew so much attention on this side of the Atlantic to the interpretation of the "Monroe Doctrine" then popular on the other. Recent events have somewhat modified the "textus receptus" on which Mr. Olney's famous despatches were based; and, as we shall see, the traces of a modification necessary under Mr. McKinley's Presidency are not absent towards the close of this volume, which must have been in preparation when the writer was considered to be the chosen repository of President Cleveland's special interpretation of the Doctrine.

Mr. Lodge's dedication runs as follows:—

"To the Army and Navy of the United States, victors of Manila, Santiago, and Porto Rico, worthy successors of the soldiers and sailors who, under the lead of George Washington, won American independence."

When these words are coupled with the personality of their writer, and with the sentiments expressed in those last pages which were evidently written under their immediate inspiration, we recognize a new starting-point in American historical literature. To none of Mr. Lodge's famous forerunners was it given to produce the story of their native land at a moment of victory over one of the proudest nations of the Old World, and of her expansion into wider spheres than ever came within the ken of the most far-sighted of her founders. One of the most striking results of the war that has just closed has been an increase of our sympathy with, and a better understanding of, American ideals and character, and Englishmen will approach Mr. Lodge's record of the "Revolution" with very different feelings from those with which either his political or his historical pronouncements would have been received a year ago. Unfortunately, Mr. Lodge's volumes do not quite justify these expectations. In his account of the beginnings of the Revolution, for instance, he hardly explains for English readers the two anomalies which make that uprising so unique. Sincere expressions of loyalty to King George occur in the very thick of battle with his armies, as Bancroft's history relates; the hesitation over a French alliance remains extreme, in spite of the fact that Hessians were fighting on the English side; the reluctance to issue the Declaration of Independence continues even after it became necessary to secure recognition abroad; the troops at Bunker's Hill receive with loud applause an announcement of the cause of fighting which carefully repudiates any intention of separating from the British Crown. This first anomaly is partly cleared up by the second, on which Mr. Lodge also leaves much unexplained. It is evident that the Americans revolted, not by choice, but by compulsion, and that they retained a loyalty to the forms of English government which the King alone refused to allow them to extend towards his person. This is shown by the almost pathetic joy with which the repeal of the Stamp Act was received. Professor Tyler, of Cornell University, in a book which is a remarkable example of the historical and descriptive powers expended by Americans on particular features of this great epoch, says, "Certainly, never before had all these American communities been so swept by one mighty wave of grateful enthusiasm and delight." They refused to recognize, for they had no means of realizing, that English ignorance and indifference which very few of their own historians have sufficiently emphasized.

The rejoicings over the repeal of the Stamp Act were not destined to last long. For King George actually looked upon the first attempts at conciliation as an act of inexpiable disloyalty. He never forgave their authors for endeavouring to save him from himself; and it is one of the bitterest ironies of history that in the name of Chatham, of the statesman whose wise views on the treatment of the colonies were as well known as was his popularity on both sides of the Atlantic, the step was taken which was responsible for everything from the Boston massacre to Yorktown, to the wholesale ruin of American loyalists, to an animosity which coloured American foreign policy for generations afterwards. The stupor with which the new Acts were received in the colonies can hardly be exaggerated. Yet, even then their representatives moved with the greatest circumspection. Samuel Adams revised seven times his letter of remonstrance sent by the Assembly of Massachusetts; he wrote as carefully another letter asking the other colonies for support; and then they prepared for the worst. Both his eloquence and his temperance were alike useless, for, in the opinion of King George, Massachusetts was a "centre of vulgar sedition bristling with trees of liberty; . . . where his enemies were clad in homespun, and his friends in tar and feathers." Among our own people of every degree the governing classes then understood America the least. This was due in great measure to the difficulties of communication. The young Franklin had to wait nearly a year in London for the one ship that made an annual trip between Philadelphia and the Thames. Adams, at the height of the war, hurrying to France with the best frigate in his service, took five and forty days from Boston to Bordeaux. Lord Carlisle journeyed for six weeks from port to port carrying the message of peace which seemed a matter of life and death to the Ministry which sent him. Then, in addition to the ignorance and malice of our colonial governors which were largely responsible for our misunderstanding of the colonies, there is, lastly, the fact that the higher an Englishman's rank, the less likely would he be to sympathize with his countrymen across the seas. The colonists were our absolute reverse in everything. They were, in fact, the direct descendants of those Puritan regiments who had crushed the Cavalier ancestors of the Georgian aristocracy. English people had been launched into a career of luxury and corruption, so thought Horne Tooke, by the connexion with India which had produced sudden and unbalanced wealth. Place-hunting and jobbery were rampant, and they paid exceedingly. That these nobles redeemed their blood by the gallant way in which they shed it, on every battlefield of Europe or the high seas, only made it still more unlikely that they would care to heal a quarrel born of misunderstanding by any arbitrament save that of war.

Mr. Lodge begins his story in Philadelphia, where its close, in October, 1781, was announced to those of the inhabitants who were yet awake by the watchman's cry of "Past three o'clock, and Lord Cornwallis taken!" Mr. Lodge there introduces us to Franklin, but he hardly emphasizes enough the vital importance of Franklin as the central figure of his epoch. Few things are more remarkable than the entire adequacy of these colonists to the extraordinary position in which they found themselves so suddenly. When the ardent young French nobles met them on American soil, these visitors from the capital that was the admitted arbiter of fashion in those days found nothing to censure, everything to admire. When these colonists, who had struggled against nature or the "merciless Indian savage" all their lives, came over to Paris, Kings and nobles were astonished to greet men of their own breeding, their own politeness, more than their match in diplomatic shrewdness. From the time when the first Continental Congress was summoned, through the days when he was Ambassador in France, to the triumphant signing of the treaty of peace, Franklin stands out as the type of all that made the American victory inevitable.

Mr. Lodge's pages are worthy of their more permanent dress, for they gather together a wealth of illustration and of historical interest that might have escaped notice in their more fugitive form. But they are not that contribution to serious history which the name and the opportunity of their author would have led his readers to expect; and they lack the wider view, the saner perspective, of Bancroft and of Motley. Hitherto the story of the struggle for independence has been only varied in American text-books by the still sadder tale of internecine strife, just as inevitable and far more bloody. The new era that has begun should signalize more to American historians than "the abandonment of isolation." In Mr. Lodge's last chapter he realizes something of the spirit that might well have informed his earlier pages—the spirit of the larger outlook, the truer sympathy, which will henceforth be the watchword, not only of future writers, but of all who read them. Mr. Lodge has done well to conclude his book with the magnificent phrases of the "Declaration of Independence," a political document whose value, merely as literature, has been far too little recognized in England.

MINOR ENGLISH WORTHIES.

Dictionary of National Biography. Edited by Sydney Lee. Vol. LVII., Tom—Tytler. 9½ x 6½ in., 461 pp. London, 1898. Smith, Elder. 15s. n.

The welcome which the public gives to the successive volumes, so regularly issued, of this Dictionary, and the satisfaction which they find in its extraordinary accuracy and completeness, tend to obscure the efforts, laborious and deserving as they were, of previous workers in the same field. The names of Tooke and Towers, which, with an immense number of the lesser lights of literature, occur in this volume, come to remind us of what the eighteenth century achieved in the work of National Biography. England did not show such enterprise as France in this matter. The famous "Biographia Britannica" appeared in 1747-1766. Joseph Towers, originally a stationer's errand boy apprenticed to one Goadby, was largely responsible for a new edition of it, which began to appear in 1778. But before this, Goadby, who, as Mr. Alexander Gordon, the writer of Towers' life, rather quaintly says, "made him an Arian," also provided him with a more definite and lucrative employment in the compilation of a "British Biography" (1766-1772), of which he edited seven volumes mainly founded on the "Biographia Britannica." Meanwhile the Rev. William Tooke, the historian of Russia, had been working as principal editor on a "New and General Biographical Dictionary," which saw the light, in fifteen volumes, exactly a hundred years ago. His son William, who became president of the Society of Arts, had also a good deal to do with the "Biographia Britannica Literaria." Fourteen years after the Rev. W. Tooke's work, Chalmers took the field with his thirty-two volumes of a "General Biographical Dictionary."

We are, of course, now in a vastly better position, on the whole, for obtaining complete and accurate information about our country's worthies in the past, even though we are further off them than were Towers, Tooke, and Chalmers. The true value of personal records, such as can be nowadays compiled, has never been illustrated so well as in this volume. It treats almost entirely of minor celebrities who have in some form or other held the public eye, and the only lives which approach greatness are those which come under the names of Tyndale, Townshend, Turner, and Trollope. Great statesmen, ecclesiastics, and soldiers are notably absent, but on every page we are treading some curious by-path of history. The great ones of the earth, as their names travel down the years, seldom lack recognition; their achievements are recorded in volumes under which our shelves already groan. There is far more human interest in the life stories of those whom an ungrateful world has forgotten, or the over-burdened historian neglected. These are marshalled before us again by the Dictionary of National Biography. Of many the lives have never been written before. In these clear, concise paragraphs we can follow the part they played in the course of history, in social movements, or in the progress of learning—a part often not the less valuable because others have reaped its fruit—and renew once more the fame of which through the din of succeeding years we can catch now but the faintest echo or none at all.

There happen, as we have mentioned, to be within these alphabetical limits an extraordinary number of names bearing in some way or another on the history of English literature, either as makers of it themselves, or as the cause of it in others. First there is Toy, one of the early English printers, who died in 1556. Then we have three great publishers—Tottel, the law publisher, who kept his famous house of business at Temple Bar in the reign of Edward VI., and gave us, in his "Miscellany," all we now know of the poetry of Wyatt and Surrey; Jacob Tonson, who had a shop close by, a century later, and followed Tottel's example in publishing a "Miscellany" of poems, who published for Dryden, Addison, and Steele, and founded a famous and prosperous house of business, having made more, so he said, by "Paradise Lost" (of which he was not the original publisher) than by any other poem; and, lastly, Trübner, in our own century, whose services to learning, and especially Oriental learning, were recognized throughout the world—"a rare combination of scholar, author, and publisher." Among others who have helped rather than created literature we have Lawrence Twyne, whose "Pattern of Painefull Adventures" probably suggested the subject of the Shakespearian play "Pericles"; Sir William Trumbull, Secretary of State under William III., the patron of Dryden and Pope, who suggested to the latter "Windsor Forest" as the subject of a poem; Thomas Tyrwhitt, the editor of Chaucer, and one of the greatest critics of the last century—who, if he did not help to produce literature, did a negative service, perhaps as valuable, by exposing Chatterton's "Rowley" Forgeries; and Joseph Train, whose life's work it was to supply the antiquarian material ready to be touched by the magician's wand of Scott.

Turning to authors, we find an immense list of the minor names, of which we can only indicate a few. The lesser playwrights are represented by Cyril Tourneur, author (in 1607) of the powerful and passionate "Revenger's Tragedy," of which Lamb wrote, "I never read it but my ears tingle"; Tomkins, the forgotten writer of a College comedy called "Albumazar" (1615), which Garrick revived in 1747; Sir S. Tuke, a Royalist playwright who wrote "The Adventures of Five Hours," a play that delighted Pepys, although it was "without one word of ribaldry"; and James Townley, headmaster of Merchant Taylors', and the amusing author of "High Life Below Stairs," which George Selwyn said was a relief from "low life above stairs." The Poets give us Aurelian Townshend, a lyrical poet "undeservedly neglected" of the Court of Charles I.; the later and inferior singer, Chauncey Townshend, the friend of Southey; Turberville, an Elizabethan scholar-poet, and "a pioneer in the use of blank verse"; Archbishop Trench, and Charles Tennyson Turner. Among hymn-writers, too, we have Toplady and Tuttielt. Scholars, historians, and antiquaries, especially the latter, seem, oddly enough, to be all crowded in between Tom and Tytler—Trevisa (1326-1412), one of the lights of Early English prose; Toup, the great classical scholar of the last century; Tremellius, the Hebraist; Trivet and Trokelowe, monastic chroniclers of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries; Twysden; Fraser and William Tytler; Sharon and Dawson Turner, and many others. Among "thinkers" we find Horne Tooke, Abraham Tucker, Sir Travers Twiss, Principal Tulloch, and—shall we add?—Martin Tupper. Nor must we forget Mrs. Trimmer and Miss Tucker (A. L. O. E.). Another curious feature of this volume is the number of musicians to be found in it—Tomkins—"of a family which produced more musicians than any other family in England"; Christopher Tye, Travers, Tudway, Tunsted, Turle, W. Turner, Berthold Tours. Last in the long procession—a place which is at least ceremonially correct—we may note the greater names: Anthony Trollope and J. M. W. Turner, admirably done by Dr. Garnett (who also deals with Mrs. T. A. Trollope) and Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse respectively; the second Viscount Townshend, Carteret's rival, by Mr. J. M. Rigg; Charles Townshend, "wit and statesman," and Thomas Townshend, first Viscount Sydney, by Mr. A. F. Pollard; and George Townshend, the first Marquis, by Mr. R. Dunlop. Biographies of much personal interest are those of Professor Tyndall, by his widow; of Arnold Toynbee, by Sir Alfred Milner; and of Sir George Tryon, by Professor Laughton.

BRAID SCOTS.

Scottish Vernacular Literature: A Succinct History.
By T. N. Henderson. 7½ x 5½ in., viii. + 462 pp. London, 1898.
Nutt. 6/-

Mr. Henderson's "Scottish Vernacular Literature" is a book of great merit and interest, and unique in its field. The language is first described; it is not "the language of Ossian," as the English journalist is apt to suppose, nor "a darkened dialect of Anglified Erse," as the Quarterly Review declared apropos of "The Antiquary." It is English of Northumbria, with modifications caused by the French Alliance and other circumstances. Incidentally we wonder who Mr. Henderson supposes the Picts to have been, as he talks of "subtle linguistic forces, Cymric, Pictish, Gaelic, Norse, French." Was Pictish not Gaelic, and, if not, what was Pictish? Nobody knows. Where he says that "the old Scoto-Pictish dynasty became virtually Saxonized," we ask what the Saxons are doing in that galère? That the Reformation "smothered" vernacular literature, that Presbyterian "superstition" "strangled" it, might be denied. The earliest Reformers, as Erskine of Dun, introduced Greek, which Knox's successor, Melville, taught, whereas the old faith had resisted Hellenic studies. So far, the Reformation was aiding literature, but partly Puritanism, partly the Anglophile tendencies of Knox and his faction, partly the removal of the Court, when James VI. crossed the Border, all combined to depress literature in the vernacular. Still, we presume that there is merit in "The Gude and Godlie Ballates," though, after all, it is inconspicuous. The Reformation nipped in the bud the Scottish Renaissance, though it brought in Greek.

Mr. Henderson's chapter on the early scraps of popular poetry is excellent, but the scraps are so few. The mysterious Rhymer and Huchown are tersely and lucidly handled. By the way, the Rhymer's prophecy of a tempest for the day on which Alexander III. died was literally as well as figuratively fulfilled. The Lanercost Chronicler says that he never was out of doors on so awful a day. True Thomas was weatherwise. On Barbour Mr. Henderson is brief, but adequate. More selections might be desirable. As to the "glaring error" of rolling three Bruces into one, it is also made by Baker of Swinbrook, writing earlier than Barbour ("Chronicon Galfridi de Wynebroke. Maunde Thompson, pp. 38, 39), and we observe no correction by Baker's editor. How both Barbour and Baker came to write such nonsense it is impossible to guess, nor does Mr. Henderson refer to Baker. As to Bruce's "patriotism" and "inconsistencies," Sir Herbert Maxwell and Sir F. Palgrave have said all that is needed. Till he committed a sacrilegious murder Bruce was the basest of a base set of politicians. As to Blind Harry, if he had no book by Blair, Wallace's chaplain, before him, how could he cite a passage where Blair drops the pen, and a comrade takes it up, because Blair cannot narrate certain feats of his own? Harry must have been "inventious" (a queer word of Mr. Henderson's) if he invented all this. Perhaps Mr. Henderson will be so "insinuating" as to say that Harry was thus "inventious." Mr. Henderson's style is naturally unaffected; "inventive" and "insinuating" are quite good enough for him; he needs no pinchbeck on his cloth of frieze. As to Wallace stealing the widow's beer at Perth "in his youth," we scout the idea. "In his youth"—it was the year before his year of glory! The charge occurs against "William Wallace, thief," in an English gaol-delivery at Perth. But an accomplice of Wallace the thief was Matthew of York, who pleaded his clergy. Now, was the national hero likely to be priggish ale in company with a clerk of the hated English race? As to "The King's Quair," Mr. Henderson, like M. Jusserand, seems to us to make a valid reply to the sceptical argument of Mr. J. T. T. Brown. As to Henryson's "Cressid," we think that Mr. Henderson does no justice to the wonderful romantic pathos of the great scene by a poet of his own clan or house. He is "seldom or never nobly pathetic," the poet of the meeting between Troilus and the fallen Cressid! Is not—we "ask for information"—the relation between Alain Chartier and "The Complaynt of Scotland" rather a new discovery, and is it Mr. Henderson's own?

Thus, did space permit, we might follow the author through his admirable work, assenting or dissenting. But we have not even space for a controversy over the ballads. Their origin can only be determined in the light of knowledge of all the popular poetry and Märchen of the world, and we do not know that Mr. Henderson has studied those things—in the results and in the making—from Finland to the Morea, or among savage races. Judging by his remarks, we conceive that he has not. His theory of Sir Patrick Vans, as the original of Sir Patrick Spens, is interesting; even more so his theory that Scott wrote, or rewrote after Hogg, the best verses of Otterbourne. But was Sir Walter the man to quote his own poetry in two of the most deeply emotional crises of his life; first, when bequeathing his leadership to Lockhart, in view of death; next, when close to death, after visiting the tombs of the Douglasses? Would Sir Walter, of all men, quote himself in these moments? We leave the answer to Mr. Henderson, and his book to the good will of all lovers of good books.

CATHERINE SFORZA.

Catherine Sforza. By Count Pier Desiderio Pasolini. Authorized Edition, Translated and Prepared, with the assistance of the Author, by Paul Sylvester. Illustrated with numerous Reproductions from Original Pictures and Documents. 9x6in., 302 pp. London, 1898. Heinemann. 16/-

"Wise, brave, great, with a full, beautiful face; speaking little. She wore a tan satin gown with two ells of train, a large black velvet hat in the French mode, a man's belt whence hung a bag of gold ducats and a curved sword; and among the soldiers, both horse and foot, she was much feared, for that armed lady was fierce and cruel."

This is Catherine Sforza, according to Cerretani, in her early womanhood, when the fighting blood in her veins was beginning to have its way. It is a dramatic little picture, and one that presents an almost ludicrous contrast to the Palmezzani portrait of the frontispiece. Anything less like either truculence or superlative beauty would be hard to find. The portrait might represent the well-bred offspring of an Early Victorian Mrs. Grundy, instead of the natural daughter of Galeazzo Maria Sforza, ruffian and libertine, though, indeed, she was no daughter of his in the worst sense. Relentless she might be, but not wantonly ferocious (except, indeed, in her revenge on the murderers of Feo); passionate, but not unbridled in licentiousness. A more picturesque career than hers would be far to seek—married at fourteen to Girolamo Riario, the unspeakable "nephew" of Pope Sixtus IV.; freed from him by his assassination eleven years later; plunged single-handed into fresh danger and difficulty; emerging triumphant by the sheer force of her own unscrupulous courage in strategy. She had the same effect on her lovers as Mary Stuart. Riario was assassinated, Giacomo Feo was assassinated, and Giovanni de Medici only survived his marriage with her for a short time, dying in 1498. After his death came her worst years, bringing with them her long imprisonment in the castle of St. Angelo. Then comparative peace. And on the 28th of May, 1509, Catherine Sforza died, aged forty-six. Did ever woman pack more of life into forty-six years?

It seems ungracious to point out blemishes in Count Pasolini's painstaking work. He is undoubtedly right in stating that Bona of Savoy did not die in 1494, as older writers have imagined; but he has overlooked a study of her last years which appeared in the "Archivio Storico Italiano," as long ago as 1870, and which proves that she died at Fossano on November 17, 1503. Again, the portrait of the Empress Bianca Maria is assigned to Leonardo da Vinci as though no doubt existed on the subject, whereas competent judges in recent years have assigned it to Ambrogio de Predis (see Calvi, "Bianca Maria Sforza-Visconti," 1888, page 38). When two stout volumes are compressed into a single volume of less bulk than either, we are prepared for economy of space. But one would have thought that the provenance of the illustrations might have been indicated in the English edition, as it is in the Italian, without any great sacrifice. And where a facsimile is reduced, as on page thirty-five, to the extent of omitting nearly half the original, there should surely be some indication of the omission. The document in question is an autograph letter by Girolamo Riario, which, as it stands, has a faux air of being complete and unabridged.

The translator has done his work pleasantly and well. Beyond occasional misrenderings, such as "orator" for "envoy" or "ambassador," he gets both the sense and the spirit of his original. And such a subject as his would have to be far worse handled than he is capable of handling it to be anything but deeply interesting.

"CHATTER ABOUT JANE."

Last Links with Byron, Shelley, and Keats. By William Graham. 8½x5½in., xx. + 121 pp. London, 1898. Smithers. 6/-

We cannot think that Mr. Graham has been well advised in serving up this réchauffée—with additions—of the two chapters of belated scandal which, through the indulgence or inadvertence of its editor, he was permitted to give to the world some years ago in the pages of a leading monthly review. The original dish was not a savoury one, and it is not made any more palatable by the new ingredients which have now been added to it. The original publication, in 1893-94, of the "Chats with Jane Clairmont" was, in our opinion, a deplorable indiscretion; and that its author should have repeated it five years afterwards, with mysterious promises of being still more indiscreet in ten years' time, when a certain pledge of secrecy will have lapsed, is still more to be regretted. His success in obtaining the materials of these "disclosures" does not strike us as particularly surprising. It has, he says, been several times remarked to be singular that "at the early age of twenty he should have been on sufficiently intimate terms with Miss Clairmont to have gained her confidence to the extent he did"; and in a passage which for dignity and good taste may be taken as representative of his own personal share in the volume, he explains it thus:—

As regards my age, that was probably a good deal in my favour, for I may say without vanity now that I was a decidedly good-looking boy in those days, with dark, curly locks clustering over a marble brow, as the old novels put it, instead of, as now, a wisp of dingy grey fringing a wide expanse where all is brow.

It appears to us, however, that the fascination of Mr. Graham's youthful appearance—on which we would not be understood to cast the shadow of a doubt—is hardly needed to account for the fluent confidences of an extremely vain and garrulous old lady who knew that she was being interviewed for the purpose of publication at a future date. The spectacle, however, of this octogenarian dame recounting the irregular amours of her girlhood to even the curliest-headed and most marble-browed youth of twenty is not exactly a gracious one; nor does it gain in attractiveness from Mr. Graham's style as a reporter:—

"Have you never loved, Madame?" I asked.

A delicate blush suffused her cheeks, and this time she made no reply, gazing on the ground.

"Shelley?" I murmured.

"With all my heart and soul," she replied, without moving her eyes from the ground.

And the delicate question of her supposed transfer of her affections from Byron to Shelley is thus delicately handled:—

"I was thinking of a line of Shakespeare's."

"And the line?"

"Methinks the lady doth protest too much."

"You impertinent boy! If you do not believe what I tell you, why traverse Europe to see me?"

"There are things, Madame," I said, "which it is the duty of every man to believe when told him by a lady, and I have conquered my scepticism. I remember you told me Shelley was a devoted student of Plato."

Two smart boxes on the ear were the only reply I received to this. A sorry return indeed for obedience and faith.

The really important question, however, is not as to the taste and propriety of these reported conversations, but as to their bearing on biographical truth, and the justice of publishing, unsifted, the statements contained in them which reflect upon persons no longer able to answer for themselves. Of course, Miss Clairmont's account of matters may be absolutely trustworthy, even where it is most opposed to received beliefs. It may be the fact that the Shelleys were aware and approved of Jane Clairmont's intrigue with Byron before their migration with her to Geneva; we agree with Mr. Graham that there was nothing in their opinions on the institution of matrimony to render such privacy improbable. It may be again that Miss Clairmont was in fact, as she asserted, the cause of the Byron separation; and that her statement as to the way in which her liaison with the husband was brought to the knowledge, and employed to provoke the resentment, of the wife is strictly truthful. But the fact remains that these and other allegations were sprung upon the world more than half a century after the deaths of the persons whom they affect, and that they rest on the authority of an irresponsible, not to say flighty, old lady who goes far to discredit her own evidence in advance by the very fact of her willingness to unbosom herself on these extremely delicate, and sometimes painful matters to a youth of twenty and a perfect stranger.

PICTURE GALLERIES.

Lectures on the National Gallery. By J. P. Richter. With Numerous Illustrations. 67 pp. London, New York, and Bombay, 1898. Longmans. 9/-

This attractive volume is Dr. Richter's latest contribution to the scientific branch of art criticism, of which he is a leading exponent. It consists of three lectures on certain groups of pictures by Italian masters in the National Gallery, delivered at the Royal Institution last February, and now published with illustrations which enable us to compare the paintings in question for ourselves, and which, it must be owned, go far to justify the conclusions he has formed.

First of all, our author examines the works of Trecento artists in which the gallery is especially rich. Among them is the altarpiece ascribed to Cimabue, a master who was formerly extolled as the founder of the Florentine school, and who certainly enjoyed a high reputation in his own day, as Dante's well-known lines testify. But when we come to consider the works that bear this master's name, and ask for some genuine example of his style, we get little or no satisfaction. Dr. Richter pronounces the works ascribed to Cimabue, both in the Louvre and National Gallery, to be school-pieces from the workshop of Duccio, the Sienese master, while Professor Wichhoff expresses a doubt whether any pictures by Cimabue are now in existence, and Mr. Berensen's omission of this master's name from his list of Florentine masters tacitly points to the same conclusion. Before the relentless march of the Kunstforscher the most cherished traditions of the past and the fondest illusions of our youth are alike doomed to vanish. We all of us know the old story, first told by Vasari and repeated by every art-historian in turn, of the great Madonna by Cimabue, which was borne through the streets of Florence with the sound of trumpets and such loud rejoicing that this quarter of the city was ever afterwards called by the name of Borgo Allegro. And many have visited the dark chapel in Santa Maria Novella, where the famous picture still hangs over the altar of the Rucellai family. Now we are told that the story is one of Vasari's fables, and that the picture itself is the work not of the Florentine Cimabue, but of the Sienese Duccio. Dr. Richter insists on the striking similarity that exists, both in types and colouring, between this altarpiece and the Majestas which the great Siena master painted for the Duomo of his own city, and supports his contention by a document, from which it appears that a Florentine guild commissioned Duccio to paint an altarpiece of the Madonna and Child for this very church of Santa Maria Novella in the year 1285. Duccio's Majestas, we know, was also borne through the streets of Siena in triumph, and it may be that Vasari transferred the story from one city to the other, or that the incident was repeated at Florence in the case of the Rucellai altarpiece. But in the face of this evidence, it has become difficult for any future writer to maintain that the picture in Santa Maria Novella is the work of Cimabue.

Dr. Richter's second lecture deals with early Venetian art, and more especially with Giovanni Bellini's works in the National Gallery. We commend to the reader's notice his thoughtful description of the little picture known as "The Blood of the Redeemer" (No. 1,033), but better entitled "Salvator Mundi," a work which, in its mystical meaning and exquisite detail, is eminently characteristic of Giovanni's early style and of the religious art of the age. No less worthy of note is the passage in which the writer draws out the close connexion between the Venetian master and his brother-in-law, Andrea Mantegna, in the early days when they painted together at Padua. The drawing made by Bellini for the saints in the celebrated altarpiece of San Zeno at Verona, which Dr. Richter was fortunate enough to discover at Chatsworth, shows how much Andrea owed to Giovanni, while a comparison of the two painters' versions of "The Agony in the Garden" reveals the distinctive qualities of their genius, and, to our mind, establishes the incontestable superiority of the Venetian master over the mighty Paduan. But we regret that Dr. Richter attempts to minimize the influence which Jacopo Bellini exercised in the development of his more illustrious son, an influence which no one familiar with the wonderful sketch-books of the Louvre and British Museum could, we should have thought, have failed to realize.

The last section of the book is devoted to Sandro Botticelli. This fascinating master, whose poetic invention and passionate sincerity of emotion have laid their powerful spell on the present generation, was, Dr. Richter reminds us, a very popular artist in his own day. Yet, in the sudden revolution of taste that took place in the next century, he was quickly forgotten, and it is only during the last thirty years that a reaction in his favour has set in. The true explanation of Botticelli's so-called "Temptation of Christ" in the Sistine chapel is here given as recently discovered by Dr. Steinmann. This fresco is, in reality, a representation of the sacrifice offered in the temple for the cleansing of a leper, under the law of Moses, and the Franciscan hospital of Santo Spirito, which had lately been restored by Pope Sixtus, himself a friar of the order, is introduced in the background. Although the tondo (No. 275) is now recognized as the work of Sangallo and the Assumption (No. 1,126) painted for Matteo Palmieri is plainly executed by inferior hands, Botticelli is still represented in the National Gallery by two first-rate examples, the "Mars and Venus," which, like the "Birth of Venus" and the "Spring," once adorned the Medici villa, and "The Nativity," from the Fuller-Maitland collection. Dr. Richter is, no doubt, right in describing the former as an illustration of Poliziano's "Giostrea," that courtly poem written to celebrate the Tournament held in honour of Lorenzo's brother. The sleeping youth who goes by the name of Mars is Giuliano himself, the mighty hunter whom we see resting in woodland shades, sunk in deep slumber, while boy-satyrs whisper dreams in his ear, and the white-robed maiden who appears to him is not Venus the Queen of Love, but his own mistress, la bella Simonetta. Vasari tells us, in his contemptuous manner, how Sandro Botticelli, the court painter of the Medici, was seized in his old age with the piagnone frenzy and gave up painting to illustrate Savonarola's sermons or decorate processional banners. But, in point of fact, many of the master's best works belong to this period and bear the stamp of Savonarola's teaching. Chief among them is the mystic Nativity which he painted, as we learn from the Greek inscription first interpreted by Mr. Sidney Colvin, at the end of 1600, two years and a-half after the death of Fra Girolamo. Choirs of exultant seraphs circle in the air, dangling gold crowns and waving olive branches as they sing the Gloria in excelsis, and in the foreground devils crawl away to hide among the rocks while angels welcome the martyred Friar and his companions with rapturous embraces. For these, Sandro tells us, are the witnesses who were slain for the faith "in fulfilment of the words spoken in the Eleventh of St. John and the Second Woe of the Apocalypse."

THE TATE GALLERY.

Mr. Edward T. Cook's POPULAR HANDBOOK TO THE TATE GALLERY (Macmillan, 5s. n.) is a companion volume to the author's excellent work on the National Gallery; and, if it is less interesting reading, it is the fault of the subject-matter rather than that of the author. As before, Mr. Cook goes for guidance to Mr. Ruskin, wherever this is practicable, and reproduces for us his always inspiring, if occasionally misleading, criticism. The extreme modernness of much of the contents of the gallery obliges Mr. Cook to embody many other less interesting judgments, but among these we do not include those for which he is personally responsible. On the contrary, these are as remarkable for insight as for discretion, and are written, as they should be in a popular catalogue, so that "he who runs," or walks, "may read."

The Tate Gallery now contains three distinct collections, besides what may not be improperly described as a draft from the national collection in Trafalgar-square. The first of these is the Tate gift, including some of the most popular works of Hook, Riviere, Fildes, Orchardson, and Waterhouse, and a representative collection of Millais', lately perfected by the addition of the incomparable "Order of Release." Next comes the Chantrey Collection, which is valuable not only in itself, but because it gauges the art views of the Royal Academy, the selection of pictures to be purchased having been confided, under the terms of Chantrey's will, to the President and Trustees of that much-abused institution. The arrangement has not worked badly, though, as Mr. Cook points out in his lucid prefatory sketch, there are notable omissions, the names of Burne-Jones, Holman Hunt, and Whistler being all conspicuous by their absence. The average cost of a Chantrey picture is, we are told, £615; but we note with satisfaction the purchase last year, for the small price of a hundred guineas, of the admirable painting of a young golden-haired girl in deep mourning, seated in an oak-panelled room, which won well-deserved praise at the Royal Academy. It is the work of Mr. R. Peacock, an artist whose name is not widely known outside the studios. The third collection consists of the seventeen famous allegories which their creator, Mr. G. F. Watts, presented to the nation. The draft from the National Gallery is made up, if we exclude a few small Constables and Wilkies, mainly of works of the early Victorian era.

Mr. Cook not only deals with all the painters in turn as we meet them on the walls, but furnishes a series of highly-compressed but brilliant sketches of the several groups to which they belong—the early Victorians, the Pre-Raphaelites, and the so-called modern British school. In this connexion he calls attention to the apparent divergence in the opinions of two distinguished French critics, M.M. de la Sizeranne and Ernest Chesneau, the former declaring that on entering an international exhibition the fact that there is an English school is what first strikes one; the latter that, strictly speaking, there is no such thing as a school of English art. But, of course, as Mr. Cook points out, the paradox is merely on the surface. M. Chesneau finds the essentials of a school in community of tradition, process, colour, and design; M. de la Sizeranne finds those essentials in the temperament, the individualism, the seriousness of intention, the love of the same things, even the almost anarchical indifference to uniformity of method. A good illustration of our racial peculiarities will be found in the English painting of animals, as illustrated here by Landseer and Herring, Briton Riviere, and Davis, each of whom has painted animal life excellently, while to each it has made its appeal from a different side. But all illustrate the truth of Mr. Ruskin's dictum, that "we have a sympathy with the lower animals that is peculiarly our own."

CLASSICAL GREEK.

The Successors of Homer. By W. C. Lawton. 7½ × 5¼ in., 201 pp. London, 1898. Innes. 5/-

Sketches of the Greek Dramatic Poets. By Charles Haines Keene, M.A., Dublin. 8½ × 5¼ in., 121 pp. London, 1898. Blackie. 3/6

From these two volumes English readers unfamiliar with the original Greek may get as good an idea as is possible under such circumstances of the character and contents of the post-Homeric epic and the masterpieces of Greek drama. The term "Cyclic" poet, used to distinguish the later epic writers from Homer, is derived from the so-called "Epic cycle," which was, strictly speaking, a prose compilation of abstracts from those epics. The compilers were called "cyclic" writers, and the term was transferred to the epic poets whom they used. Professor Lawton gives a very clear sketch, illustrated here and there by English verse translations, of the different kinds of later Greek hexameter poetry—viz., the "Cyclic" epics, introducing, connecting, and completing the two Homeric masterpieces; the Hesiodic Poems ("Works and Days," "Theogony," &c.), representing a school of didactic and theological poetry; the "Homeric Hymns," none of them Homeric, and most of them merely preludes to recitation from the great epics; and the philosophical treatises of the sixth and fifth centuries B.C.—Xenophanes, Parmenides, and Empedocles. The Iliad and Odyssey, we see from Professor Lawton's pages, fit into a connected series of poems dealing with the "tale of Troy divine"—viz., Kypria, Iliad, Æthiopis, Little Iliad, Ἰλίου περίοδος, Nostoi, Odyssey, Telegonia; the chief importance of the lost epics (known mainly from the prose summaries of Proclus) being as evidence (by their imitations of and connexions with the older poems) that the Iliad and Odyssey were in the eighth century B.C. essentially as we have them now. The philosophic hexameter writers are generally, for literary purposes, dismissed as dreary dry-as-dusts, glorified and eclipsed by their Roman adapter, Lucretius. But Empedocles seems, if we may judge from some of Professor Lawton's citations, to have rivalled Lucretius himself in the picturesque vigour of some of his similes. For scholars, as well as for those who cannot read Greek authors in the original, this book may be commended as an introduction to the little studied period of Greek literature between Homer and Æschylus.

Professor Keene's "Sketches" of the great Greek dramatists and their works are slight, but not uninteresting, and are as good as any other attempts that we have seen to put before minds ignorant of Greek "Quid Sophocles et Thespis et Æschylus utile ferrent." In a final chapter on "The Classical and Romantic Drama" Professor Keene maintains that the supposed identification of the "classical" element in the drama with the doctrine of the "unities" of time, place, and action is not borne out by the facts of Greek Tragedy; and that the unity of action (the only one on which Aristotle lays much stress) is the only really necessary law of the drama. There is something rather profitless and unreal about these abstract and academic discussions, however necessary they may be to a scientific study of the dramatic art. The approval or disapproval of the individual spectator or reader of a play of Sophocles or Shakespeare depends very little upon the observance of the "unities."

TRANSLATIONS.

The Iliad of Homer. Rendered into English Prose for those who cannot read the Original, by Samuel Butler. 7½ × 5 in., xvi. + 421 pp. London, New York, and Bombay, 1898. Longmans. 7/6 n.

Bacchylides. A Prose Translation, by E. Poste, M.A. 7½ × 5 in., 39 pp. London and New York, 1898. Macmillan. 2/-

Mr. Samuel Butler has two theories of translation, which, to some scholars, will detract from the merits of his praiseworthy attempt at a prose translation of the Iliad—viz., that the idiom employed should be that of the translator's own day, with no attempt at archaism, and that the Latinized names of gods and heroes (Jove, Juno, Venus, Vulcan, &c.) are preferable to the proper Greek names, Zeus, Here, Aphrodite, Hephæstus. The first of these results in some sacrifice of the dignity at which even a prose translation of Homer should aim, and which to many ears is best attained by a flavour of Biblical or Shakespearian English. The second ignores the conclusions of the best modern scholarship, and perpetuates the old mistaken notion that the Roman deities were borrowed from, and simply identical with, those of Greece, and that their names were interchangeable, so that it did not matter whether one spoke of Here or Juno, the more familiar name being preferable. Comparison with other translators is not a satisfactory kind of criticism; but Mr. Butler challenges it in his preface, quoting for this express purpose the opening paragraphs of Mr. Leaf's translation, not altogether to his own advantage. Thus in vv. 6, 7, "From the day on which the son of Atreus, king of men, and great Achilles first fell out with one another" (διαστήτην ἐπιδαντς), is surely inferior to "From the day when strife first parted Atreides, king of men, and noble Achilles." In v. 21, Mr. Butler, as often, deliberately omits the constans epitheton ἐκὼλον ("far-darting"), and boils down Homer's sounding line ἀζόμενοι Διὸς νιδὸν ἐκὼλον Ἀπόλλωνα into "In reverence for Apollo, son of Jove." These are examples, which might be multiplied indefinitely, of the weak points in Mr. Butler's version. But it is not all weak. His rendering, for instance, of the famous description of the Trojan watchfires in viii. 555, sqq., is distinctly spirited :—

As when the stars shine clear, and the moon is bright—there is not a breath of air, not a peak nor glade nor jutting headland but it stands out in the ineffable radiance that breaks from the serene of heaven : the stars can all be told, and the heart of the shepherd is glad—even thus shone the watchfires of the Trojans before Ilius, midway between the ships and the river Xanthus. A thousand camp-fires gleamed upon the plain, and in the glow of each there sat fifty men, while the horses, champing oats and corn beside their chariots, waited till dawn should come.

Except for the omission of the epithets in κρί λευκὸν and ἰθὺρον ἦν, there is not much fault to find here. Let us see how our translator can rise to the spirit of Sarpedon's speech to Glaucus before the Achæan wall (xii. 322, sqq.) :—

My good friend, if, when we were once out of this fight, we could escape old age and death thenceforward and for ever, I should neither press forward myself nor bid you do so, but death in ten thousand shapes hangs ever over our heads, and no man can elude him ; therefore, let us go forward, and either win glory for ourselves or yield it to another.

Here "my good friend" strikes a prosaic note, which is too well maintained. Οὐτε κε σὲ στέλλοιμ μάχην ἐς κυδιανείραν is poorly and baldly rendered by "Nor bid you do so." The iteration in ἄς οὐκ ἔστι φυγεῖν βροτὸν οὐδ' ὑπαλύξαι is ignored in the single word "elude" ; and the emphatic ἴομεν ("On, then !") becomes sadly unemphatic in "Therefore let us go forward." As a whole, Mr. Butler's version is respectable, but hardly striking ; and his practice of omitting the characteristic Homeric epithets is an almost unpardonable heresy.

Bacchylides, as compared with Homer, is virgin soil for the translator, the poems, as is well known, having been only recently brought to light from an Egyptian papyrus. Mr. Poste's prose version is graceful and accurate ; and a short introduction to each ode indicates its occasion and main subject. The following passage from Ode I. upon an Olympian victory of Hiero, tyrant of Syracuse (celebrated also by Pindar), is a fair specimen :—

High aloft, cleaving the depths of ether with fleet tawny wings, the eagle, messenger of Zeus, wide-ruling thunderer, boldly travels, confident in matchless might, where lesser warblers fear to venture. Neither peaks of the vasty earth nor dangerous billows of the ever-restless main stay him, but onward through the abyss of heaven with fine-spun plumage he sweeps, his sole companion Zephyr, conspicuous to mortal gaze.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

IN MYSTERIES OF POLICE AND CRIME (Cassell, 21s.), Major Arthur Griffiths has not only produced a most readable book, but has also done a considerable public service. Here we have Bentham and Austin, Spencer and Lombroso—the psychologist, the social philosopher, the theoretical lawyer, preaching by means of examples. The book is much better described by its second subordinate title than by that which appears on its cover. It is by no means a string of sensational detective stories : it is much more truly "a general survey of wrongdoing and its pursuit." And it provides not only, as we should expect, a treasure-house for writers of fiction which is often strangest when "founded on fact," but a mine of instruction on the criminal type—or rather on the question whether such a type exists ; on undercurrents of social life ; on national peculiarities ; on principles of punishment ; on the advantages and disadvantages of a Court of Criminal Appeal ; on circumstantial evidence ; and on inductive logic.

Major Arthur Griffiths, who has had nearly thirty years' experience in dealing with crime, and is a practised writer for the press, has made an exhaustive study, for literary purposes, of the range of subjects which come under the scope of his official position. He embraces in his purview England, the Continent, and America, and crimes of every description in this and preceding centuries, bringing his record of recent notable misdeeds, with hardly any omissions—there is no full account, by the way, of the Tichborne case—up to the theft of the jewels of the Dowager Duchess of Sutherland. He treats, however, not solely of crime, but of the police, and he gives a very interesting popular history of the police in France and England, of police organization and the methods of the detective. He is, moreover, for an official, singularly candid and unprejudiced, and he even recognizes the services which may be done by the press in the detection of crime and the real advantage which resulted from publicity in such cases as the murders of Lord William Russell by Courvoisier, of Briggs by Franz Müller, and of Gold by Lefroy. The French police officials are not so fond of publicity, unless it is a publicity cooked for the purpose ; and they are, on the whole, more skilful in the detection of crime than their English brethren. Many of their discoveries, here related, in cases of murder, for instance, where there was no clue even to show who the victim was, are marvels of inductive reasoning and patient ingenuity ; but their reputation has no doubt been enhanced by the Gaboriaux and the de Boisgobey, while that of the English detective, despite the sympathetic treatment of him in Wilkie Collins' "Moonstone" and Dickens' "Bleak House," has suffered considerably at the hands of "Sherlock Holmes," whose business in life it was to show the professional detective how his work should be done. The cases of most masterly strategy given in this interesting chronicle are certainly, as a rule, Continental, not English. The book, as a whole, is one of the most successful of the recent publishing season. It is well arranged and well written, and the author does not, as he well might, lend himself to any sensationalism or love of horrors.

MODERN ENGLAND BEFORE THE REFORM BILL, by Justin McCarthy, M.P. (Unwin, 5s.), in the "Story of the Nations" Series, could not well have been entrusted to a more competent hand. The author of "The History of Our Own Times" has just the touch requisite for a book of this kind ; he has proved himself a writer of sufficient impartiality, the possessor of a light and engaging style, and he has the power of making even political history interesting to the general public. Few, perhaps, would claim for Mr. McCarthy the status of a great historian, but at the worst he is free from the most obvious defects of some who pass by that name. He is never dull : his sentences (though they have a certain air of sameness in their construction) run smoothly and easily ; and his opinions on the eminent parliamentarians of history are always sane. In this volume he has set himself rather to produce a gallery of detached pictures than one homogeneous work, and his pictures are for the most part portraits. It is the men of an epoch who chiefly interest us, and Mr. McCarthy has provided us with good likenesses of most of the great reformers who belong to the first half of the century. It is natural enough that George Canning should be singled out for especial attention, and the chapter devoted to his career is exceptionally spirited and sympathetic, but such men as Sir Francis Burdett and Lord Grey are not neglected. The most interesting descriptions, other than personal, are those of the period of discontent that followed the Congress of Vienna—a period that included the so-called "Massacre of Peterloo," the equally absurdly-named "Battle of Bonnymuir," and the "Cato Street Conspiracy." The author quotes from Miss Martineau's "History of the Peace" an instructive and amusing description of the state of feeling in many districts of the country at that time—"how every shabby and hungry-looking man met on the road was proclaimed a radical ; how country gentlemen, well armed, scoured the fields and lanes, and met on heaths to fight the enemy who never came ; and how, even in the midst of towns, young ladies carried heavy planks and ironing boards to barricade windows, in preparation for sieges from thousands of rebels whose footfall was long listened for in vain through the darkness of the night." It is difficult, in these days of rapid communication, to think without astonishment of so causeless a panic. The volume before us deals with the history of modern England during the first forty years of the century; a second volume is in preparation which will bring the narrative up to the present time. There are some thirty reproductions from well-known drawings or paintings of certain celebrated men of the time. The book is worth reading, and will no doubt be largely read; it is history, not for the student but for the average citizen who may feel that he would like to gain a little useful information in a pleasant manner.

RELIGION IN GREEK LITERATURE, by Professor Lewis Campbell, M.A., LL.D. (Longmans, 15s.), is a review of one aspect of Greek faith from "the prehistoric age vaguely described as Mycenaean," through the Homeric period and the first beginnings of philosophical speculations, to the later developments of thought, which were the harvest chiefly of Athenian soil. The book with which it invites comparison is, of course, Mr. Farnell's work on "The Cults of the Greek States." Not only do both deal with Greek religion, but they both discuss it, not in its origins, cloaked in mystery and obscurity, but in its later and clearer growth. But the two authors do not really cover the same ground, and Professor Campbell is careful to disclaim any intention of rivalry. Mr. Farnell deals with Greek faith rather as it is revealed in art; Professor Campbell treats of it mainly as it is shown in literature. This means, on the whole, that the higher flights of religious hope and sentiment fall to Professor Campbell's share; for though, as Mr. Farnell has pointed out, the literature of the Homeric period represents the religious ideas of that primitive age more exactly than its art, yet later on art was usually a closer reflex of the popular feeling than literature. The greater freedom which was accorded to the latter—the sculptor being frequently a State servant—gave it a much greater power of transcending the beliefs of the time. But Mr. Farnell's subject is the more picturesque, and his book gets the adventitious aid of illustrations. Professor Campbell has to depend solely on his subject and his own power of expounding it.

The book, of course, bears all the signs of being the product of a ripe scholar; it is carefully arranged and planned, and written throughout with clearness, judgment, and good taste. But none the less the book is somewhat dull; and it ought to have been fascinating. It is lacking in charm and inadequate in sentiment. The writer never rises from fluency of style to any high degree of literary merit. All moves on—from Homer to Hesiod, from Hesiod to Pindar, from Pindar to the Mysteries, from the Mysteries to the Dramatists, from the Dramatists to the Philosophers—upon the same dead level, and the reader gets oppressed by the unbroken absence of anything like inspiration. In a work embracing within its scope the sublimest efforts of the philosophical spirit of Greece, this is to be regretted; and it is hardly compensated for by the other admirable qualities of the author. In a word, excellent as this book is in many respects, it falls short of being a great work.

The title LITTLE JOURNEYS TO THE HOMES OF AMERICAN STATESMEN (Putnam, $1.75) indicates quite clearly the nature of the contents of the book to which it is given. The pilgrim who undertook the journeys was Mr. Elbert Hubbard. They are well described, and in the account of Lincoln's home the writer is able to draw on his own recollections, and give his article a pleasant personal touch. He was a child in Illinois when Lincoln was President; and his memory of the reception of the news of Lincoln's death is worth quoting. The place was the local post office:—

Leaning against the wall near the window was a big, red-faced man, whom I knew as a Copperhead. He had been drinking, evidently, for he was making boozy efforts to stand very straight. There was only heard a subdued buzz of whispers and the monotonous voice of the reader, as he stood there in the centre, his newspaper in one hand and a lighted candle in the other.

The red-faced man lurched two steps forward, and in a loud voice said:—"L—L—Lincoln is dead—an' I'm damn glad of it!"

Across the room I saw two men struggling with Little Ramsey. Why they should struggle with him I could not imagine, but ere I could think the matter out, I saw him shake himself loose from the strong hands that sought to hold him. He sprang upon the counter, and in one hand I saw he held a scale-weight. Just an instant he stood there, and then the weight shot straight at the red-faced man. The missile glanced on his shoulder and shot through the window. In another second the red-faced man plunged through the window, taking the entire sash with him.

"You'll have to pay for that window," called the alarmed postmaster into the night.

The store was quickly emptied, and on following outside no trace of the red man could be found. The earth had swallowed both the man and the five-pound scale-weight.

A selection of short pieces in prose and verse from the pens of some dozen or more writers, each of whom conceals his identity under initials, does not perhaps take the best of chances to catch the public ear. If anonymity was an essential condition of the undertaking it would have been better for the members of the literary company to designate themselves by pseudonyms instead of by mere letters of the alphabet. The effect of passing from one set of featureless symbols to a second, third, fourth, fifth, and so on, and then perhaps having to turn back to identify the former work of some contributor who makes a second appearance, is confusing and fatiguing to a degree which goes far to spoil a reader's pleasure, and wholly incapacitates him for the equable mood of criticism. VARIOUS QUILLS (Arnold, 5s.) is a volume containing over thirty pieces in prose and rhyme within less than two hundred pages, and it consequently compels one to a somewhat inordinate amount of this intellectual and manual exercise. The quality of its contents, as was only to be expected from the number of its contributors, varies considerably, the author of "Troinette" and "Mademoiselle Coralie" displaying considerably more of the artist and less of the amateur than most of his colleagues. Among these, however, "F. A. L." has a pleasant knack of verse, both gay and grave, and the little "dramatic sketch" entitled "Two of Them" shows ingenuity of construction and some skill in dialogue. But the attempt of another writer, in "The Watch of a Night" and "A Well-Acted Comedy," to compress a scene of tragic passion into half-a-dozen pages is not a success. It is difficult to be "lurid" in miniature, so to speak, and so brief an appeal to the emotions must be exceptionally powerful to awaken any response. The little volume as a whole can perhaps show no very convincing reason for its existence; but here it is, and there are not wanting those, though their number cannot be overwhelmingly large, whom it will mildly interest.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS QUESTION (Duckworth, 6s.) is a volume of contributions by various well-known Radicals, and others, edited by Mr. Andrew Reid. It is not a book designed to convince the wavering abolitionist, for it does not attempt—what, indeed, very few political writers or speakers ever do attempt—to give any serious and candid consideration to the objections of those who hold opposite views. It will undoubtedly serve in one or two respects a very useful purpose, but some of it is hardly calculated to weigh much with thoughtful politicians. There is a good deal of rhetoric in the "titled wrecker" style, and it is not easy to see how the fact that Mr. R. Wallace, M.P. for Edinburgh, has found lords "proud" affects the question of a Second Chamber. "I should like to hear," he says, "of a plebeian who ever got, morally, within five yards of an ordinary lord, or ten yards of a typical duke." The literary habits of "ordinary lords" certainly seem, if one may judge from the book, to be curious. Lord Monkswell rushes freely, like other contributors, into capitals, and in that condition delivers himself of the statement that the "Toryism of the Lords is 'gross as a mountain,' often (sic) palpable": and Lord Cadogan, in an extract from a speech of his, quoted by Mr. Philip Stanhope (reference not given), repeats almost word for word a passage printed on the same page from a speech of the late Lord Pembroke's delivered in 1884—a coincidence it would be curious to investigate further. But the book nevertheless has, on two points, considerable value. It discusses fully and from various points of view the practical question as to how the "mending or ending" could be carried out if the principle is ever sanctioned by the nation, and it contains two or three instructive papers by lawyers on the status of the Upper House and the proposed reform of it from the constitutional and legal points of view.

The "Raconteur" Series (Jarrold, 3s. 6d.) begins its career very agreeably with THOMAS MOORE, being anecdotes and epigrams from his "Journal," edited, with notes, by Mr. Wilmot Harrison. Dr. Garnett's introduction gives a delightful picture of the man and his social charm. As Lord John Russell, the first editor of the Journal, said, "It will hardly be denied that there is an interest in the talk of men of talent which is hardly to be found in their most laboured works." The present collection is a storehouse of good things said by men noted for the brilliance of their conversation. It is true that some of the wit, say, of Rogers' breakfast table, loses its salt on the written page. Sometimes, too, it is a little old fashioned, such as the saying that George IV. was a sequence in himself, King, Queen, and Knave in one. But much pleasure can be extracted from what remains, and no small knowledge of an intensely social period. Dr. Garnett speaks highly of Moore the satirist, and, by way of showing another side of the man, quotes the following lines :—

Many a time, on summer eves,
Just at that closing hour of light,
When, like an Eastern Prince, who leaves
For distant war his harem bowers,
The Sun bids farewell to the flowers,
Whose heads are sunk, whose tears are flowing
Mid all the glory of his going ;
Even I have felt beneath those beams
When wandering through the fields alone,
Thoughts, fancies, intellectual gleams,
Which, far too bright to be my own,
Seemed lent me by the Sunny Power
That was abroad at that still hour.

These lines, which Dr. Garnett speaks of as beautiful, certainly show the best Moore could do in that direction.

THE GARLAND (Elkin Mathews, 1s. n.) consists of a collection of verses by writers such as Mr. Victor Plarr, Mr. Selwyn Image, Mr. Reginald Balfour, and Mr. Laurence Binyon. There are some fine lines and fine pictures in Mr. Plarr's "The Marseillaise" :—

The drums confer, according to old use,
In low, restrained, yet strangely thrilling ways,
Then, like armed Pallas from the brain of Zeus,
Leaps forth the Marseillaise.

* * * *

The dark-faced rabbles of the past arise—
Ménads and beggars in untoward rage,
Exalted faces, fierce ideal eyes,
And a Republic's flags !

O'er the huge rounded cobbles of the street,
By the gaunt beetling houses, in a throng,
They march and pass with bare but steadfast feet,
And mouths rotund in song !

Mr. Image's contribution is commonplace, and Mr. Binyon sends a couple of sprigs for the garland which will not enhance his reputation. Some verses, entitled "A Meeting," which we quote below from "E. L." give a general idea of the amount of grace and accomplishment contained in this agreeably-produced little volume :—

The stars were afraid
To rise and rejoice
At the words which we said
In so tender a voice.
So they crept to the night,
And watched us employ
Those words which are kisses,
Those kisses which say
What a word often misses,
Or frightens away.

BIOGRAPHY.

MICHAEL FARADAY : His Life and Work, by Professor Silvanus P. Thompson (Cassell, 5s.).—The splendour of Faraday's scientific achievements is of more worthy of note than the great beauty of his personal character. "We admired Davy, we loved Faraday," said Dumas, the chemist. His single-minded, enthusiastic devotion to pure science, his simple dignity and winning manners, his unsurpassed experimental skill and marvellous insight into the mechanism of nature all combine to render Michael Faraday the most revered, the most attractive figure in this century of scientific men. The curious straits to which his biographer is put in order to discover a few flaws in Faraday's character bear eloquent witness to its excellence. We are told that Faraday's "persistent ignoring of Sturgeon, and his attribution of the invention of the electromagnet to Moll and Henry, whose work was frankly based on Sturgeon's, is simply inexplicable." To-day, after the energetic championship of Professor Silvanus Thompson himself, such "persistent ignoring" would be not merely "simply inexplicable," but simply impossible. Fifty and more years ago, however, such ignorance was easily explicable and implied no moral delinquency. Another "flaw" in Faraday's character is still stranger. "He failed to appreciate the greatness of Dalton, and thought him an overrated man." If failure to properly appreciate a contemporary be a flaw in one's character, alas ! who shall be saved ? A few pages further on, however, we at last alight on something more worthy of record. "To any question as to scientific priority between himself and other workers he was keenly sensitive." Here we have the bacillus peculiar to scientific investigators, even the great-minded Faraday not being quite immune, though we are thankful to say he took the disease very mildly, since, to quote the true and eloquent words of his biographer, "in the recollection of such as have survived him, his image lives and moves, surrounded with gracious memories, a vivid personality instinct with rare and unselfish kindness." In less beautiful natures this keen scent for priority leads to all manner of unedifying squabbles, and much work that is both hasty and incomplete. Given a winning personality and great achievement, a skilled writer such as Professor Thompson naturally finds but little difficulty in evolving a readable biography. Whether he has succeeded in making plain to the uninitiated the full import and importance of Faraday's discoveries to the same degree as he has brought out his moral worth is more doubtful. The task, though admittedly difficult, is not impossible, as is evidenced by several existing sketches of the lives and work of some of the earliest pioneers of modern science. But though the "general reader" may perhaps remain unmoved, we feel sure that the student, the lover of science, and all who take an intelligent interest in the branch of human knowledge upon which our latter-day civilization is broad-based, will feel stimulated and refreshed by a perusal of this latest record of Michael Faraday's life and work.

THE LIFE OF HENRY DRUMMOND, by George Adam Smith (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), is an admirably written, well condensed, judicious, and yet enthusiastic biography. Its subject cannot be better described than in a slight variation of the compliment paid by George Warrington to Arthur Pendennis ; he was the rose in the button-hole of Scottish Presbyterianism. The two portraits which Professor George Adam Smith gives of his friend are suggestive of anything but the unkempt Christianity of The Little Minister, as exhibited at the Haymarket Theatre. On the contrary, they present to us a handsome, well-groomed gentleman, eager and alert. As a matter of fact, Drummond fished, smoked, played billiards, and delighted in cricket and football, and was yet an evangelist, whose heart was in the "saving of souls." He was caught early by the American "Revival" movement ; he spoke of one of its chiefs, Mr. D. L. Moody, as the "greatest human" he had ever come across ; he preached Evangelicalism in Mayfair drawing-rooms ; he threw himself into the organization of Boys' Brigades and Students' Missionary Associations ; he travelled and proselytized in tropical Africa and the South Seas ; and he died calmly at the early age of forty-three of malignant disease of the bones, very shortly after repeating the "fundamentals" of the old Scottish faith and "talking half dreaming of John's Gospel." True, there was another Drummond—and one better known outside of his country. This was the Drummond who was a Professor of Natural Science in Glasgow, who was regarded as heterodox by the more straight-laced of his co-religionists; who, in his "Natural Law in the Spiritual World" and "Ascent of Man," tried to reconcile evolution and orthodoxy; who was an ardent Liberal and Home Ruler; and who, as the writer of such Christmas brochures (always elegantly got up and somehow suggestive of theological afternoon tea) as "The Greatest Thing in the World," enjoyed a larger circulation than the most popular of contemporary novelists, and was the favourite author of Count von Moltke. Professor Smith does justice to both Drummonds. In particular he sees the defects and weaknesses, while he also brings evidence to bear as to the popularity, of his friend's excursions into the field of science. Much as Mr. Herbert Spencer described Hugh Miller as not a geologist but a theologian studying geology, Mr. Smith presents Drummond as not a man of science so much as the poetic translator of the scientific language of his day. It is, however, Drummond the brilliant evangelist, who had undoubtedly a wonderful influence over young minds, that is the true hero of this book. It is hardly in the nature of things that such books as he wrote should live; they were essentially journalism. Yet he himself deserved to have his story—uneventful save in the world of spirituality—told as it has been told here, with self-restraint and yet with the almost boyish ardour and simplicity of an attached and life-long friend and comrade.

It is a pity that the length of a biography is not more often proportioned to the importance of the career of which it treats. This, most emphatically, has not been done in the case of HENRY ROBERT REYNOLDS, D.D.: HIS LIFE AND LETTERS, edited by his Sisters (Hodder and Stoughton, 9s.). As Principal of Cheshunt College and editor of the London Quarterly Review, Dr. Reynolds occupied a definite and honourable, but only moderately conspicuous, position in the Dissenting and literary worlds. In consequence of which his sisters now invite us to read his letters, and his wife's letters, and his various friends' letters, to the extent of nearly 600 pages of quite small print. It is a pious service to a good man's memory, but the effect is to fatigue the reader; for Dr. Reynolds' letters very frequently partake of the nature of pastoral exhortation, and few of his correspondents are persons of any particular interest. One notices, however, a letter from Matthew Arnold, whom the majority of Nonconformists did not love. Matthew Arnold, it appears, proposed Dr. Reynolds for the Athenæum Club, because he considered him "eminently the sort of person who ought to be a member," and had a word to say to him on the subject of St. Paul and Protestantism:—

As they now stand, my papers on St. Paul must seem put unfairly as regards the Puritans, as I have called them, but I hope to take an opportunity of explaining this. Few people are so free as I am from all intention of either unfairness or proselytism as regards them.

IN THE SHADOW OF SINAI, by Agnes Smith Lewis (Cambridge: Macmillan and Bowes, 5s. n.), is a popular account of the journeys as the result of which the Syriac palimpsest of the Gospels was discovered in the Sinai Convent. Most of the learning is packed into an Introduction, and the bulk of the book is devoted to the discomforts of camel-riding and other amenities of desert travel. The full account of the important discovery has, of course, already been told in Mrs. Gibson's "How the Codex was Found." This supplementary narrative is intended for that large section of the religious public whose keen interest in matters of Biblical criticism is unsupported by familiarity with subtle points of scholarship. The ground is admirably covered, and the book is eminently readable.

TALES OF THE ENCHANTED ISLANDS OF THE ATLANTIC, by Mr. T. W. Higginson (Macmillan, $1.50), is a very interesting collection of those prophetic stories that all through the middle ages foretold the great discovery of Columbus. Many of the tales are Celtic, invented by the lonely dwellers on the west of the world, who seem to have "felt the beyond" not only in the intellectual but in the natural sphere; and perhaps it was the spiritual longing of this melancholy race, expressed in such symbols as Avalon and the Voyages of Bran and Maelduin, which at last kindled more practical nations into action and sent the Spanish caravels across the great unknown deep. We must mention with all praise the very interesting and imaginative pictures by Mr. Albert Herter. The "Enchanted Bowl" and the "Demon Hand" are especially successful.

RAMBLES IN LION LAND, by Captain Francis B. Pearce (Chapman and Hall, 10s. 6d.), is a narrative of shooting in Somaliland, and the victims of his prowess included not only lions, but also panthers, rhinoceros, ostriches, and leopards. The story of the excursion is well told, and the photographs merit a special word of commendation. There is not much about the political situation, but the few remarks that are offered on Hinterlands and spheres of influence are those of a sane and level-headed observer.

CHESTER CATHEDRAL (Isbister, 1s. n.) is the title of a brief book of sixty-six pages, by Dean Darby. The treatment of the subject is learned and even ponderous; but its nine illustrations, from the pencil of Mr. Herbert Railton, are charmingly and delicately drawn.

A book which will be of more interest to the antiquarian specialist than to the general reader is THE ROMANO-BRITISH CITY OF SILCHESTER, by Frederick Davis, F.S.A. (Andrews). Silchester affords, as is well known, a remarkable example of the part which earthworms have played in the burying of "sepult sites," and of this the author gives an adequate and interesting account.

In the well-illustrated volume entitled DE SOTO AND HIS MEN IN THE LAND OF FLORIDA (Macmillan, 6s.) Miss Grace King, the author of "New Orleans: the Place and the People," has welded together the scattered accounts of the famous expedition of Hernando de Soto in one vigorous and convincing narrative. De Soto and his men came within sight of Florida on June 25, 1539, but before them was old Juan Ponce de Leon, who had named the country "La tierra de la Pascua Florida." As he looked towards it, De Leon could hear, sighing over the waters behind him, the soft voices of the Indians murmuring "Over there! Over there lies Bimini! The land of the fountain of Eternal Youth! The land where none grow old!" De Leon pursued this myth, but De Soto and his fleet already possessed the fountain of youth. The song they heard was of the golden rivers, of the ransom of kings, and of the capture of kings' daughters. The account of these adventures, of the fierce courage of the American Indians, and of the native romance of the "Land of the Flowery Feast," is both stirring and picturesque.

COOKING.—Phyllis Browne is well known and justly popular as a writer on cookery. The fact that a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians is her collaborator gives a special value to COOKERY FOR COMMON AILMENTS (Cassell, 1s.)—"a practical dietetic guide to the invalid." The reader will find the food problem stated, not merely in scientific terms, "but in the form of actual dishes which will prove both digestible and palatable." For different "states of unhealth" appropriate diet is recommended, menus are concocted, and clear instructions given to housewives and cooks. It is a book which ought to be in every household.

THE CENTURY INVALID COOKERY BOOK, by Mary A. Boland, edited by Mrs. Humphry ("Madge," of Truth) (Unwin, 3s. 6d.), originally appeared in America. "The idea was suggested," says Miss Boland, "by the need of such a book in the training-school of the Johns Hopkins Hospital." Many well-known authorities on both sides of the sea have been consulted, and the outcome is a collection of recipes and lessons on food which promises to be exceedingly useful. Miss Boland manages to provide us with an extraordinary variety of dainty dishes and drinks; her remarks on the serving of the invalid's rations are much to the point; and the bills of fare for the "working-man" and his family, which are to be found in the chapter on District Nursing, ought specially to be noted.

Among my Books.

WOMEN AS HISTORIANS.

I.

When Mrs. Catherine Macaulay published her first volume of a "History of England from the Accession of James I. to that of the Brunswick Line" in 1763, a great impulse had been given to historical inquiry among the reading public by the recent issue of works of some importance, many of which are now half-forgotten. Carte had been dead some eight or nine years, but three volumes of his History had been published before his death, and his extensive collection of MSS. was spoken of with something like awe by his contemporaries, and Carte himself was regarded as having been engaged upon a great national work. Dr. Thomas Birch had been sedulously labouring for many years in printing important original documents which continue to be referred to as valuable sources of information by students, and Hume had only just issued the last instalment of his "History of England." There were others who were actively engaged in trying to satisfy or to stimulate the historical curiosity of the time; but hitherto no woman had had the courage to put in an appearance in the literary arena as an historian.

Mrs. Macaulay was a lady of some fortune and with an assured income. She had confidence in herself and asked for no great personage to take care of her in making her début, and the event proved that she was right in her estimate of her own powers. On the appearance of her first volume she at once took the world by storm. For twenty years she laboured more or less sedulously at her self-imposed task. The last volume appeared in 1783, and the book continued to have a large sale even into the present century. At the mature age of fifteen I read every line of the first seven volumes—the eighth I never saw—but I could not now recall a single sentence and, I think, not more than a single impression—namely, that John Nalson was a libeller and a ruffian because he had presumed to criticize Rushworth adversely, and because he was a Royalist and a Tory.

No writer of English history of the stronger sex—and I have long since ceased to doubt which is the stronger sex—has ever received such generous recognition as Mrs. Macaulay; Pitt is said to have eulogized her in the House of Commons; Dr. Johnson—who had no great love for literary ladies—was tolerantly civil to her, if a little ironical; Gainsborough painted her portrait; Washington corresponded with her, and his letters are preserved; she became a lioness in all the principal salons of Paris; Mirabeau is even said to have translated her book into French; Hume spoke of her with more than respect; and Mr. Lecky goes so far as to pronounce that she was "the ablest writer of the Radical school"—the ablest and it might almost be added the first. Yet Mrs. Macaulay's history is perhaps absolutely forgotten; hardly ten men in Britain have ever read it through. Why should they? "We die, we all die, we are consumed with dying!" Historians mount to the top of the wave and then they get swallowed up—sucked in and absorbed—be they who they may. Yet it is not a little strange, considering the extraordinary reputation and success which Mrs. Macaulay attained to, that three-quarters of a century should have passed away before any other woman historian appeared among us, and that up to the present moment no writer of history among women has ever been placed upon the same pedestal of fame as Catherine Macaulay occupied during her lifetime.

And yet during the present century the lady historians have not been idle, their number is increasing and their work has gone on steadily improving. Judged by our modern standard, indeed, the women of some sixty or seventy years ago produced poor stuff enough, but they did not spare themselves. Does any one remember the name of poor Elizabeth Bengier now? Not many years before I was born she published Memoirs of Anne Boleyn, then of Mary, Queen of Scots, lastly of Elizabeth of Bohemia.

Do boys nowadays read in the greedy, guzzling way some of us used to read then? Sandwiching Miss Bengier's volumes between mouthfuls of Scott and Captain Marryat, I read all the Bengier books, and the "Memoirs of Elizabeth of Bohemia" somehow inspired me with an immense desire to know more of that illustrious lady. I suppose there must have been some merit in these Memoirs, or they would not have sold; but they have gone down into silence long ago. Yet Madame de Staël spoke of poor Miss Bengier extravagantly, as "the most interesting woman she had seen during her visit to England," and all sorts of distinguished people paid her attention at one time or another.

Only a little her senior, and, I think, a little before her as a writer of history, Lucy Aikin brought out her "Memoirs of the Court of Queen Elizabeth," and a year or two later, "Memoirs of the Court of James I."; then "Memoirs of the Court of Charles I." (1838). Then she protested that that naughty Charles II. was quite too bad for her to meddle with. "It would make me condemn my species!" Shocking to think of—that! The "Memoirs of James I." is really a very respectable performance. Miss Aikin made good use of the printed materials which were ready to her hands. Even in those days, be it remembered, there was a very large mass of authorities that a conscientious historian had to wade through—Rushworth and Winwood, the "Somers' Tracts" and the "Harleian Miscellany," the "Hardwick Papers" and a great deal else constitute a somewhat alarming list of sources which a student had to reckon with who claimed to write anything that could be trusted on the history of the first quarter of the seventeenth century. Miss Aikin was neither more nor less critical than other people. She utilized the gossip collected in the two volumes of "Secret History of the Court of James I." issued (I think) by Sir Walter Scott, and seems to have believed in Weldon's scandals, with their "large infusions from his own very savoury imagination," as Spedding puts it. Nevertheless, the "Court of James I." is a decided improvement on the "Court of Queen Elizabeth"—the good lady had learnt a great deal since her earlier and very flimsy book was published.

Just when Miss Aikin gave up her historical researches—in terror lest she should “contemn her species”—Miss Agnes Strickland came into notice as something more than a mere successor. Miss Strickland had published two or three volumes of historical stories and had already attained to a certain recognized position in literature when the accession of her Majesty to the throne suggested the writing of the lives of the Queens of England. It was a happy thought, and it must be frankly conceded that Miss Strickland entered upon her task with a far higher notion than was generally prevalent in those days of what the readers and students of history had a right to expect from those who set themselves to teach it and write it. Up to this time it may be said that all historians had been content with working up such materials as had already appeared in print. Such giants as Joseph Hunter, Kemble, and Sir Thomas Hardy used to be spoken of as “Antiquaries,” and even Carlyle, who ought to have known better, sneered at these great pioneers of historical research as “Dryasdusts.” Miss Strickland, from the first, determined to base her history of Queens upon the original and unpublished documents and letters, and she spared no pains to get transcripts of these wherever they were to be found. Admission to the Record Office, in those days, was not to be obtained without special leave, and it was quite a new departure when, not without some opposition, she obtained access to the national Archives. We may make what deductions we choose for a certain vein of silliness in Miss Strickland's volumes. She was a vain woman, whose head was a little turned by the flattering reception which her book met with. She often wrote absurdly. Sometimes her criticism was ridiculous, sometimes she made mistakes, sometimes she was quite hysterical—as, for instance, when she had to plead for Mary Stuart. But the “Lives of the Queens” still remains a very useful contribution to our historical literature, and I am not sure that, as a personal history, her life of Queen Elizabeth is not as good a monograph upon that reign as has yet appeared—even though it is certain that we do sadly want something better, and ought to have had something better before now.

Just about the time that Miss Strickland began to work at the Record Office—where, if I remember rightly, she was ordinarily accompanied by her sister—two other sisters were to be seen diligently transcribing from mediæval documents, and exhibiting a quite extraordinary facility for reading the most illegible and most contracted writing that could be put before them. The elder of these sisters, now known all over Europe as Mrs. Everett Green, then a mere girl of four or five and twenty, soon attracted the attention of Sir Thomas Hardy, and may be said to have brought out her first book, “Letters of Royal and Illustrious Ladies,” under the kindly and generous supervision of that great man, in 1846. This was but the beginning of what was to follow. The first volume of the “Lives of the Princesses of England” appeared in 1849, the sixth and last in 1855. It is an astonishing production, and, with a single exception, it is the most solid and original contribution to English historical literature which has yet appeared from any Englishwoman's pen. Nevertheless, the “Lives of the Princesses” never obtained the success which Miss Strickland's “Lives of the Queens” met with. The subject and the title were and are against it. People assumed that it was a mere catchpenny and flimsy compilation; and, though all they who were most entitled to express an opinion on the matter spoke of the authoress and of her work with enthusiasm, the “reading public” treated it with ignorant neglect. It was hard to believe that six volumes, passed through the press in as many years and written by a lady under forty, could be as well worth serious study and as really “good reading” as the pundits declared they were; and when Mrs. Everett Green's name became better known her Princesses had become well-nigh forgotten. Nevertheless, I often wonder that the volume concerned with Elizabeth of Bohemia, daughter of James I., should not have been, and should not continue to be, far more widely read than it is or has been. It was through the influence of Sir Thomas Hardy that, in or about 1855, Mrs. Everett Green was intrusted by Sir John Romilly, Master of the Rolls, with the work of calendaring the State Papers in the Record Office. She began with those of James I. in 1857, completing her task to the end of the reign in 1872, and continued at the same work for the period of the Commonwealth and through the reign of Charles II. down to 1671. This aggregate of some thirty huge volumes contain elaborate analyses of, literally, tens of thousands of manuscript documents, every one of which had passed through her hands and under her practised eye. It may be very safely affirmed that no woman that ever lived can be credited with anything approaching to such an enormous amount of really first-rate subsidiary historical work as Mrs. Everett Green, and it is work which will never have to be done again; it can never be superseded. During those forty years of unremitting toil—toil which was her joy and her pride—Mrs. Everett Green had to deny herself the pleasure of doing any constructive historical work; she laboured for others in collecting the raw material. Let them look to it that on the foundations so laid others should build up; or rightly interpret the vast mass of evidence which she had so ably got ready to their hands.

AUGUSTUS JESSOPP.

AT HAMNET'S FUNERAL.

[BY THE REV. W. H. HUTTON.]

“He was no doubt there on August 11, 1596, when his only son, Hamnet, was buried in the parish church; the boy was eleven and a half years old.”—Lee's “Life of Shakespeare.”

. I last saw my old friend from whom I had this record at the beginning of May, 1879. I had come from Stratford-on-Avon, where I had been present at the opening of the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre. He was then nearly ninety, but he was thoroughly alive and interested. I remember how his eye flashed as I spoke to him of the tone in which Helen Faucit, the Beatrice of that night, said to her Benedick (Barry Sullivan) “Kill Claudio!” He had been a patron of the stage in his younger days, knew Phelps well, had almost permanently had a box when Macready played, and had a great admiration for Charles

Kemble. A few weeks later my old friend died. He sent me this note with an expressed wish that it should not be printed for twenty years. He had told me of it before, saying that it was written down by his mother about 1800 in very faint ink, and that he had copied it some thirty years after, "correcting," as he said in his prim way, "some inelegancies in the style." His mother had written down the record from the lips of her mother, who was born in 1710 and died in 1804, and the elder lady professed to tell the tale exactly as her father had often told it. Now he, it seems, was born in 1646, and lived to 1732. He went to St. John's College, Oxford, in 1660 and became B.A. in 1664. I have no means of testing the tale, but, so far as it relates to college matters that we know about, it is accurate. There is this corroboration, too, from Mr. Andrew Clark's new edition of Aubrey, that the gossip writes of Robert Davenant, "I have heard him say that Mr. W. Shakespeare has given him a hundred kisses." But I do not find the name of Henry Pimperl among the Fellows of St. John's. There is, indeed, plenty of time for a fable to grow up. Or did my old friend, I sometimes wonder, invent it himself? I cannot think he did.

"Ah, my children," so my father used to say (said the old lady) to my elder brother and myself, "I have often told you the tale, but I like to look back on those days. It was the year of the Restoration, and I had gone a young lad to college. We used to sit after supper round the great fire in Hall, when the statutes gave us leave to speak of the mirabilia mundi, and we would talk of the days before the Wars. It was five years before the Fellows built their new common-room, and some of them would come of a winter night and sit beside us as we talked, striving, I doubt not, to lead us towards the lofty thoughts that beget great deeds. But these we did not much heed.

"Only I remember one old doctor who always wore his formalities, and under them a thick cassock of camlet, for he was of a great age. He had lived in the times of the great Queen, and he had been in college when King James came and King Charles too, and he was a friend, they said, of the Archbishop whom we revered as martyr for Church and King. An old, dried man he was, like the picture of Doctor Case, I used to think as I looked at it in Hall, a thin man, bony almost as the skeleton the limner had made him gazing on. His name was Henry Pimperl, and he was of Warwick blood. One night he came slowly into the hall and sat down beside us by the fire. I had been reading in the great folio of William Shakespeare that Master Osbaston had given to the college library, and my thoughts were full of him. So spake I pertly as young lads will, and asked Doctor Pimperl if, being a Warwick man, he knew Will Shakespeare. 'Aye, marry did I, my lad,' said he, for he spoke in the old fashion as men spoke before the Wars; 'I mind now as it were yesterday,' he said, 'of that day I saw him by his son's grave.'

"Every year he would go by Oxford back to Stratford. It was the year 1596 that I saw him first. He would lodge the night with his old friend, John Davenet, who kept the Crown Inn in the Cornmarket. In August of that year I had still tarried in college after the term was out, for Master Doctor Hutchinson, the President, was using me in some writing matters. One day comes John Davenet to college, with an old manuscript he would give. We still have it, and it bears the words I saw him write, 'd.d. Davenet Œnopolos Oxon.' Already he was thinking to set his lad Robert among us, and he led the child by the hand. With them came a man I did not then much heed—Master Shakespeare he was, old Davenet told me, and was journeying next day into Warwickshire, and would bear me company. And in sooth I had waited for some conduct, being but young and for fear of the footmen that would dog the roads beyond Banbury.

"Next morn I went with my horse that I had hired and my packs to the Crown Inn. Outside our gate I had met Master Shakespeare. He was watching the flight of birds over Beaumont, and he greeted me kindly, but as I thought somewhat sadly. So we passed through the Northgate and down past the Church of St. Michael to the Crown. As we went in, there passed by us John Davenet, fresh from looking to a huge full hoghead of Bordeaux stuff, and there in the chamber, like a proper gentlewoman as she was, sat Mistress Davenet before a dish of apple-johns. As we came in she rose up—she was a proper woman and a tall—and she said, very soft and quiet, as I remember, 'Sweet Will, I have sad news for thee. There came but now one from Stratford. He is scarce gone this half-hour towards London. He told me thy sweet boy is dead.' And then she went up and kissed him on the cheek, there before her husband and the drawers. 'What, Hamnet!' said Master Shakespeare, and he took off his bonnet. 'God rest his soul. Give me to drink.' Then he called little Will Davenet to him, and took the child Robert on his knee, and gave him nigh a score of kisses. But he said nought, and methought he pondered of other matters.

In half an hour we were to horse, and I saw in what friendly sort John Davenet wrung Master Shakespeare's hand at parting. It was a silent journey. Master Shakespeare looked upon the fields and sometimes sung snatches of old songs, but he said no word to me. It was before seven of the clock when we were started and we were at Stratford before sunset. There Master Shakespeare left me, and when I had supped I went forth into the street and walked by the church. As I stood in the yard I saw a funeral come up the path between the trees. It was a narrow way, and Master Shakespeare walked alone first after the coffin. In both his hands he had fresh flowers that looked as they had been newly plucked from the hedgerows, and a great bunch of pansies. He walked straight and looked not to right or left. Behind him was Mistress Shakespeare with her head bowed down, and holding by each hand her little daughters, Susanna and Judith, whom in later years I came to know. One was twin sister to the boy Hamnet, and she was only of eleven years, her sister being two years older. They wore their little frilled caps neatly tied under their chins, and wept and looked about as young maidens will. So they passed into the church, and I saw where they laid the lad in a deep grave by the chancel steps at the north side, where after in years to come they laid the mother too—hard by where Master Shakespeare himself came to lie. There was no rail then about the altar, and I could see well the great hole and the folk looking down into it, while the priest read the words and sprinkled the dust. As the first sod fell I saw Master Shakespeare look sharply at the old gravedigger, but he said nothing. When the last words were said, as the old parson—he was a stout man and of a cheerful countenance—passed down the church he touched Mistress Shakespeare on the shoulder where she stood weeping and he said:—'Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.' And Master Shakespeare spoke not, but he took his wife's hand, and they went out together, the little maidens running by their side.

"So I went forth too, and I saw across the river the men and damsels in the field lay down their rakes (for it was hay harvest, and a late one that year), and look after Master Shakespeare as he went home. And the young grammar lads that had been to school with Hamnet went back and peeped into the grave as young children will, and then they sat down by the river and talked of death, and I sat with them for I too had been at that school in the years before. And so we sat on till the sun had long set; and when the boys had run home I went again into the church, for I saw a lantern shining through the window. I walked softly for I was full of sorrow, and then I saw Master Shakespeare standing by the grave, and he looked eastward and his lips moved but he said nothing. And as he watched, there came in Mistress Shakespeare weeping, and he did not see her. Then he said aloud, 'Except ye be converted and become as little children.' And he turned, and there was his wife by him. 'Ah Nan,' he said, 'God rest his soul, and give us rest.' 'Go not back to London, sweet Will,' she said, and I saw her weeping, and as they went down the church I saw the tears still wet upon his cheek.

"Once again I saw him weep. It was at the Mermaid when Ben Jonson read to us the verses he made upon Salathiel Pavy. When he had read them Master Shakespeare stood up and he said:—'Twas a rare boy, Ben, and they are rare verses,' and he went and wrote upon the window with a ring he had. But I saw there was a tear running down beside his nose.

"And so as they went out, Mistress Shakespeare said, 'Go not, sweet Will.'

"But next day Master Shakespeare rode back to London."

Notes.

In next week's Literature "Among My Books" will contain the conclusion of Dr. Jessopp's review of "Women as Historians."

One noticeable thing about the books issued this winter is the almost total extinction of the decorative border. Not so long ago this was quite a feature of the ordinary gift-book. Decorative edgings were, however, at the best only a survival, and their origin dates back as far as the old-time books of hours. The practice of putting a border to a page of print had many good points to recommend it for certain classes of books, and for many reasons it is a pity that it should be allowed to fall into desuetude. In the hands of the French craftsmen of the last century, such as Picart and Le Clerc, the border was often a thing of beauty. But in England the use of the decorative border was not so general, and never met with more than a qualified success. Its baldest and ugliest form was probably the plain red tooled border, designed like an Oxford frame, frequently used in prize books for the young.

On the other hand, how much more attractive books for the young are becoming. In the place of small print, sometimes crowded between indifferent borders, we have now the large types and clear, ample margins. Good print, good ink, good paper, and equally good workmanship are now the characteristics not only of the more expensive Christmas books, such as Mr. Kenneth Grahame's "Dream Days," but also of the cheaper books, such as the sixpenny "Alice in Wonderland." To realize the advance made in these matters we have only to compare the present children's books with the old cheap books. Many of these are prized because they have become "collectable" articles, but judged by any standard of beauty they are wretched things.

The festive announcement of the 1,000th number of Blackwood's Magazine naturally sends one back to No. 1 of the same periodical to see what progress the world has been making in the meantime. One finds a format not materially different from the format of the present day, together with an editorial manifesto which, to the modern reader, savours of remote antiquity. The magazine is announced as a REPOSITORY—in small capitals—and those who send unacceptable MSS. are treated with considerable freedom. "The paper by 'Junius,'" we there read, "is in many respects interesting, but it is, unfortunately, so overloaded with 'fine writing' as to be quite unfit for our humble miscellany in its present shape." The original editors were Mr. Olegorn, an actuary, and Mr. Pringle, a poet; but they soon quarrelled with Mr. William Blackwood, who invited them to retire. Their acrimonious correspondence with him is bound up with the second volume of the magazine. The impartial critic, as he surveys their handiwork, inclines to the opinion that, if they had not been got rid of, the magazine would have died. "A weak and washy production" is Mrs. Oliphant's description of it; and it was presumably for the purpose of breaking away from "weak and washy" traditions that the title was changed (though the numbering was continuous) from the Edinburgh Monthly Magazine to Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine.

But to return to No. 1. It appeared in April, 1817, and consisted of 120 pages. Nearly forty of these are in small print, and consist of such scissors and paste matter as a report of the proceedings of Parliament, a summary of foreign intelligence, a meteorological table, an agricultural report, a catalogue of births, marriages, and deaths, and a monthly list of new publications in both the French and English languages. "Poems by John Keats" and "Tales of my Landlord, third edition, 4 vols., 12s., £1 8s.," are the most notable announcements in the last department. A paper "On the Culture of Sugar in the United States" has a certain historical though no literary interest. The author contemplates the possibility that the planters of the West Indies will be undersold by those of Louisiana. He faces the prospect with equanimity. "There is surely nothing," he writes, "so very attractive or advantageous in the possession of the West India Islands as to induce us to tax ourselves for their support—for such, to the consumers, is the real effect of every monopoly." This was eighteen years before Cobden began to preach free trade. Another article which one glances at with a certain interest is the "Account of Colonel Beaufoy's Journey to the Summit of Mont Blanc." In this paper climbers are curtly described as "adventurers," and the writer blandly confesses an absolute ignorance of the subject of which he has undertaken to write:—

We do not know that any account has yet been published of the attempts which have been made, subsequent of that to Colonel Beaufoy, to accomplish the same journey, but we have reason to believe that of late years the summit of the mountain has been frequently gained.

As a matter of fact, there were four ascents in the period in question. "We have reason to believe" is a charming example of the vagueness which satisfied people in the pre-scientific age of journalism. The number is completed with an "Account of the Remarkable Case of Margaret Lyall who continued in a State of Sleep nearly Six Weeks."

Some of our contemporaries have been congratulating themselves on the fact that various valuable copyrights—notably those of "Lavengro" and "Tom Brown's Schooldays"—will expire in 1899. A literary paper can hardly be expected to join in these rejoicings, nor can the moralist approve of them. On the contrary, it seems more proper to point out how illogically the law of copyright operates. The theory on which it rests is presumably that, after the lapse of a certain period, literary property ought to be taken over from the individual by the community. It would be a difficult theory to prove; but, for the sake of argument, let it pass as sound. What is the deduction? Obviously, that "out of copyright" books should be put on the same footing as Blue-books and White Papers, and published, whether directly or indirectly, by the State, and that the profits of publication should go into the public purse. What actually happens is that, every year, a certain quantity of valuable property is thrown out to be scrambled for by publishers and booksellers, who have had no more to do with its production than have the crossing-sweepers and the boot-blacks. Is there any reason why they should be so subsidized any more than grocers, brewers, journalists, or members of the learned professions?

Major von Stenzel's letter in The Times of last week will, in the opinion of most people, clear him from any blame for the breach of copyright of which Messrs. George Bell and Sons complained. His book on the British Navy was intended only for German readers, and he followed the wisest course open to one who writes on any feature of a foreign country by using the opinions and facts expressed in the best and latest works of that country on the subject. So far, Major von Stenzel's action can only be taken as a compliment to the useful series of naval textbooks issued by Messrs. Bell. As so often happens, it is the translator who is to blame—traduttore, traditore. In the circumstances, Major von Stenzel's book surely ought not to have been turned into English. But it is by no means the first time that a similar awkwardness has arisen through the retranslation of a translation which professes to be an original. The most curious instance of the kind on record appears to be that of Chateaubriand's French prose version of "Paradise Lost," which (according to Robert Louis Stevenson) an industrious Scot, who was better read in French than in English poetry, actually "turned bodily into an English novel!"

"New Ireland" contains an odd rumour from county Kerry. "It appears that the girls have resolved positively to refuse to marry any Irishman who cannot speak his native language." For a whole county of Irish maidens to face single blessedness for the sake of local colour is even more remarkable than Crabbe's legend of a certain Arabella who rejected all suitors in her passion for the works of Bishop Berkeley. But, perhaps we must not take the colleens too seriously. Those who have at heart the interest of international literature have less susceptible bodies to face in the Gaelic League and other institutions whose business it is to preserve decaying languages. Possibly what the Scots, the Irish, or the Welsh may gain by such movements the world will lose. What if another Swift should arise to write his Gulliver in Erse, or another Burns to sing for the exclusive enjoyment of "Gaelilgoers"? There are, of course, decaying tongues, such as Provençal, whose importance in the history of literature gives an aesthetic interest to their preservation. But even the efforts of the poet Mistral have their unpractical side, since only a few of the uneducated, and hardly any of the educated, in Provence itself, can understand him. On the other hand, the "Lettres de Mon Moulin" and the adventures of the immortal Tartarin, written in a tongue understood all over the world, are not only favourites with the people of the South, but have conveyed the charm of their country and their delightful humour to the minds of all who can read French.

The Camden Society and its successor, the Royal Historical, have now published no fewer than 165 volumes, the latest being "A Narrative of the Changes in the Ministry of 1765-67," as told in a series of letters by the Duke of Newcastle, which was issued a few days ago under the editorship of Miss Mary Bateson. Many of these volumes are of the utmost value to the student of history, national or local, but as no general index to their contents has been issued, their value as a whole is seriously diminished. Each volume, it is true, is furnished with a fair index, but the time and labour involved in hunting through a whole series of indexes are apt to damp the ardour of even the most patient scholar, and the society might well consider the advisability of undertaking a concordance to the separate indexes, somewhat on the lines adopted by the Chetham Society. With the ever-increasing multiplication of books, the need of the labours of the indexer becomes more and more felt.

Literature, as well as history, has a right to be interested in the proposal of the New Spalding Club to produce a history of the House of Gordon. It is true, of course, as Mr. J. M. Bulloch observed, that "the story of the Gordons is practically the story of northern Scotland for five hundred years, and that the vitality and far-reaching power of the family and the extraordinarily active part they have played in the affairs of Europe will cause the work to be, not a dull series of genealogical data, but a genuine contribution to history." Without the Gordons, too, our poetry would lose some things that we should be loth to spare. In the early days of that family, indeed, its vitality was devoted to other business than scribbling. Some of the best of the old ballads bear witness to that, like the Scottish version of "Chevy Chase," which tells how

The Gordons good, in English blood
They steep'd their hose and shoon;

the tragic story of Edom o' Gordon, or the ballad which describes the death of the Baron of Brachley:—

Twa gallanter Gordons did never sword draw;
But against four and thirty, wae's me, what is twa?

In later days the Gordons spared a little time to literature, and the fourth Duke wrote the best of ducal songs—"Cauld Kail in Aberdeen." But the great literary glory of the house, of course, is Byron, who was a Gordon by his mother's side. Adam Lindsay Gordon, whose connexion with the family and place in literature are more dubious, is counted in Australia a good second.

The American Library Association of Boston, U.S.A., has inaugurated a system of cataloguing new books on English History by means of cards indicating briefly the characters, scope, sources and value of the most important works, and containing references to reviews and notices which have appeared in the Press. Work on this plan was begun in 1896, by Mr. W. Dawson Johnston, now of Harvard University, but suspended after some twenty-five titles had been published. The American Library Association has now taken the matter up and proposes to proceed with it annually. The plan is, of course, available for books of any kind, but for the present, at any rate, it would seem that only historical works will be noticed. The cards may prove useful within a necessarily limited circle, but it strikes us that they are not sufficiently numerous ("Books of 1898, fifty to sixty titles, issued quarterly at $1.25" shows but little enterprise at considerable cost) and that the association should abstain from giving its personal opinion on the merits or demerits of any book catalogued. The reviews to which reference is made are all that are required. For one book the association has nothing good to say, we notice. Then why include it among some fifty to sixty selected volumes?

It has been arranged to institute in Maidstone, Kent, a literary society, and to designate it the Hazlitt Literary Society in recollection of the twofold circumstance that the Rev. William Hazlitt resided at Maidstone from 1770 to 1780 and that in 1778 his youngest son, William Hazlitt the critic, was born there.

At a meeting held last week at the Common Hall, Hackin's-hey, Liverpool, it was decided that the fund of £140 for the memorial to Felicia Hemans should be devoted to a prize, to be called the Felicia Hemans Prize for Lyrical Poetry, open to all competitors of both sexes, consisting of a bronze medal bearing the profile and name of the poetess.

The editors of the Public Library Journal of Cardiff and Penarth are to be congratulated on having published their eighth number, which completes their first volume. The paper is the cheapest of the quarterlies, the annual subscription, including postage, being only sixpence. Its notes on interesting accessions are useful. Citizens of the Principality will not fail to feel pride in the announcement that "the new Welsh catalogue contains books by 383 authors rejoicing in the name of Jones," and that forty-eight of them are called John Jones. The Williamses fill twenty-three pages of the same volume, and twenty-seven of them are William Williamses.

A correspondent writes:—

Are we going to adopt the expression "like he did"? It looks very much as though we were. Here is an experience. One Sunday afternoon, not long ago, I heard Canon Eytton, preaching in Westminster Abbey, say "like Thomas Aquinas did." On the evening of the same Sunday Mr. Wilfred Whitten, lecturing on Dr. Samuel Johnson at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, said "like Mr. Augustine Birrell does." On the first Sunday of 1899 I read an article by Mr. Augustine Birrell in which this sentence is to be found, "An Anglican cleric is bound to obey his Bishop or to go away and set up for himself, like Dr. Parker has done in the City Temple."

The Almanach Hachette (Paris, Hachette) contains many features which have not yet found their way into the almanacs of our own serious country. It can be used as a diary and a cookery book, and it gives instruction in the arts of dressing the hair, manuring the soil, and feeding the pigs. A woman's chances of marriage at the different periods of her life are illustrated by diagrams, and a couple of pages are devoted to the evolution of the corset. Nor is the great question of the depopulation of France forgotten. Doubtful whether any good counsel of his will increase the birth-rate, the editor exhorts his countrymen to attend to the laws of hygiene, and so solve the problem by diminishing the death-rate. "Then," he opines, "France would be able to hold her own in the world, and to undertake the immense task of colonization which is becoming her sole guarantee for the future." Altogether, Hachette's is the most entertaining of the almanacs, though a certain amount of useful information is left out to make room for poetry and miscellaneous matter. Some of the poetry should perhaps be quoted. Here is a quatrain from M. Jacques Normand's "Manuel du Parfait 'Cordon Bleu'":—

Des patrons sachez bien les goûts ;
Soignez vos rôtis, vos plats doux :
Des vins destinés aux ragoufts
Ne prenez que le quart pour vous.

The Bishop of Meaux has just formed a committee for the erection of a monument to Bossuet, and the Pope has bestowed upon it his apostolic benediction. The committee is essentially the same as that of the new political league known as La Patrie Française. Its members comprise MM. Perraud, de Broglie, Gaston Boissier, Ferdinand Brunetière, Costa de Beauregard, Gréard, Hanotaux, Mézières, de Mun, Rousse, Larroumet, Denys Cochin, Léon Lavedan, de Villefosse, Monsabré, Duchesne, &c. It would be a great pity if the erection of a monument to one of the masters of French rhetoric, who as a man of letters is part of the intellectual patrimony of France, were to be made the occasion of a political demonstration.

There has been some recent discussion in this country as to whether Chaucer really did meet Petrarch in the flesh and hear the legend of patient Griselda from him, as his "Clerke" professed to have done. Signor Carlo Segrè has considered the matter, in the Nuova Antologia, in the light of the records of Chaucer's life, and throws cold water upon the suggestion that Chaucer met Petrarch at Milan in 1368. This is based on the omission in the entry of the payment of Chaucer's pension for that year of the usual statement as to the poet being present. Chaucer may have been at Milan; but Signor Segrè points out that, while the English Embassy was in Milan, Petrarch was at Padua. Signor Segrè believes, however, that it is almost certain that Chaucer met Petrarch at Padua during his Italian mission in 1372-73. The question turns upon the meaning that we are to attach to "the Clerk's" declaration that he heard his tale at Padua from Petrarch's own lips. Are we to take the Clerk's statement as dramatic or autobiographic? Chaucer, of course, had Petrarch's manuscript before him when he wrote.

In our issue of Dec. 31 we published an index to the contents of Literature for the past half-year. The total number of books reviewed was 1,109. As a guide to a six months' literary output, and to the different classes of works published, it may be interesting to note that the list includes—omitting minor headings—the following number of reviews of books under different classes:—Archæology, Art, and Architecture, twenty-six; Biography, seventy-seven; Books for the Young, eighty-six; Educational, thirty-six; Geography, Travel, and Biography, eighty-eight; History, fifty-two; Literary, sixty-one; Military and Naval, twenty; Natural History, twelve; Philosophy, seventeen; Poetry, fifty-eight; Science and Natural History, twenty-six; Politics and Sociology, forty-one; Sport, fifteen. Twenty-eight letters have been published on the literature of America, France, Germany, Greece, Rumania, Scandinavia, Spain, and Turkey.

We have been able to render the index more useful and complete by indexing, as far as possible, the matters touched on in the Notes.

The Lent Term of that useful institution, the London School of Economics and Political Science, opens next Tuesday, when courses of lectures begin—by Prof. Hewins, the Director of the School, on "State Regulation of Wages"; by Mr. Hubert Hall on "Palæography"; by Prof. Foxwell on "Banking"; and by Mr. A. J. Sargent on "Economic History." Further courses are announced to begin on the following days by well-known authorities, such as Mr. Mackinder, Mr. Whittuck, Mr. Cannan, Mr. Montague Barlow, Mr. Acworth, and Mr. Sidney Webb (who lectures on the American Constitution).

American Letter.

DESTINY OF THE LETTER R IN AMERICA.

Perhaps because it dealt with some affair of my own I was uncommonly interested the other day in a little paper by Colonel T. W. Higginson on the differing treatment of the canine letter in our parlance, as that differs from East to West and North to South. He had noted my endeavour in a recent story to represent its omission in the speech of certain New England characters, and he had some ingenious suggestions and speculations to offer as to its last end. He conjectured that it might disappear from our accent everywhere, and as a New Englander he found reason enough for his conjecture in the fact that it has already vanished from the accent of New England and of Old England. The letter, indeed, is quite suppressed, to my hearing, both in London and in Boston, and in all their immediate dependencies. The best usage on both edges of the Atlantic is to ignore it, or to recognize it by a very faint breathing, which is to its native growl as no sound at all. Yet concerning its final extinction in the spoken language there is very good cause to doubt whether the best usage will prevail. I am unable to speak as to its fate in Australia, New Zealand, or India, but in Canada I feel sure from some observation that it is as generally sounded as in our West. In spite of what we may very well own to be the best usage, since London and Boston are the æsthetic capitals of our race, this letter is not only not evanescent among those beyond the immediate circle of their culture, but is increasingly present. I am quite confident that it asserts itself as strenuously among the English once removed in Ontario as it does among the New Englanders once removed in Ohio, where the children and grandchildren of the Connecticut settlers give it as powerful a twist as the Pennsylvanians themselves.

It appears to me that we got this twist from Philadelphia, in the West, which was formerly so much more characterized by the Quaker metropolis than people now realize, or else that its powerful note communicated itself to the trans-Alleghanian regions from the tongues of the Scotch-Irish pioneers who settled western Pennsylvania. It was probably at first a burr; it is now rather what I have called a twist, but it is as strong as ever. It is heard throughout Pennsylvania; it is as potent in Pittsburgh as in Philadelphia, and when it has crossed the Ohio it asserts itself as vigorously in Cleveland as in Cincinnati. In the farther West, through Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and the cities of the great plains, it gathers force, and I have no doubt it triumphs onward till its snarl is lost in the roll of the Pacific, unless, indeed, it swells beyond this to impart itself together with the blessings of self-government to the Filipinos and Negritos.

In the meantime it indulges curious caprices in the regions where it is not frankly a twist. Mr. Cable, in his Creole stories, notes how, in New Orleans, the r remains guttural among the English-speaking French. It is the gros r of the Parisians attaching itself with the other accents to alien speech; but the guttural r of the Germans, which is even more common with them, is not apparently transferred to their English, though this is as outlandishly accented otherwise as the Creole English. I have heard but one American who gave the r that effect of ro characteristic of some English swells in Punch; and with this one it seemed a personal peculiarity. It was not an affectation with the very sincere Bostonian, who was evidently unconscious of it; and there is another peculiarity with respect to the r which, though sectional and not personal, is quite as unintentional. In New England it is not merely left out in speech where it appears in print, but it is frequently put in where it does not appear. It is apt to be interposed between two vowels which begin and end contiguous words, and to be attached to certain words ending in vowels. A child will get a pencil from a draw' to draw' with, and an expansive patriot will ignore the fundamental law of the land in his zeal to carry the idears of America-r-into Asia. In a girls' school in the West it was not the suppression but this intrusion of the letter which was the test of origin, and a girl of Eastern birth could always be detected by Emma of Normandy, whom she would call Emma-of Normandy; a Westerner would never do so. I believe there is the same confusion as to the lost r in the speech of the less polite among those who follow the best usage in England; but I feel quite sure that the surprising liquefaction of the latter, as we hear it in New York city and New Jersey, is unknown there.

Our orthography cannot really spell anything, and so I am forced to explain this r as having about the value of the French ll, though it is perhaps a little stronger. Dr. Holmes was the first to note the sound in fiction, and spelt bird biyd, first fiyst, hard hayd, and so on; but the French ll is more representative; the y is, in fact, merely suggestive to those who have heard the accent. It is no longer common among cultivated people, but even among such people of New York city or New Jersey birth it is still audible in their unguarded or excited speech. With our East-side polyglots the liquefied r passes into the sound of oi in rejoice. The newsboy will offer you the Evening World with the latest moirer, but you may have your choice of the Joinal. Among the rustic Long-Islanders, a pure American population, the liquid r is rapidly passing into the diphthong; but I have been interested to note that some New Englanders coming here adopt it and give it in its pure ll sound.

The letter which is almost ignored in New England, or welcomed only to the wrong place, is altogether an outcast in the South. Your New-Englander, for store, more, door, will say stoa, moa, doa; but your Southerner will say sto', mo', do' whether he be white or be black; and the outlawed letter has not even a surreptitious shelter in his parlance. But this usage also has its exceptions and limitations. It prevails in Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, and that region of the South-west which Mrs. Ruth McEnery Stuart writes of so delightfully; but I have met South-Carolinians and Louisianians who indicated the r more distinctly than New-Englanders. In the north-western South the prevailing usage is arrested by the rolling tide of the trans-Alleghanian r. I have heard Mark Twain, who was born in Missouri, sound it with as strong a twist as I do, or, alas! did; for I have lived so long in the East that I have lost the pure accent of southern Ohio, where, as my confiding youth was persuaded, the best English in the world is spoken. I should not even now call a checkered adder a checkadadda, as they do in New Hampshire; but I am afraid that I should not give the r in these words the true dental wrench; and (shall I confess it?) I have so disused myself to my native shibboleth that when I hear it in the theatre, as I sometimes do, on the lips of untutored genius fresh from my own section, I involuntarily clap my hand to my jaw.

I hope that, in consideration of this magnanimous admission, due weight will be given to my opinion that the great American r (which is no more American than some other great things of ours) is destined not to disappear, but to overflow the whole country on the lines of Westward emigration, and finally return upon the East. It may yet be heard hoarsely washing the English shores, and mounting the Thames to London itself.

DENMARK.

GEORG BRANDES.

Among recent Danish books there are two which, although not likely to tempt the translator, are worthy of the special attention of foreign readers familiar with Danish. Both volumes—one is a collection of verse, the other a volume of correspondence and biography of the Danish art-historian Julius Lange—are from the pen of Dr. Georg Brandes, who, since the appearance of an English translation of his work on Shakespeare, reviewed some months ago in Literature, has ceased to be a stranger to English readers, and whose protest against the Danish expulsions in Schleswig has just now brought his name prominently forward. The first of these books, UNGDOMS-VERS (Copenhagen, Gyldendal; 2kr.), has been received in Denmark with great favour, a favour that is hardly to be explained by the poetic quality of its contents. These verses are clearly not the inspirations of a born poet, but they throw a new and most interesting light upon Brandes' personality; they are what the Germans would call "confessions"; they afford a glimpse into the inner life of a critic whose individuality is strongly stamped on all his work. Dr. Brandes' volume on the most intimate friend of his student days, JULIUS LANGE (Copenhagen, Det nordiske Forlag; 4kr.), has been described in one of the leading Danish reviews as the most important Danish book of the past year. And even readers who are not Danes, and to whom Lange is hardly even a name, will, I think, concur in this opinion. They will fall at once under the spell of this delightful biography, or rather fragment of biography; Brandes has lavished all his art here in painting a most fascinating portrait. The book interests us not because it is about Lange in particular, or even about Brandes himself, but because it calls up for us an age when, in Denmark, great ideas were in the air; it shows us something of the lives and thoughts of two young students of exceptional gifts when their careers were still in the future.

It is gratifying to see that an English publisher has at last announced a translation of Dr. Brandes' HOVEDSTRØMNINGER I DET NITTENDE AARHUNDREDES LITTERATUR, "Main Streams of Nineteenth Century Literature" (six vols., Copenhagen, Gyldendal; second edition, 37kr. 50ö.), the work with which he made his reputation as one of the first of European critics. Until this work and a volume or two of Brandes' essays are in English, we can hardly feel that we know him properly. Unless it be Taine's "Histoire de la Littérature Anglaise," it would be difficult to mention another book since Sainte Beuve's first epoch-making essays which has so profoundly influenced the methods of literary historians on the Continent as this. In Germany it is largely due to this work that the old philological literary history has latterly fallen into discredit, and in France it is one of the models of the young generation of "cosmopolitan" critics. We have received the third volume of a new reprint of Dr. Brandes' own German translation of his work, DIE LITTERATUR DES NEUNZEHNTEN JAHRHUNDERTS IN IHREN HAUPTSTRÖMUNGEN (Leipzig, Veit; London, Williams and Norgate, 6s. 9d.), while the original translation of the whole work by A. Strodsmann has just appeared in its fifth edition (six vols., Leipzig, Barsdorf, 25m.).

This book has a history. Originally a series of public lectures delivered in the beginning of the seventies at the University of Copenhagen, the publication in book form was not really completed until 1890. The interest which these lectures awakened in Denmark was extraordinary. For hours beforehand people stood in the rain or snow to get access to them; they were the topic of the day in Copenhagen society, and every newspaper criticized them at great length. The reason of this was that Brandes had begun by setting up the thesis, so alarming to Danish conservatism, that a literature only lives in so far as it brings problems into debate; he held up the mirror of European literature between 1800 and 1848 to his own countrymen, and demanded for Danish literature freedom of thought, the right to discuss problems and ideas, unhampered by orthodoxy and social conventions. The direct result was a literary revival under Brandes' leadership which in independence and originality rivalled the best days of Scandinavian Romanticism. But all this is an old story now; the controversial interest of the lectures has died away, and Danish literature is growing apart from the Brandesian principles of the seventies and eighties.

The "Hovedstrømninger" comes to us, then, purely as a history of literature, and a more magnificent panorama of European literature than that unrolled for us in these six volumes it would be difficult to conceive. Beginning with the productions of the French Emigrants, Brandes passes first to the Romantic School in Germany, then to the French Reaction against the spirit of the eighteenth century; "Naturalism in England" occupies the fourth volume, the French Romantic School the fifth, and "Young Germany" the sixth and last. I know of no literary history, even in French, which surpasses in brilliancy and attractiveness this work. From first page to last Brandes has the artist's ability to endow the people of whom he writes with flesh and blood; he has that same power of enlisting our sympathies for the movement of ideas which a born historian has of awakening our interest in the rise and fall of nations. Indeed, one is almost tempted at times to endorse the German academical criticism of the book, which finds it too interesting, too vivid. The vulnerable points seem to me to be where the original Tendenz peeps through too plainly; it is occasionally Brandes the champion of "progress" and "ideas," Brandes the literary radical who speaks, rather than the calm, unbiased chronicler of literary history. In his latest edition Dr. Brandes assures us that his standpoint of 1871 is essentially his standpoint to-day, but it may surely be doubted if his ideas have not undergone some change. The Revolution of 1848, as time goes on, loses more and more of its significance; the sentiment, for instance, which the Continent endeavoured to get up for its jubilee a few months ago, was forced and artificial. In any case, it can no longer be regarded as a literary terminus ad quem. "Young Germany" is but a poor consummation to the literary movement of the first half of the nineteenth century. I should be inclined to ascribe more to the vital forces at the bottom of Romanticism—not Romanticism in the wide English sense, but in its Continental sense—than Dr. Brandes does. Freedom of thought and political freedom were in their day great stimulants to progress, but it is not to them that we owe the best in modern literature. The revolt against Napoleon may have awakened some of the smaller literatures of Europe to new life, but it did not give us Byron or Carlyle, it did not give France her romantisme, and to Germany it hardly gave more than a handful of patriotic songs. It is rather to the Romanticism of Northern Europe that we must look for the inspiration of the higher literature of the nineteenth century; and it is just this Romanticism which Dr. Brandes treats least sympathetically. It is characteristic of his standpoint that the Waverley Novels are passed over in a few pages and the greatest German poet of the first half of the century, Grillparzer, is not mentioned at all. But although one may not be altogether at one with the fundamental ideas upon which this work is based, it is impossible not to feel the warmest admiration for its details. The "Hovedströmninger" is the framework for an unsurpassable series of literary portraits; George Sand and Balzac, Beyle and Merimée, Wordsworth and Byron, Heine and Börne, are drawn with the pen of a master of literary portraiture who need fear no comparison with Sainte Beuve himself. The volume on the French Romanticists, whom Brandes regards as the greatest literary school of the century, is perhaps the ablest of all, but an English reader will turn with interest to the volume on "Naturalism in England." I should not like to say that he will find everything to his taste here; as a matter of fact, Brandes is not so much at home in English literature as in French, but it is something to see for once our own literature, not as an independent entity, but as a part of a great whole, as an item in the Weitliteratur. This is what Brandes' history does for us; it shows us an epoch of English literature in the same perspective with the other literatures of Europe. His "Naturalism in England," whatever its shortcomings may be, is the best study of English literature in the nineteenth century that has yet come to us from the Continent.

If it is not altogether possible to endorse the German editor's claim for this work that it does for the literature of the first half of our century what Hettner did for the eighteenth century, it is at least, after Hettner's monumental work, the greatest contribution that has yet been made to the study of modern European literature as a whole.

J. G. R.

SIR WALTER BESANT'S "THE PEN AND THE BOOK."

[BY A PUBLISHER.]

I.

"The Pen and the Book" is a work which purports to be a vade mecum for the aspirant to literary honours, on the one hand, and a guide to authors dealing with publishers, on the other. I understand that no copies of it are to be sent out for review by the Press. As, however, it contains matter of much importance to publishers, I may be pardoned for attempting an estimate of its value on the subject of publishing methods.

Here "The Pen and the Book" is really not so much a handbook as a controversial pamphlet. Let me, however, take the book for what it pretends to be, namely, a text-book, and let me deal with its facts.

In the "General Considerations" are indicated the various paths along which the literary man may tread—

The profession of literature [remarks Sir Walter Besant] in its various branches includes the humble writer of stories for the penny populars, who are happy if they make two pounds a week by their work, and it includes the historian whose work should bring him a great many thousands; the writer of successful educational books, whose income should be that of a bishop; and the writer of novels which fly over the whole world, and should give him the income of a successful physician. This is what is meant by literary property.

Following Sir Walter, the merest tyro in the art of scribbling must look upon his productions as so much "literary property." "Property," to mean anything, must mean "value." How then is one to measure the value of literary work? Without a doubt, by means of the standard furnished by popular appreciation and demand. How is that standard to be obtained? I answer, by an initial publishing experiment. Literary work becomes property when a reading public makes it so; and it matters little if the work be from the pen of a well-known writer or not; if the public does not care for it, its property value does not exist.

Four methods for dealing with the publication of books through publishers are set forth by Sir Walter Besant. An author may (1) sell his manuscript outright; (2) he may agree to divide profits; (3) he may arrange to receive a royalty; or (4) he may have his work published on commission. In every case, however, the reader is informed that the publisher is almost certain to rob the author.

I. SALE OF THE PROPERTY OUTRIGHT.—"Never sell your work" is the advice given; for the publisher in asking you to sell outright is "simply trying to buy a property which may be worth many hundreds, or even many thousands, for a song." Note again the property fallacy. What is this advice worth? The unknown writer is often glad to get a hearing at any price, and if a small sum be given him for his first venture, so much the better. No value can be placed on the work, since it has not yet made for itself a standard by which it may be ascertained. To the author who is in want, the advice is valueless, whilst to the successful writer it is superfluous. Publishers, however, are not very anxious to buy outright; and if they do, as in the case of a writer's first work, they are neither "dishonest" nor "fraudulent" in giving a low price for that which may or may not have value. Sir Walter Besant cites the case of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge which gave £12, £20, or £30 for books which brought, in some cases, very large sums, and he is very indignant thereat. I fail to see the justice of his indignation. If the Society commission a person to write a book for £12, and that person agrees, where is there cause for anger? Probably the work for which the Society paid this small sum would in other hands prove a loss. I am convinced that for many of its publications only the Society could sell the large number of copies it does, and since it has obtained this power over many years and at great expense, it deserves the benefits which accrue therefrom. The author acts exactly on a par when, his reputation being made, he raises his prices. I could easily cite well-known instances where publishers bought outright works which proved to have money-making value, and recognized the fact liberally in their dealing with the authors, although they need not have done so.

II. A PROFIT-SHARING AGREEMENT.—“Here the dangers are manifold. The cost of production under its various headings may be, and very commonly is, falsely represented” (vide p. 168). Three classes of charges are dealt with: (a) Cost of production; (b) Advertising; and (c) Office expenses.

(a) Cost of Production.—Here, says our author, an expenditure of £100 may be set down at £120 by overcharging the cost of printing, paper, and binding, and by not allowing for all discounts. But in profit-sharing agreements the author has a voice in the choice of printer and binder, and often knows beforehand what the estimate is. Certainly this is always so, when he shares in the expenses. Wilful overcharging can only be tested by giving definite accounts from definite individuals. As these are not furnished, the general charge may be dismissed as unworthy of consideration.

(b) Advertising.—Here the reader is told that advertisements are charged for which either never appeared, or which appeared in the publishers' own organs. Every publisher keeps voucher copies of all advertisements pasted in a special book, and every charge can be checked by a reference to the advertisement itself. In spite of counsel's opinion quoted by Sir Walter Besant, a publisher has every right to charge for advertisements in his own organs. Surely no author need object to paying for advertisements in the “Strand” and “Pearson's” magazines!

(c) Office Expenses.—These come in for Sir Walter Besant's special aversion. He objects to publishers allowing for them because they do not allow them to booksellers. I fail to see the application of this reasoning. The bookseller is not a partner with the publisher in the sense the author is. Then it is argued that if the publisher be allowed office expenses, so should the author, and Sir Walter cites his own experience in the case of a book for the writing of which he obtained 100 guineas, out of which he had to pay £52 for books and journeys into the country for obtaining special information for that book. Sir Walter here undertook a work for which he must have known he would require to obtain special information, and which would on that account bring him added reputation, and perhaps a similar commission at some future time whereby he could recoup his “office expenses.” The publisher, on the other hand, is in no such position. His balance-sheet must bear the brunt of his “office expenses.” To estimate the profit-bearing value of his publications each must be debited with a certain percentage of such general expenses, otherwise he would fall into many and gross errors. Furthermore, an author who is asked by a publisher to do work in which “office expenses” are an item is invariably allowed such expenses, and so probably would Sir Walter have been if he had stipulated for them.

III. THE ROYALTY SYSTEM.—“Authors,” we are told, “at first jumped at the proposal of a royalty, because they thought something, at any rate, would come to them. In this expectation . . . they have been deceived.” How? By means of the “brilliant discovery” of the “deferred royalty.”

In other words [says Sir Walter] the publisher proposed to pay no royalty at all, until enough copies had been sold to pay the whole cost of production, with any percentages he chose to make, and then to pay the author as small a royalty as he dared offer. In his ignorance and helplessness the author mostly consented, and so got nothing, because somehow the limit was never reached.

Of course, all this applies to the beginner. The well-known writer sees that he gets his royalties in advance (often largely in excess of what is realized by sales), and does not trouble himself at all about the publisher's losses. It's the profits which make him take a renewed interest in the publisher's share, and the publisher is made aware of this interest by being asked for a larger advance on the next occasion. Now, to the beginner Sir Walter says, If you can't do any better, go to a publisher; but take care, or he'll cheat you. Well, the young author, let us say, does take care, and agrees to a ten per cent. royalty, and the book is a success. Now, says Sir Walter, you are being swindled. For (supposing the book is published at 6s.), for every 7 1-5d. you get, the publisher makes 1s. 10 4-5d. (vide table, p. 174), and when the book (note the when!) goes into a second edition of 3,000 copies you still get only 7 1-5d., while he pockets 2s. 2 4-5d. “These figures prove perfectly clearly that the publisher who offers a low royalty is simply putting into his own pockets the greater part of the proceeds.” But what if the book is a failure? What if but 200 or 250 copies only have sold? How does the publisher stand then? To these questions the handbook offers no replies. I will, for the moment, take Sir Walter Besant's own figures, merely remarking that his royalty tables are misleading, since they show no allowance for advertising, the expenses of which the publisher always bears in these cases. Suppose an author agrees to a 20 per cent. royalty. On a six-shilling book (sold to the trade at 3s. 6d.) this yields him 1s. 2 2-5d., while the publisher's net profit is 1s. 3 3-5d. This assumes that the first thousand copies cost one shilling each. Now, to sell an edition of 1,000 copies of a six-shilling book by an author who is, ex hypothesi, unknown, is no small feat. I should like to know how to do it. Of such novels I should never print so many, since their average sale is about 300 copies: let me even say 400 copies. A publisher speculates in them in the hope that the “dark horse” may prove a “racer.” If the author receive £24 (= 400 × 1s. 2 2-5d.), he obtains a sum out of which, at any rate, he has nothing to pay towards the manufacture of the book. He pockets the money and walks away. But how does the publisher fare with his £26 (= 400 × 1s. 3 3-5d.)? Thus:—

1/- each . . .	£50	0	0	„ Proportion of Profit . . .	26	0	0

The £26 are all swallowed up in expenses, and the publisher is left with 500 copies of a book worth, probably, waste-paper price.

But can a decently produced edition of 1,000 copies of a six-shilling book be obtained at a cost of £50? I think not. Sir Walter himself suggests £71 as the cost for such an edition (vide p. 155). This means that the proportion of profits in the tables is wrong, for the author gets 1s. 2 2-5d., while the publisher receives but 11 1-10d. How would the latter now stand on a sale of 400 copies? Thus:—

„ Advertising, say . . .	15	0	0	„ Proportion of Profits . . .	18	10	0
„ Author's Royalties . . .	24	0	0	„ Absolute Loss . . .	28	10	0

So that, after giving back his proportion of profits, the publisher has, in addition, to pay £28 10s. ! Is he not justified in asking for a deferred royalty?

Of course, when the book does sell, and it goes into several editions, the publisher is repaid. But I regret to say that my experience of unknown authors does not warrant me in following Sir Walter Besant in his sanguine expectations from sales of 3,000, 5,000, and 10,000 copies. I have found that an author whose work can sell so largely is generally aware of the fact, and his expectations of advance would certainly upset all Sir Walter's tables.

IV. PUBLICATION BY COMMISSION.—A publisher, we are told, who issues a book by this method begins by charging the author a fee, then he adds a percentage, then he pockets all the discounts, and finally charges for advertisements in his own organ or by exchanges. I don't know what fees are: I have never heard of their being charged. “Percentages” are the creation of the imagination of prejudiced counsel. As for the other charges, I have already shown either that they have no basis in fact, or that they are unfairly represented. With commission books it is usual for the authors to suggest the amount they wish to be spent on advertisements, and the medium in which these are to appear.

I should like, however, to draw special attention to Sir Walter Besant's method of substantiating his statements. An author, he says, who has his work published on commission should receive an account in some such form as this (presuming the book costs £100 and the sales amount to £300):—

To Alleged Cost	£165 0 0	By True Sales	£300 0 0
„ Publisher's Fee	10 0 0	Less 15% for bad
„ Discount (secret)	15 0 0	debts and office ex-
„ Incidental Expenses	5 0 0	penses	45 0 0
„ Publisher's Comm. (as by agreement)	38 5 0			£255 0 0
„ Due to Author	21 15 0

“By this arrangement,” he concludes, “the publisher receives £178, and the author £21, or, since the real profit is £200, the publisher takes very nearly seven-eighths; leaving the author one-fourth!”

Now here is an account admittedly fabricated, and with no basis in fact, and yet specially concocted in order to furnish an argument prejudicial to a class of business men. What are the facts? These: Publishers care not a rap for undertaking books on commission. Almost invariably they do not pay for the labour they entail. I have had experience of such books where the annual profit in commission was actually three-and-sixpence! “Publishers' fees” are unknown, as are “incidental expenses.” “Secret profits” exist in the brains of literary guide-book writers only. I have never heard of any percentages being deducted for bad debts and office expenses; and, if they were, the book-keeper who would present them as in the above account would certainly not know his business. Had I the happy experience on a commission book such as this statement presents, my account would probably take the following form:—

„ Advertising, say	40 0 0

And I should be delighted to find that I had made £30 on the transaction, more especially if that sum showed itself in the first account. In Sir Walter Besant's statement of account advertising is omitted; but it is absolutely necessary to include this charge, since a “commission book,” to realize sales to the value of £300, would assuredly require a heavy advertising outlay.

I will return again to Sir Walter Besant's Tables of Cost of Production, and to his chapters on the “Methods of the Future” and the “Literary Agent.”

Obituary.

Our Paris Correspondent writes:—With EDOUARD HERVÉ disappears the third and last of the remarkable little company of French journalists and publicists who fought under the Empire for Liberal ideas. The other two names which are always associated with his are Prévost-Paradol and J. J. Weiss, who finally rallied to the Empire. Hervé remained faithful to the cause of constitutional monarchy. He was an admirer of England, and his two chief books were devoted to English political problems—“Une Page d'Histoire Contemporaine” (1869) and “La Crise Irlandaise depuis la Fin du XVIII. Siècle” (1885). As an Academician he exemplified the fact that the Academy is a salon of honnêtes gens, not primarily a collection of the most eminent French writers. Old-world ideas of tolerance and politeness rule there, and it accepts with special consideration the foreigner who adopts the French patrie. M. de Herédia and M. Cherbuliez for instance were welcomed with effusion. Like Lacoste de Lisle, Edouard Hervé was from the African island of Réunion, where he was born of a Breton father in 1835. He gained distinction as a political writer in the Revue Contemporaine and the Courier du Dimanche. It was a period when innuendo and allusion constituted the highest qualities of literary style, linking the writers of the time to the pamphleteers of the old French régime. In this Hervé excelled and became famous under the signature of “Joseph Perrin.” When he was forbidden by the Government to write in any French paper, he became chief correspondent of the Journal de Genève. In 1867 the Emperor inaugurated a more liberal régime, and Hervé and his friend Weiss started the Journal de Paris, and subsequently Hervé by himself founded the Soleil, the first great political journal in France published at five centimes. The experiment succeeded beyond his expectations. For twenty-five years the Soleil has maintained a high ideal of dignified journalism. Edouard Hervé was hardly a representative Frenchman, but he was a representative Academician, a man whose high-bred modesty and whose solid acquisitions made him a gentleman in the English sense, a parfait honnête homme whose death is a loss to France.

He also announces the death, at the age of 67, of F. LICHTENBERGER, the author of the “Histoire des Idées Religieuses en Allemagne,” and of “Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses,” which was completed in 1882. His authority as a savant in religious studies was of the highest, and, as dean of the Faculty of Protestant Theology, which Gambetta resuscitated in 1873, he attained, during seventeen years, the respect of all who care for intellectual and moral probity and a lofty character.

Correspondence.

THE LIFE OF SIR CHARLES BRIGHT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Besides failing to quote the full title of the book as set forth on the title page, your reviewer appears to have lost sight of the fact that, in addition to being a biography of the late Sir Charles Bright, the book in question is also a record of pioneer telegraphy, land and submarine, in which others as well as my father have played a conspicuous part. Hence, it was prepared partly as a work of permanent reference, which, perhaps, serves to explain the putting together of a quantity of detail material in what was thought to be the most convenient form—i.e., in consecutive order in the appendices to each volume. Such material the ordinary reader may not, it is true, be much interested in; but it should surely prove useful at any time to engineers and electricians. The size of the book is further explained by the size of the type in the main text; but considering that the two volumes cover not only the life, work, speeches, “papers,” and inventions of the man, but also a fairly complete narrative of pioneer telegraphy, the length is surely not so very outrageous.

I remember that in the case of my book on “Submarine Telegraphs,” a few months ago, your reviewer objected to it—though a technical work of reference—on the ground that I had not sufficiently dwelt on the “pertinacious enthusiasm,” the “engineering skill,” and the “electrical genius” of this, that, and the other prominent figure in early submarine telegraphy. Now he seems to be similarly “upset” with regard to the present venture.

CHARLES BRIGHT.

“PILCHY.”

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Apropos of Mr. Alfred T. Story's interesting contribution to your issue of last Saturday, entitled “The Well of Pure English,” he may perhaps like to be reminded of yet another expressive word not included in his list of Lancashire vernacular. I allude to “pilchy”—as signifying foul, dirty—still in occasional use here. A very long and old road in this locality bears the name of Pilch-lane, and my efforts to trace the derivation were for a long time futile. At length, however, an old native, on being interrogated, informed me that he had, as a youth, often heard his father when at work exclaim, "This be a terrible pitchy bit of ground"—meaning thereby filthy, dirty, and, as such, unworkable! Apologizing for length,

I am, Sir, faithfully yours,

J. LUTTRELL PALMER.

Grant-road, Knotty Ash, near Liverpool,
January 9.

Authors and Publishers.

Twenty-five years of observation of famous French men and women by so acute a spectator as Miss Betham-Edwards should give sufficient data for an admirable book of Anglo-French reminiscences, and this lady proposes to publish such a volume in the coming season. Miss Betham-Edwards spent some time in France immediately after the Franco-Prussian War. One part of the work will be devoted to particulars of the life of a celebrated Frenchman now dead, who is said to have confided these recollections of a romantic career to the author.

Mr. Kitton's volume on the illustrations for Charles Dickens' books will shortly be followed by one which Mr. J. Grego is editing with notes, dealing to some extent with the same subject. Mr. Grego's book will be in two volumes and is to be published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall under the title "Pictorial Pickwickiana." It will be illustrated with drawings by Seymour, Leech, "Phiz," Sir John Gilbert, R.A., and others.

Mr. Michael MacDonagh, whose "Irish Life and Character" we reviewed in our last issue, has been for some time collecting materials with a view to providing that "exhaustive and critical life of the greatest of Irish politicians," Daniel O'Connell, to the want of which Mr. W. B. Duffield calls attention in this month's Cornhill. In writing his story of "Bishop Doyle"—O'Connell's great Irish contemporary—which he has contributed to the New Irish Library, Mr. MacDonagh discovered a mass of important information which throws fresh light on many phases of O'Connell's exciting career as an agitator; and he is in communication with relatives and friends of O'Connell and his contemporaries with a view to obtaining unpublished letters and other documents. The remarkable Parliamentary career of O'Connell from 1829 to 1847—during which the great demagogue was one of the commanding and interesting personalities of the House of Commons—which has never been adequately treated, will be fully dealt with in Mr. MacDonagh's work. Mr. MacDonagh has also written "The Book of Parliament," a study of the human side of the two Houses of the Legislature.

The anniversary double number of the Star, to be published on Monday, will contain a new poem by Mr. Swinburne and also an original drawing by M. Verestchagin. The right to republish the short romance which has been written by M. Zola for the Star has already been sold in America, Germany, and Norway.

At the end of January Messrs. Duckworth and Co. will publish a volume of "New Letters of Walter Savage Landor: Private and Public," edited by Mr. Stephen Wheeler, with the authorization of Lady Graves-Sawle, to whom most of the correspondence was addressed. The letters are full of allusions to the political, literary, and social history of the period from 1838 to 1863. The second part contains a collection of letters on public affairs addressed by Landor to various periodicals but not included in any edition of his works.

Surg.-General Sir Charles A. Gordon, K.C.B., the author of well-known works on Army Hygiene and of "Recollections of Thirty-nine Years in the Army," has been occupied for some months past in collecting a series of notes on Early Sanitation in India from the arrival of the Portuguese in 1498 down to the formation of the Royal Commission in 1869. Sir Charles Gordon has now a tolerably complete series of notes on the use of animal matters and their derivatives as therapeutic agents in England during the seventeenth century and in China at the present time.

Miss Foxcroft has issued a sheet of corrigenda and addenda to her life of Halifax, which shows how carefully she has gone over her work since its publication, and how thoughtfully she has observed the criticisms that have been offered. The point she adds about the brothers being at Shrewsbury School is of interest, and we agree with her in rejecting the two pamphlets attributed to her hero by Halkett and Laing. We are glad of the opportunity of repeating our sense of the value of Miss Foxcroft's excellent book.

Mr. Herbert Vivian's new book will be called "Tunisia and the Modern Barbary Pirates." The title suggests, and the book is said to contain, much modern romance. It will be published by Messrs. Pearson.

Messrs. Macmillan will publish during the present month a work by Professor Baldwin Spencer and Mr. F. J. Gillen (sub-Protector of the Aborigines), entitled "The Native Tribes of Central Australia." The book will be abundantly illustrated.

"The History of the Peasants' War in Germany, 1525-26," the title of Mr. E. Belfort Bax's second volume of his "Social Side of the Reformation," will follow naturally upon the first volume, "German Society at the Close of the Middle Ages." Messrs. Sonnenschein are the publishers.

Some time about the end of January Messrs. Duckworth and Co. will publish two plays by Mr. Edward Martyn, "The Heather Field" and "Maeve," with an introduction by Mr. George Moore.

The novelist who is known by his pseudonym of "Benjamin Swift" as the author of "Nancy Noon," "The Tormentor," and "The Destroyer," has a new book on hand which will be published this spring, entitled "Siren City." Although the first chapter begins and the last closes in London, the story is largely a study of Naples, the "Siren City" of the title. The scene is laid in the Old Maddaloni Palace, and the book resolves itself into a study of Puritanism versus Paganism.

We understand that the hero of Mr. Morley Roberts' forthcoming African novel is frankly drawn from Mr. Cecil Rhodes, whose acquaintance the author made during his recent visit to the Cape. The story is said to deal with the "backstairs" history of the proposed Cape Town to Cairo railway.

The title of the forthcoming novel by the author of "Mr. Barnes of New York," Mr. Archibald Clavering Gunter, will be "Jack Curzon." The idea of it is an original one—viz., to personify political action during the last two years of England and America on the one hand and Germany on the other. A great portion of the action of the story takes place in Manila and the interior of Luzon, beginning at the outbreak of the first rebellion of Aguinaldo and the Katipunan, and ending upon the surrender of Manila to the Americans under Dewey and Merritt. Messrs. Routledge will publish this book.

Mr. J. S. Fletcher, who for some time was known by the pseudonym of "A Son of the Soil," is publishing his new novel, "The Paths of the Prudent," with Messrs. Methuen. Like most of the works by the author of "Life in Arcadia," "At the Gate of the Fold," &c., this book is a close study of certain aspects of country life, with roadside scenes during the Civil War. So far, this book has only been published in the United States.

Miss Ella MacMahon, the author of "A New Note" and the more recently successful novel, "An Honourable Estate," promises another story, probably under the title of "Fortune's Yellow," the name of a well-known rose which grows in the Riviera, where the scenes are laid. The narrative deals largely with the relations of a mother with her children.

Mr. Frankfort Moore has completed a series of short stories dealing with the careers of eminent actresses of the past. They will begin to appear in Pearson's Magazine in July.

"The Life and Campaigns of the Right Hon. John Manners, Marquis of Granby," by Mr. Walter Evelyn Manners, which we have already spoken of, is now announced for immediate publication by Messrs. Macmillan.

The new volume in Mr. Murray's University Extension Series is a short history of astronomy by Mr. Arthur Berry, the secretary to the Cambridge University Extension Syndicate.

We understand that Messrs. Downey will publish Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's life of "The Good Queen Charlotte," the wife of George III., this spring, and that the copy-books which the Queen's children used are among the author's materials.

Mr. W. J. Woodhouse, assistant lecturer in classics at the University College of North Wales, Bangor, whose exhaustive work on Aetolia was recently issued by the Oxford University Press, is engaged on an edition of "Cicero de Officiis," Book III.

Dr. Drury Fortnum, the donor to the Ashmolean Museum of a splendid collection of 825 finger rings and engraved gems, is the author of a valuable work on "Majolica." His collection of that ware he has already presented to the University of Oxford.

Mr. Downey is about to publish Charles Lever's posthumous novel, "Gerald Fitzgerald, the Chevalier."

"In New South Africa: Travels in the Transvaal and Rhodesia," by Mr. H. Lincoln Tangye, is about to be issued in a second and cheaper edition.

One of Miss Eleanor Price's stories is about to be issued by Messrs. Macmillan and Co. It is entitled "Off the High Road: The Story of a Summer." Miss Price is known as the author of "Young Denys," "Miss Latimer of Bryan's," and other stories.

A new edition (the 5th) of Captain Gall's well-known textbook "Modern Tactics," will be published on Monday, by Messrs. Service and Paton.

A third edition of Professor Andrew Seth's "Scottish Philosophy" will shortly be published by Messrs. William Blackwood and Sons. Although Professor Seth has within the last year assumed the name of Pringle Pattison on succeeding to the Haining estates in Selkirk and Roxburghshire, the old name is retained along with the new in this edition, and to avoid confusion the same course will be followed with the author's other books.

On the 21st inst. Messrs. Williams and Norgate will issue "Creation Myths of Primitive America in Relation to the Religious History and Mental Development of Mankind," by Jeremiah Curtin, author of "Myths and Folk Tales of Ireland," &c. It contains twenty long myths taken down word for word by Mr. Curtin from Indians who knew no religion or language but their own.

The Department of Russian Literature and Language of the Imperial Academy of Sciences has undertaken a complete scientific edition of the works of Russian writers from the earliest period, with explanatory remarks and biographical notices of each author.

It is announced that Georges Rodenbach has left a considerable number of completed manuscripts. These include several poems, a novel entitled "Mlle. Léonie," and a collection of literary and artistic character sketches styled "l'Elite." Among the latter is a paper on Rodin, of whom the author of "Bruges la Morte" was an enthusiastic admirer.

M. Bréal's work, "Essai de Sémantique," will be published this year in England by Mr. Heinemann under the title "Mental Philology," with an introduction by Professor J. P. Postgate, who has written in the Fortnightly Review upon the subject.

A third volume of M. Frédéric Masson's work "Napoléon et sa Famille" will be published shortly.

M. Calmann Lévy has in the press for immediate publication a new book by Renan, "Études sur la Politique Religieuse du règne de Philippe le Bel," Balzac's "Lettres à l'Étranger," "Souvenirs," by Lieutenant-General Vicomte de Reiset, the second volume of the collected essays of the late Léon Say, and two historical works, "La Dernière des Condés," by M. Pierre de Ségur, and "Diderot et Catherine II.," by M. M. Tournoux. The same publisher announces new books by "Gyp," Mme. Beulzon, M. Lavedan, M. J. Psichari, M. Ary Renan, and, above all, by M. Anatole France.

CANADIAN COPYRIGHT.

The appearance of our Canadian letter suggests a topic which our correspondent does not directly raise: that great question, to wit, of Canadian Copyright, which seems destined to be threshed out in the course of 1899. According to the Author—a journal which should be well-informed on such a subject—the Canadian legislature proposes to deal with the matter in the autumn. On the other hand, a "special correspondent" of the Pall Mall Gazette, who has all the air of speaking of what he knows, announces that Mr. Fitzpatrick, the Canadian Solicitor-General, will introduce a Canadian Copyright Bill "next session"; so that English and Canadian authors will do well to be prepared to defend their interests, so far as these may be menaced by the Bill, at short notice and at any moment.

To a certain extent, of course, discussion is hampered by the fact that the proposed measure is not yet before the country, and the details of the provisions which it is intended to embrace have not yet been made known.

The general tendency, however, of the Canadian attitude towards copyright has already received ample and frequent illustration, and that attitude may be summed up in a sentence—The Canadians, whether in their agitations or their legislative proposals, have never been acting primarily in the interest of authors; their concern, at first, was for the interest of Canadian readers; their present concern is for the interest of Canadian printers and publishers. In the interest of the former they procured the passing of the Foreign Reprints Act of 1847—a measure which permitted pirated American copies of the works of British authors to be imported into Canada on payment of a Customs duty of 12½ per cent., to be collected for the authors' benefit. In consequence of that Act, Canada was, for a long period, flooded with cheap American reprints; while the Canadian Government collected the duties so ineffectually that, in the ten years ending in 1876, the British authors divided among them the sum of £1,084 13s. 3½d. Later Canadian legislative effort has mainly been directed to putting work in the way of Canadian printers. Copyright in Canada became by the Act of 1875 conditional on printing in Canada. Canadian judges, however, held that its provisions did not over-ride the Imperial Act of 1842, on which our copyright system rests, and it was only important in so far as it checked the importation of the pirated reprints. Fourteen years later came the famous Act of 1889. Under this Act, if an author did not secure copyright in Canada, the Minister for Agriculture (of all people in the world) might grant licences, conditional on the payment to the author of a 10 per cent. royalty, for the publication of his works in the Dominion; but (and here is the point) the author was left to collect the royalty for himself. This is the Act which the Imperial Government refused to sanction. Feeling ran high in Canada over the refusal, but the matter was dropped for a time owing to the death of Sir John Thompson and the defeat of his Government. Now it is being revived; and though Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Bill may differ in detail from Sir John Thompson's, there is every reason to apprehend that, in principle, it will be identical with it.

The situation thus created is a serious one for authors, especially in view of certain possible—and, indeed, almost inevitable—consequences. Such a measure as Sir John Thompson carried and Sir Wilfrid Laurier is understood to be intending to propose could hardly fail to compromise many of the international understandings on the subject of copyright into which the Imperial Government has entered. At the Berne Conference we spoke, as we were entitled to speak, for our colonies as well as ourselves. If one colony be released from the obligations which were there contracted, all the other colonies would be entitled to the same exemption if they wanted it; and, though the Berne Convention provides for the possible withdrawal of the colonies, it would hardly be regarded by the other signatories as a friendly act if we did so withdraw them. It would certainly cause heart-burnings and arouse resentment. There are even those who believe that it would prove to be the beginning of the end of international recognition of the rights of literary property. Our Copyright Treaty with the United States would even more certainly be seriously compromised. At present a United States author can obtain protection in Canada by printing in Great Britain, or in any part of the British Dominions. To deprive him of his rights in Canada unless he also printed there would be to give him a genuine grievance, and it would probably provoke retaliatory measures against both Canadian and British authors. In fact there is good evidence that it would do so. Shortly after the passing of the unratified Canadian Act, Mr. Blaine wrote to Sir Julian Pauncefote complaining of the conduct of the Canadian Government, and hinting at the possibility of the "abandonment or essential qualification" of the United States Act by which the Copyright Treaty with Great Britain is confirmed.

The real nature, meaning, and motive of the proposed Canadian legislation on copyright now become clear. While ostensibly formulating conditions under which authors may acquire copyright in Canada, the Canadians are really preparing a plan for annexing the copyrights of as many authors as possible. They desire to encourage their printing industry; and they hope to do this by providing the printers with a portion of the raw material of their craft at the expense of the authors of all nations. Morally, of course, a Canadian printer is no more entitled to the gratuitous services of foreign authors than to the gratuitous services of foreign compositors, bookbinders, and proof-readers, an obvious fact to which the Government appears curiously blind. Hardly less regrettable are the causes of the agitation to which so many leading Canadian statesmen—often, we believe, against their better judgment—have thought it advisable to yield. The trouble, it is well known, arises because the men who propose to profit by the annexation of literary property are also the proprietors of the great Canadian newspapers, which influence electoral opinion. They can imperil the seats of politicians who oppose their views, and they have of course opportunities which the other side have not of pressing their views on the Canadian public. They talk loudly of Imperial dictation, and of their right to self government, and even go so far as to raise the patriotic cry of Canada for the Canadians. The unsophisticated Canadian voters do not perceive that the cry is only being used as a cloak to cover the demand that other people's property shall be handed over to Canadian printers. We can only hope that some Canadian statesman will have the courage to expose the sophism before the conflict with the Imperial Government, which is otherwise inevitable, ensues.

By the announcement that Sir Spencer Walpole is about to retire from the position of Secretary to the Post Office, one is once more reminded how many notable men of letters have earned at St. Martin's-le-Grand the oatmeal upon which to cultivate literature comfortably. Most of them have followed the lighter branches of the craft. Anthony Trollope and Edmund Yates in the past, and Mr. A. B. Walkley and Mr. W. W. Jacobs in the present, are names that readily suggest themselves. Sir Spencer Walpole, almost alone among Post Office authors, has represented the literary calling on its more serious side. He is the author of one big history and of two considerable biographies—those of Lord John Russell and of his grandfather, Spencer Perceval—and he has also contributed manuals on subjects relating to practical modern politics to the English Citizen Series. We trust his retirement will give him abundant leisure for those literary labours which always seem so tempting to the man of letters who is still fettered by the claims of official routine.

Mr. Swinburne has given us another utterance about an Elizabethan poet in some lines of magnificent power and intensity on Tourneur's "Revenger's Tragedy," which appeared on Monday in the eleventh "birthday number" of the Star. He makes it the occasion for a lurid picture of a world which could produce such loathsome crimes as those which Tourneur introduced into his one great play. Here, as in his literary judgment on the play itself, Mr. Swinburne abandons sobriety of thought in the true spirit of some of the Elizabethans whom he admires. This is hardly to look at the Middle Age "steadily and see it whole"—

So, when dark faith in faith's dark ages heard
Falsehood, and drank the poison of the Word,
Two shades misshapen came to monstrous birth,
A father fiend in heaven, a thrall on earth.

Those who read Mr. A. B. Walkley's clever little notes to Mr. Swinburne's poem—still more those select few who happen to have read the play itself—will be rather at a loss to follow Mr. Swinburne in his indiscriminating eulogy of a playwright who (to quote Mr. Thomas Seacombe in the Dictionary of National Biography) "luxuriates in hideous forms of vice to an extent which almost suggests moral aberration." Neither Mr. Swinburne nor Mr. Walkley, by the way, can, we think, have noticed this article in the fifty-seventh volume of the Dictionary of National Biography, which has only just been published. The Calendar of State papers has brought to light a good deal about Cyril Tourneur, and he can no longer be spoken of as "unknown," though his parentage is still in some doubt.

This "Prologue to the Revenger's Tragedy," by the way, is only one feature of a very interesting issue of the Star—a paper which has really done an immense deal towards the enlightenment of the masses in matters literary, artistic, and dramatic. M. Zola has found relief from his troubles by contributing an interesting little story called "Angéline," "written in exile." M. Le Gallienne sends a picturesque poem on the Thames in a kind of irregular hexameter metre, which he handles effectively. M. Verestchagin contributes to a number largely devoted to the subject of peace an outline portrait of Napoleon, with the remark—very suggestive to those who will now be looking at this artist's pictures of war—"There's a peace-maker for you!" There is also a letter from Mr. G. F. Watts; a number of shorter poems, including a pretty lyric by Mr. J. S. Fletcher, "To an Ancient Tavern Sign"; and some very interesting messages from American editors, written in the "our-kin-beyond-the-sea" spirit, and numerous capital pictures. But we are not sure that we do not most appreciate the ballad in imitation, not of Kipling, but of Kiplingites, with its refrain extolling "the verberant verb to Kipple." Here is the last verse:—

We have traded the oldest trade of all, the oldest art we have sung;
We have perched Lalun on the City Wall and 'ung the pictures of Ung.
And we fuzzy-wuzzed till the niggers buzzed through the square
we made our boast,
We were beat in fleeing, but our fleet in being has carried the morning post.
We have dammed the Ganges with Hooghli dams, and driven the drifts sky-high
Where the wolverine worries the warrigal and the wallaby wallows by.
We have rooked the rookie and ranked the ranker and balla'd the Bolivar,
We have bunked the bunker and anked the anchor, and lo! we have berthed a star!

At the "Dictionary Evening" of the Philological Society held a few days ago Dr. Murray had one or two interesting things to say about his great work, the last two published volumes of which again illustrate that extraordinary evenness of excellence which marks its successive instalments. The almost simultaneous appearance of a new volume—the third during the year, we think—of the Dictionary of National Biography remind us of two characteristics these two works have in common. The features we refer to have nothing to do with their literary character, or the general excellence of results produced, and yet they redound very greatly to the credit of English scholarship. One is the business-like method and punctuality, and the other is the immense amount of voluntary work (or, at any rate, work in which remuneration is not considered to be "of the essence of the contract") which marks both undertakings.

As to the industry and despatch bestowed on the New English Dictionary, Dr. Murray made a calculation which showed that it was being produced at the rate of two and a half hours per column, "that allowance of time including all work, from the original research to the printing." This, however, is surely rather a bold estimate, for it can hardly include the time spent by Dr. Murray's correspondents who send him references for quotation. To estimate the time they take would be a more formidable work than the compilation of the Dictionary itself. The average must have been pulled down considerably by the twelve years during which the original MS. for "Pa" and "Pe" was lost. Its eventual discovery seems to be a marvel of research as great as any that Dr. Murray has yet achieved. For it was found at last—a remnant of it at least—"in a stable in County Cavan."

One curious phrase of etymology was touched on in Dr. Murray's speech—viz., the class of words which seem to have no derivation, in the proper sense, at all. Many words cropped up in Elizabethan times of which no account whatever can be given, and no doubt their origin was in some cases purely capricious. The word "dude" appeared quite suddenly in America, and in a very few weeks the philologists were on its track, but the most rigorous inquiry failed to fasten the guilt of it on any one. No doubt a subtle kind of onomatopoeia accounts for many such words: no one could doubt the meaning of to "galumph," invented by that well-known word-coiner, Lewis Carroll. But most of these fancy words belong to slang—thieves' "argot" is full of them. Another mint from which they might be turned out is to be found in the strange compounds, which can seldom have an ancestry, to be found among telegraph code words, or in the telephone directory. There is also Mr. Arthur Roberts; and in a future age no doubt the philologist who has not realized that words may be purely capricious will find in the Latin "spondere," "to pledge," an obvious etymology for "spondulicks." Anyhow, philologists might well devote a little more attention to spontaneous generation as a factor in etymology.

Democracy and Liberty. By William Edward Hartpole Lecky. A New Edition. Two Vols. 7½ x 5 in., lxxiii. + 508 + 601 pp. London, 1899. Longmans. 12/-

The issue of a "Cabinet Edition" of Mr. Lecky's "Democracy and Liberty" has afforded the author an opportunity of prefacing the volumes with an Introduction of so interesting, and, indeed, so unusual a character, as to require a fuller notice than we are accustomed to take of such additions to an already published work. It runs to no fewer than fifty-six pages, and exactly two-thirds of it consists of an elaborate study of the character, career, and policy of Mr. Gladstone. With that career and policy—and, indeed, with the character so far as it is used by the author to explain the deceased statesman's political conduct—we are, of course, precluded from dealing critically in these pages; but Mr. Lecky's portrait of the man and the orator is so vivid, it is presented with so much of his well-known brilliancy of style, and it constitutes, in short, so notable a contribution to current literature, that a literary journal would not be justified in passing it over with brief and casual remark.

The appreciation of the Gladstonian oratory from the point of view of its matter is of course the easiest portion of a critic's work. So patent, indeed, to all men were both its strength and weakness, that Mr. Lecky in his comparison and contrast of the speeches of Mr. Gladstone with those of Burke could hardly hope to escape the trite. "Both of the two orators," is his true but of course familiar observation, Carried into political questions a passion seldom found among statesmen, and also a range and versatility of knowledge that far surpassed that of their contemporaries, but Gladstone was incomparably superior to Burke in the power of moving great masses of men, dominating in Parliamentary debate, catching the tone and feeling of every audience he addressed, and carrying an immediate issue. On the other hand, the texture of his intellect was commonplace. The subtleties and ingenuities of distinction in which he was inexhaustibly fertile were nearly always the mere subtleties of debate. His long and involved sentences and the extreme redundancy of his language scarcely impaired the effect of his speeches when they were set off by his clear, musical, and powerful voice, and by his admirable skill in enunciation and emphasis, but to the reader they will often appear intolerably verbose.

Of course the real gist of the matter, and with it the true secret of Mr. Gladstone's success, is to be found in those parts of the description which concern the unrivalled physical gifts of the orator. Oratory, in fact, considered as a practical, and distinguished from an æsthetic art—oratory regarded purely as an instrument of immediate persuasion—will always depend, to the extent of some four-fifths of its efficiency, on physical qualities, its moral and intellectual elements being represented in the proportion of about one-tenth each. When, indeed, it is oratory addressed to "the masses," as all Mr. Gladstone's temporarily effective efforts were, a rigorous investigation of it would be found to yield something like the following analytical report:—"Personal magnetism of the orator—a combination of vocal, facial, gestural, and emotional appeals to the senses of his audience, 95 per cent.; moral earnestness, or the semblance of it, 5 per cent.; reason—a trace." We do not pledge ourselves to the exact applicability of this analysis to all Mr. Gladstone's greatest popular performances; in some of them the second and third ingredients may have been present in somewhat higher proportions, but what we do say is that any given speech of his—say in Mid Lothian in 1879—would have been equally effective if its composition had been precisely as above stated. Of the external characteristics of the great orator Mr. Lecky has made a curiously minute study, and he gives its results with an occasionally refreshing bluntness. No one, as he truly says, could stand before a good portrait of Gladstone without feeling that "he was in the presence of an extraordinary man."

Yet the greatest painter could only represent one of the many moods of that ever changing and most expressive countenance. Few men have had so many faces, and the wonderful play of his features contributed very largely to the effectiveness of his speaking. It was a countenance eminently fitted to express enthusiasm, pathos, profound melancholy, commanding power, and lofty disdain; there were moments when it could take an expression of intense cunning, and it often darkened into a scowl of passionate anger. In repose it did not seem to me to be good. With its tightly-compressed lips, and fierce, abstracted gaze, it seemed to express not only extreme determination, but also great vindictiveness—a quality, indeed, by no means wanting in his nature, though it was, I think, more frequently directed against classes than individuals. He had a wonderful eye—a bird-of-prey eye—fierce, luminous, and restless. "When he differed from you," a great friend and admirer of his once said to me, "there were moments when he would give you a glance as if he would stab you to the heart."

And, in illustration of these ocular peculiarities of his, Mr. Lecky cites the following somewhat comic anecdote related to him by the late Sir Edgar Boehm:—

He told me that he was once present when an altercation between him and a Scotch professor took place, and that the latter started up from the table to make an angry reply when he suddenly stopped as if paralyzed or fascinated by the glance of Gladstone, and Boehm noticed that the pupil of Gladstone's eye was visibly dilating, and the eyelid round the whole circle of the eye drawing back as may be seen in a bird of prey.

This peculiar property in Mr. Gladstone's eye can hardly, perhaps, have been of much use to him in addressing large popular audiences, but there is no doubt that, for all hearers who were near enough to see the play of his features, that expressive mobility of countenance which Mr. Lecky describes did much to enhance the effect of his wonderful voice. But even all these explanations of Mr. Gladstone's persuasive power still leave a considerable margin to the unexplained; and this, in our opinion, may best be filled up by the suggestion that what most critics treat as a defect of his oratory—as of course it is, æsthetically considered—its extreme verbosity, was, from the practical point of view, a main factor in its success. Those who have watched the effect upon large mixed audiences of the combination of vocal and elocutionary charm with an inexhaustible fluency of speech will readily appreciate this. A speaker with a powerful and melodious voice, who never hums and ha's, never pauses for a word, never leaves a sentence unfinished, but flows on unbrokenly and perpetually like the river before the eyes of Horace's rustic—in omne volubilis ævum—begins, after the lapse of a quarter of an hour or so, to exercise a sort of hypnotic influence over the mass of his hearers, who end by yielding to his persuasions an assent which they believe to be intellectual, but which is in large measure a response to a purely sensuous appeal. Perhaps the most fluent and fascinating orator of our time, with the exception of Mr. Gladstone, was the late Sir Alexander Cockburn; and whenever he tried a cause which deeply interested him—and most causes did—it was quite common to witness the complete hypnotization of a jury by one of those brilliant pieces of forensic advocacy which the Lord Chief Justice imagined, and indeed quite honestly intended, to be a judicial summing-up of the evidence in the case.

Of the criticisms bestowed by distinguished contemporaries upon Mr. Gladstone's oratory and general intellectual characteristics, Mr. Lecky gives some interesting specimens. Some of these—like Mr. Forster's "The right honourable gentleman can persuade most men of most things: he can persuade himself of anything"—are perhaps a little too familiar for quotation. But others—such as Mr. Bright's "When I speak I sail from promontory to promontory; when Gladstone speaks he sails all round the country and occasionally goes up a navigable river and down again"—are both newer and excellent. The following also have no little merit of their own:—

"His intellect," said his old friend Dean Lake, "can persuade his conscience of anything." "His conscience," predicted another friend in his early youth, "is so tender that he will never go straight." . . . A witty prelate is credited with the saying that, though Gladstone never failed to follow his conscience, it was sometimes as the man who is driving a gig follows his horse.

But why has Mr. Lecky so grievously mishandled another famous mot by quoting Lowell as having noticed Mr. Gladstone's "wonderful power of improvising convictions"?

Life-long convictions to extemporize was the actual phrase, the second line of a rhymed epigrammatic couplet, of which, by omitting the adjective, and the admirable oxymoron of its inconsistency with "extemporize," Mr. Lecky has gone far to blunt the point. The absence of the sense of humour in Mr. Gladstone's composition his critic, of course, notices. It is true that "the light touch, the love of good-natured, well-bred banter in which Disraeli excelled were not among his many gifts." But Mr. Lecky does well to recall the fact that—

Sometimes, however, in his lighter speeches, and often in his conversation, he would relate reminiscences of his early years, and he would do this with an inimitable charm and without the slightest tinge of egotism.

Not a few of these causeries—for such they were—were drawn from Mr. Gladstone at "question time" by a casual interrogatory in the House of Commons; and it is with the agreeable recollection of them still fresh in our minds that we would take leave of this able, if somewhat relentless, study.

Memoir and Correspondence of Susan Ferrier, 1782-1854. Ed. by John A. Doyle, Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford. 9×5½ in., 349 pp. London, 1898. Murray. 18/-

The Life and Letters of Miss Ferrier will be found both interesting and amusing by all who are well acquainted with her novels, and by a large circle of readers besides; though some, perhaps, may be of opinion that the criticisms contributed by Mr. Doyle are the most valuable portions of the book. The Letters, says he, throw light not only on the merits, but also on the deficiencies, of Miss Ferrier's work. "There, as in the novels, we see two distinct elements never able to assimilate. We see the comic Miss Ferrier, an observant, caustic satirist, just stopping short of cynicism, a boisterous humourist, delighting in extravagant incident and mock heroics. We see the moral Miss Ferrier paying an honest but thoroughly conventional tribute to sentiment, treating it as her serious mission to exemplify obvious moral truths, and so buying the right to gratify an unregenerate and somewhat reprehensible love of mirth in her readers." The contrast is often visible in her stories, especially in "Inheritance" and "Destiny." Writing to her friend, Miss Clavering, in July, 1809, she says, "It is high time all good ladies and grateful little girls should be returned to their gilt boards." Yet only a few weeks afterwards she tells the same friend that, "as the only good purpose of a book is to inculcate morality and convey some lesson of instruction as well as delight, she does not see that what is called a good moral can be dispensed with in a work of fiction." She certainly has plenty of good ladies and grateful little girls in her own novels, and so has Miss Austen in hers. But the two elements, the comic and the serious, are not blended together in Miss Ferrier's writings as they are in "Pride and Prejudice" and "Mansfield Park." We take them separately, like taking one's brandy and water in alternate sips instead of mixing them together. It is the same with the Letters; we pass backwards and forwards from rollicking fun and broad jests to pious reflections and high moral lessons, with little or nothing between the two except, of course, when the Letter consists of simple narrative. These two incongruous elements running along side of each other detract nothing from the interest of a letter, but do impair the merit of a story; and they must certainly be ranked as one of the causes which prevented either "Destiny" or "Inheritance" from achieving any wide spread and permanent popularity. Scotch readers will always admire them for the Scotch characters or rather caricatures contained in them. But we doubt whether they are widely read in England at the present day.

Miss Ferrier's moralizing is combined with a total absence of squeamishness in regard to certain topics which the young ladies of a later generation would have treated with more reserve; and in this respect her Letters bear some resemblance to those which were written by the lively maids of honour and other sprightly damsels of the eighteenth century. Several of them, we must own, which bear marks of this peculiar freedom, are so composed that we can only guess at what they mean. But we need not be much at a loss, if we may judge by the contents of others which are sufficiently outspoken. The Letters have little value as specimens of the epistolary style, but they are full of entertaining notices of both events and persons—George the Fourth's visit to Edinburgh and the great reform riots being among the former, and Blackwood, Wilson, Mackenzie, Sir Walter Scott, Monk Lewis, and Curran among the latter. Blackwood was the publisher of "Marriage," which, when first thought of, was meant to be the joint work of Miss Ferrier and Miss Clavering, a granddaughter of the Duke of Argyll. It ended, after nine years' incubation, by appearing as Miss Ferrier's; all but one passage in the early part of the book—the History of Mrs. Douglas—which was contributed by Miss Clavering, and adjudged to be a failure. Blackwood gave £150 for the copyright of the first edition, and Mr. Doyle is hardly accurate in his reference to Mrs. Oliphant's remarks on the transaction. She says nothing of its being peculiarly liberal or enterprising. She only thinks it "a very reasonable price." And so do we. By "Inheritance," for which Blackwood gave a thousand, he seems to have been a loser. The book was a commercial failure. "Destiny" went to Cadell, but whether he made his fortune by it or not we do not know.

Bentley eventually became the purchaser of all three copyrights in 1841.

The admiration showered on Miss Ferrier's three novels by the literary society of Edinburgh at that date is well-known, and, as we are not now reviewing them, we are not called on to dissect it. Mackintosh, Jeffrey, Lord Murray, Mrs. Grant of Laggan, Miss Joanna Baillie, the Duke and Duchess of Argyll, and above all Sir Walter Scott, are all contributaries to the stream of panegyric, and the reader who wishes to see the reasons they gave for it must consult the volume itself. At page 230 will be found an excellent piece of criticism by Mr. Doyle, in which he compares the four lady novelists who were practically contemporaries, Miss Burney, Miss Austen, Miss Edgeworth and Miss Ferrier, and decides on their respective merits. He awards the palm to Jane Austen, and ranks Miss Ferrier with Miss Burney, between whom and the authoress of "Emma" Lord Macaulay has drawn a comparison in the essay on Madame D'Arbly with which the judgment of Mr. Doyle is in perfect accordance. The Letters, as well as the novels, show the same affinity; and it is a pity that Sir Walter Scott did not discriminate more carefully between the special merits of the several "women" whom he singles out for such distinguished eulogy, instead of leaving one to suppose that he thought them all upon a level.

A CULTURED VAGABOND.

Mogreb-el-acksa. A Journey in Morocco. By R. B. Cunningham Graham. With a Portrait and Map. 9×6in., 323 pp. London, 1898. Heinemann. 9/-

Mr. Cunningham Graham is the knight-errant of modern travel. He rides forth to explore undiscovered countries and seek for new adventures, careless of fame or gold, but simply for the joy of the open road and the stars that are over his head. As he tells us in the preface to his last volume—a preface addressed to wayfaring men with whom he claims kith and kin wherever their path may be laid—he has no great moral purpose, no theory of Empire, of the destiny of the Anglo-Saxon race, of the spread of the Christian faith, of trade extension, or of Hinterlands.

Mr. Graham has roved in many lands and among strangely different people. He is as familiar with the Gauchos of the pampas as with the Arabs of the desert, and makes himself as much at home in the steerage of an American liner as in the hotels of the Rue de Rivoli. Like all good travellers, he has the knack of adapting himself to his entourage and of winning the confidence of all sorts and conditions of men, and is just as happy eating figs with a party of simple fakirs on a stony beach in the heart of the Atlas, as he would be discussing social questions with his friends at a club in Pall-mall. But he has a distinct preference for primitive races and tribesmen, to whom "the thing we call progress in Europe" is as yet unknown. And yet, for all the scorn which he pours upon modern institutions, from the Stock Exchange to the bowler hat, Mr. Graham is himself, we take leave to remind him, the outcome of the very newest and most recent civilization. If, on the one hand, his inborn love of romance and his literary instinct recall Sir Walter Raleigh and the heroes of Elizabethan days, there is, on the other, a strong element of Rudyard Kipling and Stevenson in his composition. His vigorous and racy language, his love of paradox, his very discontent with things as they are, all strike us as essentially modern. This explains why we sometimes hear his style described as clever journalism. But most critics will agree with us that it is journalism of a very rare and cultivated order. Few living writers are so deeply versed in the literature of all lands and ages. The very names of the authors whom he quotes are unknown to most of us; the forgotten romances of Spanish writers and the madrigals of old English poets are as familiar to him as the novels of Tolstoi and Maupassant or the story of Highland Jock. It is this fine literary taste and wide knowledge which lend a charm to all that Mr. Graham writes, and make his latest work such pleasant reading. To speak frankly, it is a book not to be criticized but enjoyed, and no one who takes the volume up will find it easy to lay it down without reading it from cover to cover.

This time the Empire of Morocco, or, as the Arabs call it, Mogreb-el-acksa, the land of the Far West, was the scene of Mr. Graham's wanderings, and Tarudant, the capital of the almost unknown southern province of Sus, the goal of his efforts. A flourishing city in the sixteenth century, famous for the beauty of its gardens and the wealth of its copper mines, Tarudant was in those days often visited by French and English merchants at the time of the annual fair, but during the last hundred years or more, the fierce nature of the Arab tribes and their hostility to Christians have rendered the place practically inaccessible. The last Englishman who tried to get there, a merchant who had long lived in Morocco, spoke Arabic fluently, and travelled with a party of Moors in Moorish clothes, was recognized as a Christian on the day of his arrival, and had to escape by night, under the protection of the Governor's soldiers, from the armed mob who were piling up faggots round his house with the intention of burning him alive. This happened some thirty years ago, when Sir Joseph Hooker and Mr. Ball undertook a botanical expedition in the Atlas, or, as the Berbers said, came at the Sultana of England's bidding to seek a plant that would make her live for ever. Nothing daunted by these perils, Mr. Graham shaved his head, donned fez and turban, assumed the character of a Moorish doctor, and accompanied by a Syrian interpreter and two Arabs, set out on his ride of two hundred miles through the passes of the Atlas. After trying two different routes in vain and being turned back by the Sheikh who held the pass at the moment, the travellers reached Amsmiz safely and were in the act of climbing the last steep ridge that divided them from Sus, expecting at every moment to catch their first sight of the mosques of Tarudant, when they were arrested by an armed band sent out by the Caid of Kintafi and brought back to his castle amid shouts of "Christians! sons of dogs!" Here, in the courtyard of the Kabash, an enormous mud-built castle on the heights above the river N'fiss, they were detained for twelve days, enjoying what the Caid's chamberlain was pleased to call his Excellency's hospitality, living chiefly on couscousou, or Berber porridge, and in utter uncertainty as to their fate. At length the captives succeeded in obtaining an interview with the Caid, who discussed polygamy and monogamy, "always an interesting subject to Orientals," inquired curiously about English customs, and when he heard that Mr. Graham had been a member of our Great Council, was anxious to know if he had been dismissed for displeasing the Viziers, or if, like himself, he had grown tired of the cares of State. After this visit to Court, the prisoners found a decided improvement in their condition. They were better housed and fed, a roast sheep was sent them by the Caid, and the whole population of Kintafi flocked to the door of their tent, where Mr. Graham dispensed his drugs and cured coughs and rheumatism with a prescription made doubly efficacious by the simple faith of his patients. But still the situation remained unchanged, and for all we know the travellers might be prisoners still in this remote region if they had not succeeded in sending letters to Morocco city by a moufflon-hunter who gladly agreed to run the hundred miles.

Late one evening an Arab rekass reached the castle of Kintafi with letters from the Sultan, and the next morning the chamberlain came to inform the prisoners that it was his Excellency's pleasure they should start on their journey. After a last unavailing effort to obtain a pass to Tarudant, Mr. Graham reluctantly turned northwards and rode across rough mountain paths to Morocco city and thence back to his starting-point, the Palm-house at Mogador. But although foiled in his enterprise, Mr. Graham's journey was not in vain. He made good use of his opportunities among the wild and simple folk with whom he lived, and his book is full of entertaining stories of Berber life, and contains much valuable information respecting "the noble Shillah race," whom, however, unlike Sir Joseph Hooker and Mr. Walter Harris, Mr. Graham regards as distinctly inferior to their Arab conquerors. His descriptions, both of persons and places, are singularly vivid and picturesque. With the simplest means he often produces an ineffaceable impression. Such, for instance, is his description of Morocco city, with the tall mosques rising above the forest of palms, and the gigantic pile of the Sultan's palace, towering like a desert-built Gibraltar over the sea-like surface of the steppes, where long trains of camels, mules, and men on foot crawl like streams of ants. And such, too, is his picture of Sidi Beckr, the Arab camel-driver, who by dint of toil and cunning has become the wealthiest man in Morocco, and who displayed his treasures of gold and silver before his guest with pardonable pride, and then broke off with a pathetic exclamation, "What avails it that I am so rich when my favourite son died of smallpox three weeks ago, and I have no one to whom to leave my wealth?" Very characteristic, too, of the writer's genius, is the passage with which he ends these brilliant pages, a passage which at once reveals the genuine poetry of his nature and the attitude which he assumes towards past and present :—

As we led our jaded animals down the abrupt descent, a Berber shepherd standing on a knoll was playing on his pipe. He stopped occasionally and burst into a strange, wild song, quavering and fitful. . . I checked my horse, and sitting sideways for an instant, tried to catch the rhythm, but failed. But though I could not catch that which I aimed at, I still had pleasure in that song, for as he sang the noise of trains and omnibuses faded away; the smoky towns grew fainter; the rush, the hurry, and the incredible nothingness of modern life sank out of sight, and in its place I saw again the valley of the N'fiss, the giant Kabash with its four truncated towers, the Caid, his wounded horse, the Persian, and the strange, entrancing, half feudal, half Arcadian life, which to have seen but for a fortnight consoled me for my failure, and will remain with me a constant vision, seen in the mind, of course, as ghosts are seen, but ever fresh.

RUSSIAN TRAGIC DRAMA.

The Storm. By Ostrovsky. Translated by Constance Garnett. 8 x 5½ in., x. + 120 pp. London. Duckworth. 3/6

Russian is probably the best dramatic language yet discovered. From six words you may tell a man's birth, education, habits, character, and point of view. Its excellence puts it beyond the reach of translation. Mrs. Garnett surpasses the last generation of translators from the Russian because her version is in the main not incorrect—notwithstanding two or three serious errors—but it so little conveys the implications of the original that it is practically useless as an introduction to Ostrovsky. The even current of slang in the translation, while obliterating all the superficial distinctions of character, necessarily fails to represent the nervous vernacular of the original: the vulgarness of the original is the robust vulgarness of surviving antiquity; Mrs. Garnett's is a debilitated vulgarness of the new growth. The old-fashioned commonness of the terrible mother's diction in the play is greatly misrepresented by such a rendering as "My, what a stuck-up thing she is! Here she is in a huff directly!" It is, no doubt, his "untranslatableability" that has prevented Ostrovsky from becoming known abroad. This version of Mrs. Garnett's is the first attempt at making him known to the English; and of all his fifty plays only "The Storm" has been translated into French and German. MM. Pavlovsky and Méténier's version may be safely recommended; moreover, speaking quite generally, the inevitable asperities of a translation are less shocking when veiled in the obscurity of a foreign idiom.

Ostrovsky is one of the most characteristic products of that brilliant period of Russia's awakening between 1830 and 1876, which produced also Gogol, Turgenief, Tolstoi, Dostoieffski, and Gonczarow. Born in the commercial class, he devoted most of his life to the study of his environment, and put upon the stage picture after picture of that "realm of darkness," with its superstitions, its ignorance, its Juggernaut traditions of manners and morals, with its lifelong tyrannies and its daily tragedies. The bullying father; the ignorant, respectable, merciless mother; the crafty, submissive son; and, victim of all, the warm-hearted, defenceless girl—these are the commonest figures in Ostrovsky's middle-class plays. "The Storm" is the most vivid of the series.

Katerina, passionate, weak, and charming, married to characterless Kabanow, lives in her mother-in-law's house, stifled by tradition. Instinct and opportunity lead her to the embraces of a lover. Remorse follows close on the heels of happiness; and the jeremiads of a crazy woman, coupled with a thunderstorm, are enough to bring her to open confession of her sin. Her lover is forced to depart; she escapes from domestic imprisonment, and ends her sorrows in the Volga. The neighbours find her body, and the mother-in-law, forbidding her son to weep over it, departs justified. It is the triumph of useless "social needs" over "the strength of youth."

Ever since the Song of Sorrow sprang up and blossomed in the wilderness of Russian medieval literature, the keynote of Russian invention has been the triumph of Sorrow: Man and God are handed together to fight against an overmastering ἀνάγκη. Sometimes it is the power of winter, of famine, of government; in Ostrovsky it is the inevitable evil of human relations. "The Storm" is a picture of fate, as embodied in the reactions of character. Katerina is a study in "original virtue" brought to nought by education and environment. It is not tragedy as we know it in the traditions of the classical school; it is the sadness of life itself, reduced to dramatic dimensions. It bears the same relation to tragedy as the modern pathetic does to the old-fashioned sentimental, for the vigour of it springs from the admixture of the commonplace.

Ostrovsky is a master of the grotesque. The woman who terrifies Katerina into confession by her talk of hell-fire is no bell-mouthed Cassandra, but a little mad old lady, followed by two tall footmen in cocked hats. A touch like this adds a poignancy far beyond the reach of academic tragedy.

LITHOGRAPHY.

Lithography and Lithographers. By Joseph and E. Robins Pennell. 14½ × 10½ in., xlii. + 279 pp. London, 1898. Unwin. £3/13/6

Larger and more expensive than that first edition of "Etching and Etchers," of Philip Hamerton, which is still read and valued by the students of a greater art than Lithography, the volume which Mr. Pennell and the frequent companion of his labours have brought out this winter is not the first of what may be called authoritative writings on the subject it is designed to treat of. The matter has been discussed in book form by a French writer whose national privilege it is to possess an amenity and urbanity of style and thought in which Mr. Pennell is occasionally lacking, while his knowledge may not be found at fault; and in England more than one writer of accepted reputation has summed up in reviews and magazines some of the more characteristic achievements of the lithographic process. Still there was room for a volume which should discuss with deliberation and without prejudice, for purely English readers, the claims of Lithography, and serve as the record of its performances up to the present time. Unfortunately the judicial temper is wanting to Mr. Pennell and his comrade. We have accordingly, in the volume before us, strenuous, if we may not say impassioned, advocacy; and it is urged upon us that, unless we bestir ourselves quickly to collect the lithographs of the last generation and the last generation but one, the opportunity will be gone, save under penalty of acquiring them with something, it is implied, approaching the outlay or the difficulty involved in the acquisition of a favourite mezzotint, or of an etching that has long been the envy of the connoisseur. All this is beyond the mark. The distinction between the splendid arts of mezzotint and of engraving in aqua fortis on the one hand, and the serviceable craft of lithography upon the other, is radical and permanent, and so far from the time coming when the real connoisseurs of artistic things will dispute with each other, à prix d'or, the possession of the French lithographs of the days of Louis Philippe and our own Samuel Prouts, what is really likely to happen is that when the present little "boom" has subsided, lithographs will return—even in the estimation of the less severely equipped dispensers of criticism—to their own humble place. Lithography, we hope, will still be practised, even if there should be no Mr. Pennell energetically to advance its claims. It is too valuable an adjunct of the artist to deserve to be discontinued; it is a process by which his drawing may be, as it were, multiplied in almost indefinite numbers and at an unimportant expense. It is an autographic method which has every claim on our sympathy, but about which there is not any occasion for becoming excited; since, unlike etching and mezzotint, and, it may be added, line-engraving, and possibly wood-engraving, it gives us nothing fresh. It is, that is to say, practically without quality of its own; the unique drawing has all and more than all the charm of the design mechanically reproduced by the hundred, whereas an etching of Rembrandt's, Vandyke's, or Claude's is a creation of art which could have been achieved in no other medium. Similarly, in no other medium is to be found the large, rich beauty of mezzotint. Line-engraving too—the revival of which is so keenly to be desired by the well-equipped student—has a character of its own, an interest and an individuality which we should in vain seek for elsewhere.

Mr. Pennell and his comrade then—sympathetic enthusiasts, who tell us they have written their book for the very curious reason that they found its subject "amusing"—bring to the appraisal of the method which their ready entertainment has ended by making them extol, not exactly the balanced and learned, and not, as far as we can see, the finely instinctive, judgment which are together the foundations of the critical faculty. And though they are intelligent, we cannot say that they are particularly systematic historians, or "tasters." From the field of lithography in the past they have chosen to bring away far too much. A great proportion of the pieces they have reproduced have no other interest than such a simple and inadequate one as lies in the fact that the originals happen to be lithographs instead of something else. The technical is of no account unless it is applied to good ends, and though we are grateful to the makers of this volume for bringing before us something of M. Fantin Latour, of Mr. Legros, Mr. Whistler, and Mr. C. H. Shannon, as well as for having included within the covers of their tome certain good things of the Past, we should have more easily believed in their deep appreciation of the excellent had they banished the ungainly and the mediocre. One or two of the original lithographs which they have secured would be worth having—always at a certain modest price, however—and the book, whose undue bulk we have felt it our duty to indicate, is printed in good taste.

MIND versus MATTER.

Sursum Corda. A Defence of Idealism. 7×4½ in., 212 pp. London, 1898. Macmillan. 3/6

The anonymous author of this thoughtful and ably-written little volume has unintentionally supplied a curiously apt commentary on the letter which we publish this week from Mr. Herbert Spencer. That distinguished philosopher concludes with the remark that "the charge of materialism" is a weapon "which, however often knocked out of the hand of an assailant, is presently picked up by another and used again." And here in his most important chapter—that in which, after discussing the Claims of Materialism, he essays to point out "A More Excellent Way"—we find the author of "Sursum Corda" brandishing the arm in question, no doubt in perfect good faith, and using it against Mr. Spencer with hearty good will. Much of his criticism of the misuse of the word "anthropocentric," as disparagingly applied by materialists to the philosophical systems of their opponents, is well put and to the point. "Anthropocentricity," as the author justly insists, and on the whole acutely argues, is an unavoidable characteristic of every positive scheme of human philosophy; his unperceived fallacy lies in his attempt to apply this proposition to the agnostic's strictly negative and sceptical analysis of such positive schemes. Thus, for instance, Mr. Spencer is fully justified in describing the main thesis of Mr. Balfour in his "Foundations of Belief" as anthropocentric; since it is unanswerably true that "in the absence of the" essentially anthropocentric "assumption that things have been arranged for man's benefit there seems no reason to expect the order of the universe to be one which provides for man's mental needs and aspirations." Mr. Spencer's critic, on the other hand, is not warranted in imputing the error of anthropocentricity to this contention of his; and in the argument by which he supports that imputation—the argument, that is to say, that the validity of Mr. Spencer's criticism depends, equally with Mr. Balfour's philosophy, on its satisfying the mental needs and aspirations of those to whom it is addressed—he is, of course quite unconsciously, playing with words.

Surely the difference between the two forms of appeal is obvious. Mr. Balfour says in effect: "I invite you to accept this theory of life because certain human instincts, impulses, and yearnings (which cannot have come into existence without some object) will obtain fuller satisfaction from its acceptance than from its rejection." It is easy to comprehend and difficult to challenge the criticism that this argument places man at the centre of creation by assuming that the world could not have been constructed save with a view to providing for the satisfaction of the instincts, impulses, and yearnings aforesaid. Mr. Spencer, on the other hand, says: "I invite you, on the strength of certain reasonings addressed solely to your intellectual faculties, and in no respect to the emotional part of you—to your instincts, impulses, yearnings, or what not—to regard the theory in question as unproven." Surely such an appeal as this is no more anthropocentric than a proposition in Euclid. No doubt it has to satisfy our "mental need" of assuring ourselves that the conclusion follows from the premisses; but to assume that man is the centre of the creation is no more a condition precedent to our assent to Mr. Spencer's reasoning than it is to our acceptance of the geometrical truth that the three angles of a triangle are together equal to two right angles. Nor does the writer deal any more effectively with the positive side of Mr. Spencer's teaching, and in particular with his main position that it is not the surrounding world which has been arranged to fit the physical nature of man, but that conversely the physical nature of man has been moulded to fit the surrounding world. Where, in fact, the author of "Sursum Corda" comes to close quarters with the rival philosophy and attempts to establish his own we become conscious of his limitations. His book is valuable, not for what it proves, but for what it suggests.

HELLENIC RESEARCH.

The Annual of the British School at Athens.
No. III. Session 1896-97. 10½ x 7½ in., 254 pp. London, 1898.
Macmillan. 10/6

After two issues, in which various experiments were made, the Annual now assumes what will probably be its final form. It consists almost entirely of papers written by members of the British School at Athens, or those who have been in some way connected with it. Until three years ago, the school had no periodical of its own. Members used mostly to publish their papers in the Journal of Hellenic Studies, and, indeed, they almost monopolized more than one number of that journal. But this was felt to be not quite satisfactory. There was really not room in the Hellenic Journal for many studies that were worth printing; and, besides, it was hoped that a separate volume, which might contain matter of more general interest than the Hellenic Journal, would do something to spread an interest in Greek studies over a wider area.

This number contains a great variety, and something to suit all tastes. We have accounts by several hands of the excavations and explorations in Melos lately carried on by the School; articles on architectural detail, on epigraphy, on certain sculptured reliefs, on some bronze statuettes, on mosaic pavements, a good deal about pottery, the Crucifixion on a Greek gem, Macedonian folk-customs, and a review. Most of this will have a permanent value, because it records and describes discoveries. For the rest, we should be indeed surprised if any serious mistake had escaped so careful an editor as Dr. Cecil Smith. We doubt, however, whether he was well advised in including a "review" of Jannaris' "Greek Grammar," even by so high an authority as Prof. Mahaffy. This paper touches lightly on two or three questions dealt with in the "Grammar," but can hardly be called a review of it. Prof. Mahaffy, we note, professes himself converted to the belief that the Greek accent was stress, not pitch. Whatever be the difficulties against pitch, they are as nothing to those against stress. Prof. Mahaffy must have heard a passage of Sophocles or Homer read in the modern Greek fashion with the stress accent; and if he does not recognize that this mode of reading makes ancient poetry an outrage on the ear, there is no arguing with him. We all know that the Greeks as a nation are mad on this point, and we are more amused than surprised to find Mr. Jannaris calling ancient verse, and the spelling of ancient inscriptions, something wholly artificial; but we marvel at Prof. Mahaffy.

There are a number of interesting matters dealt with in this volume, of which one or two may be mentioned. The importance of bronze statuettes in the history of art, and their relation to famous statues, is well brought out in Miss Hutton's article; and the editor, in his first article, has some interesting remarks on bronze technique. Those who are inclined to smile at the importance attached to ugly pots will find here set forth in a clear manner some of the things that pottery can teach. Who would expect to find evidence on a bare pot for ancient textile industries? Yet here are two which have been made on curious rush mats, and bear the impressions so distinct that warp and woof can be clearly seen. Mr. Rodeck's article on the Ionic capital gives another proof of the infinite delicacy of the Greek artist. Those who are inquisitive about folk-customs will find some new material in Miss Triantaphyllides' paper on Macedonia. We hope she will follow this up with others, and not forget to collect some of the rich store of poems and stories which will soon be quite forgotten. But of all this interesting miscellany we think the palm should be given to the editor's paper "On a New Copy of the Athena Parthenos." Although this statuette has lost its head, it is of fine workmanship, and the drapery appears to have been copied with great care from the original. Dr. Smith has also been fortunate enough (or rather acute enough) to make another discovery. He was led to the conclusion that the scene depicted inside the goddess's shield was not carved but painted; and it occurred to him to examine the Strangford shield in the British Museum. There, sure enough, he found that the inside had been painted, and he promises a reproduction of this painting (what is left of it) at an early date. It is astonishing that this piece of evidence was not discovered before; but we all know how often obvious things are not looked at. Mr. Yorke found a piece of the Nike Apteros frieze lying about amid chipped fragments on the Acropolis. The volume is illustrated by fifteen plates and plans, most of them clear and good.

We hope that this Annual will quicken the interest of Englishmen in the British School at Athens. The school has now been in existence twelve years, during which time it has done excellent work, not only in excavation, but in helping students by lectures or guidance in their researches. It has been the centre of English archaeological study in Greece, and has been useful to many an English traveller who had no connexion with it. All its work has been done against great difficulties, not least of which was a lack of money. The German and French Schools have large Government grants, and their incomes (besides special grants) are £2,400 and £3,120 respectively. The British School had, until 1897, no grant whatever from the richest Government in the world. In 1897 Lord Rosebery, at the instance (it is believed) of Sir W. Harcourt, made the school a grant of £500 a year for five years; and we hope this will never be cut off. The subscriptions are less than £900 a year. Lately a Students' Hostel has been built, mainly by the liberality of two gentlemen, which cannot fail to be of great use to younger students. We hope that in calling attention to the merits and needs of the school we shall not have spoken in vain.

RUSKINIANA.

Ruskin : Rossetti : Pre-Raphaelitism. (Letters and Papers.) Edited by William Michael Rossetti. With Twelve Illustrations. 7½ × 5¼ in., xxi. + 327 pp. 1898.

Allen. 10/6

The title of this book is a misnomer. "Some Ruskin Letters to Rossetti; with Others" would better define this strange collection of relevant and irrelevant material—or, rather, that portion of it which has any real interest or significance. Too much of the book consists of unimportant notes and reminiscences, some of which, unfortunately, are also unwelcome as well as unimportant. At the very least a third of the matter might go without loss. The point at issue is not whether the unworthy as well as the worthy side of a famous man should be revealed, but that evidence of any such real or apparent unworthiness should not be printed except in a narrative where a just equipoise of relative and actual truth may be maintained. We cannot endorse the opinion of the writer in one of the great dailies that Rossetti's character is definitely besmirched by these "revelations." He had grave faults, as we all have; and some annoying idiosyncrasies, as most of us have; but a sense of humour on the part of some austere critics would not only extenuate his delinquencies but obviate unfair prejudices and accusations.

With one exception, the really vital and significant interest of the book is in the letters—in some of them rather—of Mr. Ruskin. The exception is afforded by the one letter and the several poems of Elizabeth Siddal, that remarkable woman whose strange personality is slowly becoming partially revealed to those to whom she has been only a vague name. The day will come when this book will have a value for the myth-maker or the myth-destroyer, and unquestionably the future biographer of Ruskin will have to consider these letters of his with special heed. The notable twenty-fifth letter (Ruskin to Rossetti; April (?) 1855)—with its "Now you know the best and worst of me; and you may rely upon it, it is the truth"—cannot be overlooked. If in this letter there is a generous phrase on the part of the great critic about Rossetti—"it seems to me that among all the painters I know, you on the whole have the greatest genius"—it is still more welcome to find that Rossetti himself could write as follows of a younger man, a disciple, and, even then, already spoken of as a rival (letter to Professor Norton, January 9, 1862):—

"A name perhaps new to you—but destined to be unsurpassed, perhaps unequalled, in fame by any name of this generation—is Edward Burne Jones. He is a painter still younger than most of us by a good deal, and who has not yet exhibited, except at some private places; but I cannot convey to you in words any idea of the exquisite beauty of all he does. To me no art I know is so utterly delightful, except that of the best Venetians."

The revelation of character in Mr. Ruskin's letters will afford surprise to many of his readers. We are reluctant to see letters such as these published during the writer's lifetime, but they must certainly be accepted as valuable documents. If they show what a true and helpful friend Mr. Ruskin was to Rossetti, and to Rossetti and his wife, they reveal also that his friendship was a rose set with more or less obtrusive thorns. But many unwelcome touches are redeemed, not only by the ceaseless kindness of heart displayed, but by passages such as this, where Mr. Ruskin alludes to Mrs. Rossetti by the pet name of Ida:—

"I looked over all [your] sketches at Chatham-place yesterday. I think Ida should be very happy to see how much more beautifully, perfectly, and tenderly you draw when you are drawing her than when you draw anybody else. She cures you of all your worst faults when you only look at her."

With this excerpt, which does honour to the writer, to the misunderstood woman of whom he writes, and to the great painter, we may take leave of a book which, with all in it that is disappointing and superfluous, is frequently of great interest and significance.

The volume itself is very handsomely "got up," with eleven admirable reproductions of pictures by Rossetti, including the little-known and beautiful "Salutatio Beatricis: in Eden," and (what should be welcome to hundreds who know it only by repute) a photo-print of the "Burd Helen" of W. L. Windus.

OMAR KHAYYAM.

The "plain man," confronted with the swelling literature of the Omar Khayyam "cult," its versions, translations, "selections, notes, biographies, bibliographies, and other material," may be judged leniently if he once more perverts the often misapplied line, "Persicos odi, puer, apparatus," especially as he has some excuse of relevance in the "rosa quo locorum Sera moretur." "Bury me," said Omar, "where the north wind shall strew roses over my grave." Mr. Heron-Allen's select bibliography of the subject includes ninety-seven items. Mr. Nathan Dole's approximately complete bibliography covers 150 closely-printed pages, and we have not dared to count the distinct entries. A second edition has also appeared of Mr. John Leslie Garner's translation—a beautiful little volume from the Chiswick Press (THE STANZAS OF OMAR KHAYYAM, Bell, 3s. 6d. n.). Mr. Garner aims at translation, not paraphrase, and he attains a remarkable union of fidelity to the original with admirably finished numbers. His new edition adds a few more quatrains, bringing the number up to 154, and shows a good many minor changes, generally for the better; it is free, moreover, from what Mr. Dole describes as the "rather erratic and whimsical capitalization of the original issue." Mr. Garner's version is a selection; he thinks that "Omar's themes are not many, and the ever-recurring wine, rose, and nightingale are cloying to Occidental senses." We do not know that Omar's themes are more limited than the majority of poets', and they have the advantage (like Browning's) of being open to sundry interpretations. No two students read the Tentmaker in the same way; each is apt to find his own philosophy in Omar's quatrains. Tennyson, it is true, calls him, not quite approvingly, "that large infidel, Your Omar"; others find in him the true expression of Sufi mysticism; or else he is "the mouthpiece of a purely modern pessimism," or "a transcendental agnostic and an ornamental pessimist" without the full courage of his opinions. There is also a good deal to be said for the obvious literal interpretation of Omar's wine, woman, and song, and Mr. Heron-Allen brings an apt parallel in Herrick's

But before that Day comes
Still I be Bousing;
For I know, in the Tombs,
There's no carousing.

This obvious philosophy is stale enough, however, and it is natural to seek a less banal meaning. It is partly the uncertainty of interpretation, the room for reading one's own thoughts in Omar, that accounts for his extraordinary popularity. Modern agnosticism claims him as a comrade, and his despair and revolt are in tune with our own, with Musset's, age:—

Les plus désespérés sont les chants les plus beaux, Et j'en sais d'immortels qui sont de purs sanglots.

Mr. Nathan Haskell Dole's "Multi-variorum edition" (RUBÁIYÁT OF OMAR KHAYYAM, English, French, German, Italian, and Danish translations comparatively arranged in accordance with FitzGerald's version, with notes, bibliography, &c., two volumes, Macmillan, 24s. n.), which is absolutely indispensable to all devotees of the "Omar cult," appeared at Boston in 1895, but, although the present edition contains bibliographical additions up to 1898, we have been unable to find in its bibliography or on its title-page any reference to an earlier edition. Though the notes are over-elaborate and there is too much pother about trifles, Mr. Dole's volumes form a "Bibliotheca Khayyamiana" which must rejoice the heart of every worshipper, and excite the interest and curiosity of even the uninitiated. The summaries of numerous critical articles, such as Mr. H. G. Keene's, with selections from many scattered translations, form a really useful feature. The illustrations to the second volume by Mr. Gilbert James are well known to readers of the Sketch, but their reproduction here was a happy inspiration. Even in Elihu Vedder's country their wonderful harmony with the spirit of the Persian poet will be conceded; they really are illustrations—they illuminate the verse. The photogravures from Mr. Garrett's pictures which appear in the first volume are, of course, not Persian at all, but they have their own merits of a more conventional order. There are also some good portraits of FitzGerald and other translators.

Mr. Edward Heron-Allen's second edition (THE RUBA'İYAT OF OMAR KHAYYĀM: a facsimile of the MS. in the Bodleian Library, translated and edited, Nichols, 10s. 6d. n.) is, like Mr. Dole's, exquisitely got up in white and gold, with borders and ornaments by Miss Ella Hallward. Indeed, no one would now think of bringing out an Omar Khayyam that was not "dainty"—the fear of the Club is before their eyes. It was not so when Mr. Quaritch—himself an Omarite—brought out FitzGerald's simple editions in plain brown Roxburgh covers without a smack of Eastern adornment. But Mr. Heron-Allen's book, except in point of artistic form, is the very opposite of Mr. Dole's. Instead of a "multi-variorum" text, it is a text and translation of one manuscript—the famous Ouseley manuscript in the Bodleian, which Cowell copied for FitzGerald forty-two years ago, and on which his first edition mainly rests. Mr. Heron-Allen gives the MS. in photographic facsimile, as well as set type; he has also collated other MSS. and texts, and given the various readings, together with many notes on FitzGerald's interpretation of individual quatrains and on other poetic parallels. "At some future time," says Mr. Heron-Allen, "I propose to print an edition of FitzGerald's quatrains, giving the original, or inspiration, of every quatrain, if not of every individual line."

We must say we hope he will abandon this project. It is obvious that FitzGerald took the ideas of Omar and transposed and rearranged them as his genius suggested. To trace out the particular Persian line that may have inspired each thought in FitzGerald's version seems rather a fruitless labour. What would really be worth doing, and might perhaps be done by Persian scholars like Mr. Heron-Allen and Mr. Denison Ross, who helped to revise this edition, is to subject the Persian texts to a critical examination in order to ascertain, if possible, how many of the Rubáiyát (varying in number in the different MSS. from less than one hundred to eight hundred) may reasonably be ascribed to Omar himself and how many are later interpolations. This would be better worth the efforts of Persian scholars than further trituration of the well-worn theme of FitzGerald's relations to his original. We only hope the mere suggestion may not bring upon us sentence of excommunication from the more rigid apostles of the "cult." After all, one can scarcely have too much of "old Fitz," or, for that matter, of the only Eastern poet—we do not except Hafiz—who has attained a "European reputation." It is odd that this same poet should be known in the East principally on account of his astronomical lore and—of all things in the world—a reform of the calendar! What had the calendar to say to him who wrote, as Mr. Garner has it—

Life's caravan unheeded glides away,
And barren hopes alone remain,—but nay,—
Fear not the pain the future has in store,
But drink,—upon us steals the twilight gray.

One more reissue of the FitzGerald Rubáiyát comes from Messrs. Macmillan (12s. 6d. n.), THE RUBA'İYAT OF OMAR KHAYYĀM, provided with lavish ornament in black and white by Mr. W. B. Macdougall. The edition is admirably printed and tastefully bound. Among the heavy double-page border-designs in white line on black ground there are a few pages of real beauty—such as the peacock design—but there are some distressing examples of conventional design, such as that which meanders in all directions across the double-page at the end of the book. Mr. Richard Le Gallienne's paraphrase from several literal translations of Omar is republished, in a new format, in an edition of only 1,000 copies (Grant Richards, 3s. n.). The quatrains are excellently printed by Constable in a volume looking rather like a delicate edition of the Common Prayer-book. Mr. Le Gallienne's paraphrases, and those original numbers which he holds are in Omar's manner "explicit expressions of philosophy implicit in his verses," have been fully criticized in many fashions, but any collection of verse containing such lines as—

Nor yet shall fail the efficacious vine:
Wash me as white as silver in old wine,
And for my coffin fragrant timbers take
Of tendrilled wood . . .

will be welcome to those who love the obvious spirit of Omar.

SERMONS.

University Sermons. Preached before the University of Glasgow, 1873-1898. By John Caird, D.D., LL.D., late Principal and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Glasgow. 8½ x 5½ in., viii. + 402 pp. Glasgow, 1898. MacLehose. 6/-

This posthumous volume, brought out by the present Master of Balliol, will entitle his brother to be remembered as one of the most remarkable preachers of a period which has given us much good homiletical work. Characterized not only by their great literary merit, but also by their originality, their intellectual breadth, their vigour, fulness, and accuracy of thought, they will be read with interest by many to whom sermons as a rule do not appeal. In their theological teaching they stand apart in more than one respect from the more ordinary type of doctrinal exposition—e.g., Professor Caird's treatment of such religious ideas as "the New Birth, or the Imputation of Righteousness" will scarcely be accepted as adequate by philosophical students of Christianity, while his views on moral development are open—at any rate in the form in which they come from his pen—to serious question. But the worth of the book is independent of the isolated views which find expression in it; and no one can fail to be impressed by the sincerity of thought, by the appreciation of contemporary perplexities, by the unshaken faith, by the beauty of sentiment, by the moral fervour which are apparent on almost every page, as well as by that great command of language, of which the following extract from the sermon on "Things New and Old" will give some idea:—

It is no false sentimentality which makes us feel that there are things which have gained a glory and sacredness simply by age. The grey old tower or keep, standing lone and grim on moor or mountain-side where for centuries it has stood; the ancestral home from whose walls the faces and forms of bygone generations—warriors, statesmen, courtiers, and divines—look down on the living inheritors of their name and fame; the ancient minster or abbey to whose original architectural grace and nobleness decay has added a tender, pathetic beauty that is all its own—the love that clings to these things, though it never thinks of justifying itself, is no irrational or indefensible emotion. It might plead on its own behalf that even mute and material things are ennobled when they bring up before us the vanished ages, and awaken in us the thought of those who, though they have long passed away and their very existence is but the shadow of a name, are yet linked to us by the tie of a common nature—of those joys and sorrows, hopes and fears, which once for them were as real and absorbing as our own. It might urge too that, apart from their own use or beauty, there is that in these monuments of antiquity which gives material embodiment to the lesson of permanence amidst change, to the thought that there are things which the ever-flowing stream of time cannot wear away, and that there is a side of our being on which we, the children of a day, are yet related to that which is invisible and eternal.

This is, in a word, a noble volume, and it should receive from all religious men a warmth of welcome which has been accorded but to very few selections of sermons published during the century.

THE REV. H. HENSLEY HENSON. It will be evident to all readers of Mr. Henson's very striking work on APOSTOLIC CHRISTIANITY (Methuen, 6s.) that, for once at least, an attempt has been made to approach the Christian origins in a fair and scientific spirit. And it is not to be wondered at that such attempts are rarely successful, when we consider the difficulties in the way. In the first place, the sixteenth century has got between us and the light. When we try to form an idea of Christianity in its first age we find ourselves asking: "How does this fact agree with the teaching of the Council of Trent?" or "How can we reconcile that doctrine with Anglican usage?" Secondly, the nature of the original documents themselves renders a scientific investigation of early Christianity very difficult. The difficulty is indicated in the sub-title of Mr. Henson's book—"notes and inferences mainly based on St. Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians." The faith had been delivered by word of mouth; the Epistle is after all merely a letter of advice, instruction, and reproof on special points which had arisen after St. Paul's departure. In no case can the argument from silence, the "omission is prohibition" rule be applied to the apostolic letters. On the one hand, the Epistles leave no doubt on the essential and central doctrine of Christianity; but, on the other hand, the information they supply as to the institution and constitution of the Christian Church is accidental and fragmentary. Thus Mr. Henson, in the chapter on the Holy Communion, says very well:—

We must not look for detailed and thorough teaching about the Holy Eucharist in the Epistles before us.

St. Paul deals with practical matters, which were urgent, which were causing scandal, which threatened worse scandal. In so far as the Holy Sacrament was concerned in the disorders the Apostle deals with it, but no further.

The general trend of this useful and thoughtful book is in support of the Jewish origin of the organization of the Christian Church. The author is especially informing on the peculiar question of the χαρισματα, or extraordinary graces, though we imagine that his treatment of the account in the Acts of the original Gift of Tongues will be pronounced at least "temerarious" by some theologians.

DR. HORTON. Mr. Henson sees in St. Paul's remarks to the Corinthians on the Eucharist, confessedly imperfect as they are, a clear enunciation of the Real Presence; Dr. Horton, the able author of THE COMMANDMENTS OF JESUS (Isbister, 6s.), finds in those famous words no approach to or hint at such a doctrine. This is how he reads the letter of the apostolic teaching:—

Assuming that by faith you have come to the Lamb of God that takes away the sins of the world, and that by His precious blood you have been cleansed from sin and pardoned; assuming that you are living by faith in the Son of God who loved you and gave Himself for you; . . . assuming too that you are in a society of believing persons, who walk in the light; . . . then you shall meet at stated times and celebrate this outward rite as the symbol and the witness of that interior life; and the memorial of these inestimable facts shall in its turn aid that inner life.

As evidence of the minor importance of the Sacrament in the early Church, Dr. Horton states that the Gospel of St. John, the intimate disciple, contains no account of the founding of the Lord's Supper. But neither does St. John give any account of the birth of Jesus, and Dr. Horton would hardly wish to press the force of this omission. St. John's purpose, in fact, was not so much to relate facts as to declare the interior doctrine; he does not describe the Nativity, he says: "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us"; he does not describe the institution of the Eucharist, but gives the teaching: "Whoso eateth My flesh and drinketh My blood hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day." If Christianity had in some manner been overwhelmed in the first century, only to be discovered, a spiritual Herculeanum, in the nineteenth, Dr. Horton's reading would be certainly admissible. But Mr. Henson's is as fair a comment on the documents as Dr. Horton's; and he introduces the additional support of an appeal to history. If this is admitted as a canon of interpretation, it would be difficult to find a hint in the Fathers or in the liturgies that anything approaching the Zwinglian doctrine had ever existed in the Church.

THE REV. J. B. JOHNSON. The historical method we have just alluded to leaves, of course, quite untouched the larger issue of true or false, reasonable or unreasonable. It is difficult, no doubt, to know what the Greeks thought on the subject of the mysteries; it is much more difficult to find out how far the mysteries corresponded with the eternal facts of humanity and life. Mr. J. B. Johnson, author of THE CHURCH AND THE SACRAMENTS (Skeffington, 5s.), deals with these larger topics and serves not only religion, but the higher philosophy. His position is thus stated under the heading "Rationale of Sacraments":—

The curiously unreasonable theory that man could be saved by a process that was entirely spiritual contradicts not only the nature of man himself, who is combined of flesh and spirit, but makes of none effect the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, in Whom the Divine and Human Natures are forever united.

He teaches that the whole universe is sacramental, "an outward and visible sign" of an inward power and of that infinite Energy from which it proceeds. We hope, by the way, that if Mr. Johnson's book reaches a second edition he will correct the bad misprint on page 126, where, instead of "Mr. St. George Mivart," we read "Mr. George Mirvin."

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE. Dr. Horton, as we have seen, stops short of the legitimate conclusion to which his arguments would lead him; he disallows any supernatural or magical virtue in the Sacraments, but he admits the great miracle of the God-head of Christ. But in THE GOSPEL OF JOY (Isbister, 6s.) Mr. Stopford Brooke carries the negation of miracle to its legitimate and logical issues:—

When the Christian Church [he says] long after the death of its Master looked back upon His life, and on all that since His departure had happened to fill the hearts of His followers with heavenly joy and hope, they made, or rather there grew up among them, in order to express their deep emotion, the poetic story with which the birth of Jesus was celebrated.

Out of the hearts of the poor who flocked into the doors of the Church of Christ and found peace and pleasure of heart in the love of Jesus flowed the wonderful beauty of this ancient poem.

Mr. Stopford Brooke's sermons show all his well-known rhetorical power. In glancing over his utterances, and those of other schools of religious thought, one must be thankful, perhaps, that men are not consistently logical; that the upholders of the doctrine of the Real Presence will certainly not answer to the requirements of a strictly rationalist logic; that Dr. Horton, who rejects the miracle of the Real Presence, clings to the Miraculous Birth; that Mr. Stopford Brooke, who rejects the Miraculous Birth, believes in God and in the angels; that many an agnostic cherishes a trembling faith in his heart; that often the professed pessimist illustrates in his life the doctrine that charity shall never fail.

CANON WINTERBOTHAM. In the old school of commentary the maxim seems to have been that nothing must pass without comment, and the parables and miracles were treated as elaborate puzzles, each minutest part being highly significant. Often the results were picturesque, but they were not infrequently absurd, and we incline to think that Canon Winterbotham has taken a wiser course in his interesting book, THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN (Methuen, 3s. 6d.). His view is that the parables, especially those which refer to the mysteries of "the Kingdom," each enforce some special point, and when we have seized this point we are to neglect all else as mere dramatic ornament. Thus, in his treatment of the parable of the ten virgins, the author emphatically denies that the conduct of the "wise" virgins was meant to be an example to Christians, save in one particular:—

Our Lord has evidently no intention whatever of blaming [any more than of praising] them. They only behaved as the ordinary run of people would behave under such circumstances.

They are not Christians, and they do not stand for Christians except in one specific and very limited aspect. They are just part of a story from common human life as seen in the East—like the unrighteous steward or the unjust judge.

They are not moral, in fine, any more than the unjust judge was; but a moral is to be deduced from their story—namely, that as they had a reserve of oil, so the Christian should endeavour to accumulate a reserve of spiritual strength.

DR. BUTLER. Those who have listened to Dr. Butler in the Chapel of Trinity, Cambridge, will be glad of the opportunity of possessing his collected sermons, issued under the title of BELIEF IN CHRIST AND OTHER SERMONS (Cambridge, Macmillan and Bowes, 5s. n.). We may quote one passage—in which he seems to interpret more truly the word “tribulation” than does Canon Winterbotham, who thinks it applies only to those who have undergone martyrdom. Dr. Butler thus speaks in his eloquent sermon on the text, “He that overcometh shall inherit all things”—

There are those [he says] who still are coming out of “the great tribulation.” When they are at their weakest, the hardest tasks are set them, and they accept them without a murmur. Burthens are laid on them which, far from bringing human honour, can only humiliate. They take them, and bear them, despising the shame. Ridicule, calumny, injustice, perplexity, darkness, doubt, all these things sometimes are against them, and at this coldest and darkest hour the Spirit of God makes His voice heard in their hearts, prompting them to some fresh sacrifice and some unexpected venture of faith.

CANON HAMMOND. The vicar of St. Austell, who has had the happy idea of writing THE BOYS AND GIRLS OF THE BIBLE (Skeffington, two vols., 10s.), dwells in his preface on the very great leakage of “young people” from the Church, and, indeed, from all religious communities. He puts forward the theory, which is no doubt a just one, that in the great majority of instances children are wearied by the services which they are forced to attend, and form an early resolution to discontinue their “assistance” at public worship at the earliest possible date. Canon Hammond thinks that long sermons, wholly unsuitable to the childish mind, are among the most important causes of the leakage, and he offers these two volumes of short addresses, delivered by him in his church, as a contribution towards the lessening of the evil. All the sermons are commendably short; all are simple, direct, and fitted, not only for the actual “infantes,” but for the grown-up children who must make so large a part of every congregation.

THE REV. G. WINGFIELD HUNT. We know the Tennysonian dictum as to “honest doubt” and cordially agree with it, but there is a species of doubt by no means honest, and Mr. Wingfield Hunt addresses himself to this variety with much force in THE CATHOLIC GOSPEL (Skeffington, 5s. n.). Here is an apt anecdote related by him:—

A story is told [he says] of a British officer in India, who, having been living an unchaste life, went to the chaplain to argue about religion with him. “Religion,” said he, “is all very well, but you must admit there are difficulties—about the miracles, for instance.” The chaplain, knowing his man, looked him straight in the face and thus made answer—“Yes, there are some things, I’ll admit, in the Bible that are not very plain, but the seventh commandment is very plain.”

It reminds one of the cobbler (cited, we believe, by Swift) who heard that the learned were not altogether in accord on certain points of textual criticism. “If that’s so,” said the cobbler, who had rapidly constructed an elaborate sorites, “I may get drunk as often as I like, and beat my wife as hard as I please.”

DR. CLIFFORD. It has been the hope of many, and not only of members of the English Church, that one day the Ecclesia Anglicana will assume the interpreter’s office and reconcile together the parted members of the great Church Catholic. The difficulties are tremendous; the conditions laid down by the Roman Church, for instance, are at present hopeless obstacles, and undiscriminating Protestantism is almost as intransigent as the Roman Curia itself. The prospects of a great reunion are not of the brightest, and yet one cannot help finding something of good omen in the generous appreciation of Canon Liddon contained in Dr. Clifford’s interesting TYPICAL CHRISTIAN LEADERS (H. Marshall, 3s. 6d.). Dr. Clifford, indeed, has “not a moment’s doubt” that much of Canon Liddon’s teaching “would have been repudiated . . . with indignant energy by the Apostle Paul as forming ‘another gospel’ essentially opposed to the spirit and teaching of the Founder of Christianity”; and yet he went gladly to St. Paul’s to hear the canon’s sermons, and insists on their extraordinary power and value.

DEAN GOULBURN. The SERMONS ON ST. JOHN BAPTIST (S.P.C.K., 1s. 6d.) display, of course, the Dean of Norwich’s power of exposition and personal devotion. We note one interesting passage on the use of tradition, to the principles of which, we need hardly say, the Dean does not consistently adhere in other passages:—

Do we not often . . . pay a higher regard to the interpreters and the interpretation than to the pure word of God? Is there not a constant tendency in all parties to love the gloss somewhat more than the text? To eschew the simple, heavenly manna of scriptural truth, . . . and to crave for the stronger flavour given to it by a Patristic interpretation, or a Calvinistic interpretation, or a rationalistic interpretation?

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

The “Bibelots” deserve a hearty welcome, if only the selection of books to form the series be judiciously made by Mr. J. Potter Briscoe, the editor. They are books for the pocket—their width is under three inches—but we have seldom seen any handy reprint so clearly printed, on such excellent paper, and so well fitted to stand rough wear. The first Bibelot contains Selections from COLERIDGE’S TABLE-TALK (2s. 6d.). The publishers are Messrs. Gay and Bird.

Mr. Fisher Unwin publishes a very dainty edition of George Herbert’s COUNTRY PARSON (3s. 6d.), edited by the Rev. H. C. Beeching. The book now has more interest for the layman and less for the country parson than when it was first written, for the former has learnt to love George Herbert, and the latter will hardly nowadays accept in all things the advice of the Rector of Bemerton. He will hardly, for instance, choose his wife for her skill in poulting, and, as Mr. Beeching in an excellent introduction says, “There is probably only one living preacher”—we hope this is not Mr. Beeching himself—“who needs the advice about not exceeding his hour.” Nor will the cleric of to-day agree that “the country parson’s library is a holy life.” But the parson of to-day stands on a much higher level of culture and breeding than he did in Herbert’s day—a fact which, as Mr. Beeching points out, explains the excessive humility with which Herbert, a man of high connexions, elaborately clothes himself when he determines to take Holy Orders.

CÆLICA, by Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke, is the latest addition to the series of “Elizabethan Sonnet Cycles” (Kegan Paul, 5s. net), edited by Martha Foote Crow. The introduction, which is agreeably written, proposes an explanation not only of the poet’s poetry, but also of his celibacy. It is suggested that “among all the sighing knights that surrounded the much-flattered and whimsical Queen,” Fulke Greville alone was in love with her. The fact that Queen Elizabeth was fifty-five years old when Fulke Greville came to Court is duly noted by Miss Crow, who does not see in it any reason why the poet should not have remained single for her sake. The literary criticism with which the introduction terminates is brief and luminous, and leads up to the conclusion that “in its subject-matter ‘Cælica’ comes nearer to Shakespeare’s philosophical grasp than does the attempt of any other Elizabethan sonneteer.”

The series of “Temple Classics” (Dent), which we noticed at length some little time ago, is continued with CHILDE HAROLD, SARTOR RESARTUS, THE SONGS OF ROBERT BURNS, Browning’s PARACELUS, Keats’ ENDYMION AND THE LONGER POEMS, and MAHABHARATA (1s. 6d. each). The latter calls for most remark. Ancient India has two great epics—its Iliad and its Odyssey—which offer a most curious parallel to the two great epics of Ancient Greece. “Mahabharata,” the epic of the Bharata nation, is the history of a great war. “Remayana” recounts the wanderings of an expatriated hero. More than this, “Mahabharata,” which tells of a war which took place some fourteen centuries before Christ, has for its keynote the rivalry between two god-born chiefs, just as Homer’s Epic has for its keynote the rivalry between Achilles and Hector. Like the poems of Homer, “Mahabharata,” to quote Mr. Romesh Dutt, the present editor and translator, “is an encyclopedia of the life and knowledge of Ancient India”:—

It discloses to us an ancient and forgotten world, and proves a noble civilization which has passed away. Northern India was then parcelled among warlike races living side by side under their warlike Kings, speaking the same language, performing the same religious rites and ceremonies, rejoicing in a common literature, rivalling each other in their schools of philosophy and learning as in the arts of peace and civilization, and forming a confederation of Hindu nations unknown to and unknowing the outside world.

How far the Homeric books represent complete original poems is a subject of debate; it is certain that “Mahabharata” has expanded enormously by accretions gained during the centuries up to a period far on in the Christian era. New nations, new exploits and battles, new legal codes, new creeds, new traditions found expression within the elastic limits of the national epic, which has grown into a poem almost seven times the size of the Iliad and Odyssey put together. We need hardly say that it is not presented to us entire in this neat little volume. The plan adopted has been to take the main incidents which form the story and to translate these only, linking them together with short notes. In the books, however, which actually describe the fighting, and which are very prolix, the editor has ventured on condensation "severe and thorough" rather than simple translation. Thus, on the whole, we have an epic of ninety thousand Sanskrit couplets presented to us in about two thousand English couplets. A complete translation in English prose does exist, but we quite agree with Mr. Romesh Dutt that, for general reading, a verse translation is much more likely to convey something approaching the true impression of the original. Mr. Romesh Dutt is not quite first in the field, for Sir Edwin Arnold's fine translation of the concluding books of the epic is well known, and one episode in it was translated into verse by Dean Milman. Mr. Dutt, who has a wide reputation as an Indian historian and novelist, has proved a very capable translator, and has produced for Mr. I. Gollancz, who is the general editor of the Temple Classics, one of the most interesting of that useful series, and given an opportunity to Englishmen to learn something, in a cheap and handy volume, of a poem which still forms a part of the lives of the two hundred millions of their fellow-subjects in India, and is still studied and revered by every class of Hindu from the highest to the lowest. We are glad to see that Messrs. Dent are also bringing out a large illustrated edition, with photogravures, of Mr. Romesh Dutt's verse translation of the Mahabharata.

The latest of the "Oxford Poets" is an American poet—John Greenleaf Whittier—whose complete poetical works are now issued from the Clarendon Press in three separate formats. There is the ordinary octavo edition, for everyday use at 3s. 6d.; there is an octavo edition on Oxford India paper at 8s.; and there is a miniature edition also on Oxford India paper, in four handy volumes enclosed in a protecting case. Than the last one cannot imagine a more graceful gift-book for a cultivated Quaker. The edition is a reprint of the Cambridge edition published by Messrs. Houghton and Mifflin, of Boston, in 1894, and is the first complete edition to appear on this side of the Atlantic. It includes the verses of Whittier's later years, which were first privately printed and then gathered into the small volume called "At Sundown." Mr. W. Garrett Horder, in a brief introduction, draws attention to the purity of the poet's motives, which, he considers, constitutes his best title to an enduring place in Anglo-Saxon literature.

The recent sensational excursion of Mr. Henry Savage Landor naturally awakens interest in the adventures of the few previous explorers who have succeeded in reaching Lhasa. In the course of the present century only two European parties have managed to get there; that of Manning, whose few and fragmentary notes were reprinted, with an introduction by Sir Clements Markham, in 1876, and that of the French missionaries Huc and Gabet, described by Huc, whose narrative, translated into English by Hazlitt, has long been out of print. A welcome is due, therefore, to the new edition of this translation of Huc's TRAVELS IN TARTARY, THIBET, AND CHINA (Chicago Open Court Publishing Company, and London: Kegan Paul, 10s.). The editor's sardonic remark that the Jesuit travellers did not "use the powers of hypnotism in their dealings with the Lamas, and while being subjected to outrageous tortures," is an unkind reference to the troubles of a recent explorer.

From Messrs. Constable we have received the four volumes of their new edition of Fielding, containing THE HISTORY OF TOM JONES. It should be noted that the advertised introduction by Mr. Edmund Gosse is an introduction to the series as a whole.

The volumes before us only contain the actual text of the masterpiece, together with reproductions of Hoppner's portrait of Sophia Western and three Cruikshank illustrations. The edition is limited to 750 copies, and the price is 30s. net. The first volume of AMELIA in the same series, with a Cruikshank frontispiece, has also appeared.

Lover's "Handy Andy," which we noticed the other day, is now followed in the same series by that writer's masterpiece, RORY O'MORE (6s.), with a good introduction by Mr. O. J. O'Donoghue. So far as print is concerned, we confess it is a relief to turn to this volume, published by Messrs. Constable, from the Fieldings just mentioned, which come from the same house. These books of Lover's seem to us to reach almost an ideal for a library edition, so far as type and format are concerned, and are in the best traditions of this publishing house. The Fieldings are in a thick, black type so large that, although the page is considerably wider and longer than that of the Lovers, it contains about nine lines of print less. The result is that it conveys an appearance of heavy pomposity which seems—so easily is the mind affected by the senses—to deprive the story of some of its literary grace.

Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton issue new illustrated editions of Mr. J. M. Barrie's AULD LIGHT IDYLLS and A WINDOW IN THRUMS, and Mr. Ian Maclaren's BESIDE THE BONNIE BRIER BUSH and THE DAYS OF AULD LANG SYNE (6s. each). The first three are illustrated from etchings by Mr. William Hole, who confines himself almost entirely to portraiture—a method of illustration which might well be more adopted than it is. There is a capital edition of the "Pilgrim's Progress" illustrated on this plan. Bunyan's picture gallery is exceptionally well suited to it. Mr. William Hole has made a close study of the types that haunt the kailyard, and has a clever appreciation of facial expression, but his drawing leaves something to be desired. "The Days of Auld Lang Syne" has pictures in pen and ink by Mr. A. S. Boyd.

Mr. Nimmo in the "new cheap large-type edition" of the "Border Waverley" gives us KENILWORTH, THE PIRATE, and THE FORTUNES OF NIGEL (3s. 6d. each), in which Mr. Lang's introductions and notes are perhaps an adequate compensation for the illustrations; and in the neat little "Temple Scott" (Dent, 1s. 6d. n. each) we also have THE FORTUNES OF NIGEL (two vols.), PEVERIL OF THE PEAK (three vols.), and QUENTIN DURWARD (two vols.), prefaced by a biographical note by Mr. Clement Shorter. Messrs. Dent also begin a "Temple Edition" of Dickens with PICKWICK in three volumes (New York: Doubleday and McClure, 4s. 6d. n.). In a somewhat similar format Messrs. Blackwood publish an ADAM BEDE in three volumes (3s.), following on three previous volumes, containing "The Rev. Amos Barton," "Mr. Gilfil's Love Story," and "Janet's Repentance." We are glad also to see a reprint of JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN (Dent, 4s. 6d.), the best-known work of that prolific writer, Mrs. Craik, and a book which certainly marked an epoch in the development of the modern novel. It is satisfactory to learn that from its publication in 1856 it has been in steady and constant demand. The illustrations consist partly of views of houses and buildings, partly of the flat colour drawings now in vogue for book illustration. One or two of them, set in a decorative frame, are not ineffective. Two more volumes of Mr. Grant Richards' finely-printed "Winchester Edition" of Jane Austen contain NORTHANGER ABBEY and PERSUASION (5s. each).

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

THE ROMANCE OF THE HOUSE OF SAVOY, 1003-1519, by Althea Wiel (Putnam). The most ancient dynasty in Europe—with its forty princes and twenty-seven generations, its constant changes, its almost continual wars, its glorious victories and frequently-threatened but never quite effected annihilation—forms no light subject for the historian; but Madame Wiel has approached it with courage and dexterity, and presents to us a series of dramatic scenes which vitalizes again the romance of the period she describes. The author places the reader en rapport with her subject by beginning with a general historic survey of the house founded by Count Humbert of the White Hands and continuing it down to the victory of Sadowa. The main body of the work describes in detail the incidents of some five hundred crowded years, with the result that Madame Wiel occasionally appears to give us a catalogue raisonné of men and things. Many chapters avoid this fault, however, and present in picturesque phraseology a continuous narrative of events which, as Madame Wiel says, form a "history of grand military successes and noble achievements," but which nevertheless has its darker side. Notwithstanding its courage and its romantic qualities the "Casa Savoia" will always be found fighting with its neighbours, and always on the side that offers it most advantages at the moment. The Savoyards were as rapid as the bat, in the fable of the battle of the birds and beasts, in the matter of changing sides, and have thus gained for themselves in the past a reputation for unscrupulous ambition and disregard of treaties. The geographical position of the country, however, explains much; the race might have been crushed at almost any moment by one of three neighbours. Some interesting chapters deal with the coming of the Savoy Princes into England when Henry III. was King, and when his wife's relations ruled the realm through him and used our "desirable sterling" with a liberal hand to further their own ends in our country and at home. This period gave us the good Boniface who, besides succeeding Edmund Rich in the archi-episcopal See of Canterbury, was "Procurator" of the church of Belley and held other offices which came readily to this handsome, brave, and bullying Savoyard. Here Madame Wiel quotes freely from that shrewd chronicler, Matthew Paris, who had no love for the Queen's family. Among the many heroes of the House of Savoy perhaps the fine flower is to be found in Amadeus VI., the "Conte Verde," the Knight and Crusader of so many delightful stories, the account of whose life and adventures transports us to the very heart of the age of chivalry. These two agreeable volumes will attract all who are interested in the romance of history.

Mr. Fitchett's FIGHTS FOR THE FLAG (Smith, Elder, 6s.) inevitably remind us of Mr. Christie Murray's unlucky hero whose manuscripts are continually declined with thanks, and who receives consolation from a sympathizing friend. This person tells him he is badly treated since his articles are just the Tommy Rot people like. We mean the word in a Pickwickian sense, of course, and we fully admit that "people will like" Mr. Fitchett's "Fights." They are all about battles and sailors and soldiers; the banner is waved, and all is left in a fine state of breezy, if somewhat vague and smoky, patriotism. It is needless to say that when Mr. Fitchett tells of battles on land he takes good care that our allies the foreign dogs are kept in due subordination. Thus, when he has no space to dwell on the "desperate fight round the Schellenberg," he can find space to say what is not true—namely, that it was "the stern courage" of "the British" which at last carried the position. Now the simple fact is that it was not the front attack of the British, but the flank attack of Lewis, of Baden, which forced the Bavarian lines on the Schellenberg at Blenheim; Again, the British soldier is, to speak in a figure, "all over the place." The reader is not chilled by any pedantic insistence on the fact that the British soldier was not a fifth of the allied army, and that the bulk of the fighting fell to Prince Eugene and the Imperialists. Again, the British General is kept in his due place of pre-eminence. "Nothing less," says Mr. Fitchett, "than the warlike genius and masterful will of Marlborough could have wielded with effectiveness an army made up of such diverse elements." Well, it was made up like all the armies of the sixteenth, and most of the armies of the seventeenth, century. Gonzalvo de Cordoba and the Marquess of Pescara, Charles V. and the Duke of Elver, Maurice of Nassau and Gustavus Adolphus, Wallenstein, and Tilly, and John of Wörth had commanded precisely similar armies. But this is mere pedantry. Mr. Fitchett does not write history, but the kind of article calculated to please the emotional Imperialist who has replaced the emotional humanitarian of the early Victorian era. It is a perfectly lawful and even innocent occupation. We can recommend "Fights for the Flag" strongly to parents and guardians who want a book for a boy. If it sets him reading more widely for himself it will do him good, and even if it does not it will do him no harm.

Dr. A. Lockhart Gillespie, the author of THE NATURAL HISTORY OF DIGESTION (Walter Scott, 6s.)—the latest volume of the Contemporary Science Series—has himself done much good work in connexion with the subject of digestion. The book gives a clear and concise account of all that is known of this important function as it occurs both in plants and animals, including a description of the senses of smell and taste and the feelings of hunger and thirst. Metabolism, or the changes which take place in the tissues, dietetics, animal heat, the use and abuse of stimulants, non-alcoholic as well as alcoholic, and the whole question of foods are discussed in a rational manner. Dr. Gillespie has woven into his story many facts observed by himself. Of the carnivorous plants the most remarkable perhaps is the Nepenthes, the walls of whose pitchers are divided into three zones—the upper one narrow and studded with honey cells to attract the insect, the middle one covered with an exceedingly smooth epithelium secreting wax along which the unfortunate insect slides to be engulfed at the bottom of the pitcher in a digestive juice secreted by yet another kind of cell. Many of the insects die in a short time, others try to save themselves by climbing up the pitcher, but they always slip on the polished wax-coated surface and tumble again to the bottom. In large pitchers an additional horror is provided, for the rim of the aperture just below the honey cells is armed with sharp teeth which are pointed downwards and bristle in front of such of the unlucky victims in the pitfall as try to emerge. The illustrations are good. They are taken from various sources, and some are original. There are two good indices—the one of authors, the other of subjects.

Dr. Samuel Kinns has published, with a new introduction, a second edition of his SIX HUNDRED YEARS (Cassell), a title which needs the longer description of the book which appears on the title-page—viz., "Historical Sketches of Eminent Men and Women who have more or less come into Contact with the Abbey and Church of Holy Trinity, Minorities, from 1293 to 1893." The book does not profess to be the history of a parish; but a series of chapters "quite independent of each other," suggested by monuments in the Church, or by the names of persons connected with it. The author has made laborious search among the archives of the British Museum, and has produced a pleasant volume, tracing the course of English history almost continuously from the year 1293 downwards—a course, however, which involves a somewhat lengthy repetition of many familiar stories, such as the episode of the Black Prince and King John at Poitiers, the days of Bishop Latimer, and the history of Lady Jane Grey. The residence in the Abbey of Bishop Barlow, whose character Dr. Kinns is at great pains to defend, gives occasion for a discussion of the proofs of his consecration, without, however, throwing new light on the matter. One of the best chapters is a manful defence of Shakespeare's memory against the charge of deer-stealing; but the suggestion that the early religious training of the dramatist helps to disprove his having shared in a boyish prank strikes one as rather naïve. The dissolution of the monasteries leads Dr. Kinns to lay stress on what he boldly terms a "discovery" of the Act of Parliament conferring the title "Fidei Defensor" to the King, after his excommunication had annulled its former bestowal. The Washington coat of arms suggests a chapter on "the Stars and Stripes," and an engraving by Isaac Newton a description of the coinage up to his time of office as Master of the Mint. For a book which professes to be one not of local interest only, the concluding chapters on the Church itself, comprising a good deal about the author's institution to the living, his relations with the patron, and the particulars of his parishioners, err somewhat on the side of minute detail. The portraits and illustrations are numerous and interesting. On the whole, Dr. Kinns has done a valuable work in producing the book, and the industry which he has expended on unravelling and explaining the antiquities of the very interesting church of which he is vicar is a good example to other beneficed clergy, not only in London, but in the provinces.

Among my Books.

WOMEN AS HISTORIANS.

II.

For at least thirty of the years during which Mrs. Everett Green was at work little or nothing worth notice was done by any Englishwoman in the way of historical research or original work. Harriet Martineau's "History of the Peace" is a very clever and a very useful compilation. It is written with great vigour of style, and still remains a convenient and eminently readable book of reference. But it is the work of a journalist, not of an historian; there was no need for the writer to consult any other authorities than such as the columns of The Times supplied her with. All that she wanted was to be found in the newspapers. Why should she look further? She had lived through all that period which she reviewed, and had, in fact, done something towards making the history which she discoursed upon. It may be doubted whether Miss Martineau had any sympathy with the remote past or any desire to know much about it.

And yet a new literary era had begun. There was, indeed, no School of History at Oxford as yet, nor any talk of such a school at Cambridge. The new awakening did not proceed from the Universities. The English Historical Society was started in the first year of Her Majesty's reign, and one of its earliest issues was the monumental work of J. M. Kemble—the "Codex Diplomaticus ævi Saxonici." Then came the various county Archæological Societies, and others like the Camden Society for printing works that as yet existed only in manuscript. The Deputy Keeper's reports began to attract attention, and all along the line there was intelligent curiosity, till men began to say emphatically, "The history of England has never yet been written—it will have to be written all over again." Not even the great teachers of Physical Science had it all their own way. There was a large and increasing public who eagerly listened for any word that the great apostles of the new school of history were pleased to utter; and a more brilliant apostolic succession than that which began with Palgrave, and included such names as Freeman and the Bishop of Oxford, Sir Henry Maine and Mr. Bryce—to carry down the list no further—it would be hard to find a parallel for; they discovered for us new worlds, and seemed to us to be bringers-in of a new revelation.

Nevertheless, the women were slow to throw themselves into the severer study of history. It has only been during the last ten years or so that they have won any considerable place. Under the mighty stimulus which her illustrious husband could not fail to exercise upon a lady of great literary capacity and ambition, Mrs. J. R. Green has done some very good work, and given promise of doing better work still by and by. Her monograph on Henry II. is a very able one, and exhibits a thoughtful mastery of the subjects under discussion which no mere cramming could account for. The two volumes on "Town Life in the Thirteenth Century" are a solid contribution to our knowledge of town development and municipal history, and full of miscellaneous information of a very interesting and attractive character. But by far the most important contribution to our historical literature which has yet appeared from a woman's pen is Miss Norgate's very vigorous "History of England under the Angevin Kings." The book has been published more than ten years, and no second edition has yet been asked for, but this proves very little and may mean that Miss Norgate was before her age. At any rate, she can afford to wait, for these two volumes will have to be read; and the fact that Miss Norgate writes not for the entertainment of boys and girls, but addresses herself rather to scholars and learners, will ensure her, sooner or later, that sort of lasting recognition which is best worth having. Not that it must be inferred from this that this history is by any means dry, or the style crabbed or laboured. On the contrary, these volumes are eminently interesting. The authoress has a picturesque way of describing situations that need being brought before the reader's mind with precision. She has a good "geographical eye," as somebody said of Dr. Arnold, and her literary faculty is quite above the average. Whether for good or evil, the great "Dictionary of National Biography" has lately taken Miss Norgate captive, and in her last article on Thomas Becket she shows that her hand has not lost its cunning.

Two more women historians deserve to be mentioned with respect and admiration as those who have lifted their heads above the crowd. The one is Miss Eckerstein, whose very remarkable volume entitled, "Woman under Monasticism," exhibits an extraordinary breadth of learning and a thoroughness of treatment which is perhaps only too searching. The chapters on Convents among the Anglo-Saxons, on the influence of St. Boniface, and on Mystic Writings for women in England are full of curious information and suggestive remarks. But Miss Eckerstein's learning overweighs her. She writes like one who tries to drive a four-horse coach while his hands are not large enough nor his fingers long enough to manage the reins, and she is always reminding us that there is such a thing as having too much to say. Do women take as much pains in cultivating a style as men do? Or is not their temptation to be led astray by a fatal fluency on the one hand or by a laboured solemnity on the other?

They who have watched for the contributions of Miss Mary Bateson to the English Historical Review during the last few years can hardly help expecting from this vigorous and largely gifted lady some really important study of the Religious Orders in England which sooner or later will place her in the first rank of women historians. To immense capacity of work and an eminently scholarly mind she adds a severe and trenchant style and a critical insight which are prime requisites for the historian. Yes! They are all prime requisites; for they are all essential to any one—man or woman—who hopes for great success as a teacher of that which M. Fustel de Coulanges did not hesitate to designate as "the most difficult of all the sciences."

From this rapid survey, which obviously could not pretend to be exhaustive, different conclusions will perhaps be drawn by my readers according to their various convictions or their prejudices; the following, among others, seem to me to be obvious:—

1. The study of history in England during the last seventy years, to go no further back, has been pursued with an ardent enthusiasm which not even the votaries of physical science have surpassed. In history, too, splendid discoveries have been made and important results have been arrived at, such as may be classed among the great certainties accepted as axiomatic by the great thinkers of mankind. I cannot remember that so far any English woman has helped forward this march of historic discovery in any other way than by commenting upon or popularizing the great results which have been worked out by others.

2. No work of real genius in historical literature has yet appeared from a woman's hand. The nearest approach to it that I am acquainted with is Miss Norgate's "Angevin Kings." On the other hand, is there any department of our literature which has exhibited during the present reign such a wealth of splendidly original constructive ability as our great masters in history can point to? The modern school of English historians are no longer story-tellers—they are philosophical thinkers. Under their guidance and influence a science of history is being built up, slowly but surely.

3. When we come to compare the manner of writing by men and women respectively in this department of our literature, the most striking fact is the immeasurable superiority of the men over the women in mere style. Here more than in anything else—in some mysterious way which I cannot account for—difference of sex shows itself in a very marked manner. I sometimes think that a woman might have written with the exquisite dramatic skill of Froude, or could even have risen to the almost matchless rhetorical rhythm of Macaulay; but I cannot conceive that any woman could have written as the late Dean Merivale wrote his "History of the Romans under the Empire," or could ever have attained to the stern and majestic style of the Bishop of Oxford in his last volume of the "Constitutional History." In all art—musical, pictorial, or literary—there seems to be a limit beyond which women cannot go.

4. It may be said, indeed, that the much-vaunted "emancipation of the sex" has scarcely had a fair chance as yet of showing what women can do. I, for my part, so entirely believe in the possibilities of the future that I am quite willing to look forward to a time when woman will have no cause to complain that she has less than her "rights." So far, however, in this one department—that of literature, and especially historical literature—there has been advance in culture and achievement among the women students and writers; but, unless my judgment errs, there has been much greater advance among the men. The present outlook seems to point to this: that in the future the great builders-up, the great discoverers, the great thinkers, the great historians will not be women.

AUGUSTUS JESSOPP.

Notes.

In next week's Literature "Among My Books" will be written by Mrs. Clement Parsons, on Thackeray.

A committee of the London Chamber of Commerce is now engaged in investigating the question of the postage of periodicals, and it may be hoped that its inquiries will be the prelude to a redress of grievances. At present an arbitrary distinction is drawn between the periodicals which are newspapers and the periodicals which are not. A periodical consisting mainly of news or comment on news, and published "at intervals of not more than seven days" can be sent anywhere in the United Kingdom for $\frac{1}{2}$ d. All the others have to pay ordinary book-packet rates. The arrangement is naturally a great impediment to the circulation of magazines and trade and technical journals—more particularly in the remote rural districts—and a change in the law, putting all periodicals on the same footing as the newspapers, would unquestionably be popular. The demand for the reform, which is not now being made for the first time, has hitherto been met by the reply that it would involve a loss of revenue which the Post Office could not afford to face. This, of course, is the stereotyped objection to Post Office reforms; and even if the loss were certain—which it is not—the question would still remain whether it ought not to be incurred in the interest of the general convenience. However, as is pointed out in an article on the subject in the Bazaar, periodicals contain advertisements, and the raison d'être of advertisements is that they shall be answered; and the grist thus indirectly brought to the Post Office mill might well compensate for any direct loss caused by the reduction of the charges.

Our note, last week, on the humble beginnings of Blackwood's Magazine suggests a further glance at the early history of Scotch periodicals. For the promoters of Blackwood were not in the strict sense of the word pioneers. The appearance of No. 1 of Blackwood was, in fact, coincident with the appearance of No. 1 of a new series of "a repository for the short and occasional productions of men of genius," entitled the Edinburgh Magazine and Literary Miscellany. The format of this publication is almost identical with that of Blackwood; but in the matter of actuality, it beats Blackwood out of the field. It prints a number of new and original letters by the privateer Paul Jones, and discusses the Proceedings before the Committee of the House of Commons on Steamboats, drawing the conclusion that a speed of seven or eight miles an hour "is as rapid sailing as any one could desire or choose." There is also a picture very well drawn of an ecclesiastic undergoing the torture of the thumbekkin.

This Edinburgh Magazine had existed since 1804, and with it, in 1817, was incorporated the Scots Magazine which had existed ever since 1739. The Scots Magazine was frankly produced in imitation of the Gentleman's Magazine, but the editors allege ingenious reasons for its production. One of their motives was "that the Caledonian Muse might not be restrain'd by want of a public Echo to her song"; another "that the occurrences of Europe might not be wholly lost to make room for the low views of private persons." The magazine began very much on the lines of the Review of Reviews, most of its contents being extracts from the English papers. But it has a special London letter of its own—that in No. 1 is about the pantomimes—and there is a plentiful sprinkling of new and original poetry, and a report of new books, mostly theological. One of these entries pleasantly illustrates the condition of the law of copyright in 1739:—

The main duty of Bishops, a sermon, by Mr. Robert Paton Minister at Renfrew pr. 4d. Done from a copy taken in short-hand, the author refusing to consent to the publication of it.

The Scots Magazine lived until the Constable failure in 1826, seeing the rise and fall of several short-lived rivals—the Edinburgh Eighth Day Magazine (1779) and others.

Even the Scots Magazine, however, was not the very first of the Scotch periodicals. It was anticipated, in 1738, by the Letters of the Critical Club—a sort of Scottish Spectator, and further back still we come to the Bibliotheca Universalis—a quaint little 16mo., announced as An Historical Account of Books and Transactions of the Learned World, issued in 1688. "Our Design," says the pioneer editor of this brochure, "is to publish Monthly Accounts of what is doing Abroad, by the Learned World, and also to report what the Virtuoso's and Learned among ourselves are pleased to communicate. Our Stationer's Trade going not very far as yet, and it being too much for Private Stock to bring home all sorts of Books, therefore the account of many books must be taken upon credit of those who publish them"—a plan which, if it were still feasible, would no doubt commend itself to many publishers of the present day.

Messrs. Macmillan's promised School World has issued its first number and promises to be an extremely useful publication. It is described, rather oddly perhaps, as "for use in secondary schools." Its chief purpose, in fact, is to be "used" in connexion with their work by teachers in secondary schools. Its contents are at once varied and sensible, dealing in a readable way with a great number of subjects connected with the principles and practice of teaching, and will help to keep alive that continued practical interest in, and enjoyment of, their work which is certainly now far more common than it used to be among teachers. Two comments we should like to make. We hope the editor will make a definite and acknowledged attempt to gain the sympathies of assistant masters of the chief public schools—who are not interested, for example, in "child study," but who do want help in teaching older boys—and we trust he will not be too serious or forget that personal influence is, after all, more important than methods founded on the most scientific of inductions. At the same time, no one really interested in public schools will regret the fact that there is no allusion to athletics from the first page to the last of this excellent magazine.

The life of St. Francis of Assisi seems to find an increasing number of students in this country. M. Paul Sabatier's French life is, of course, the leading authority upon the legend of the Saint, but this has been done into English and a second edition has just been published. Not long ago the "Jittle Flowers," exquisitely translated by Mr. T. W. Arnold, came out in Messrs. Dent's delightful "Temple Classics" Series, and Mr. Robert Steele is preparing a version of the "Speculum Perfectionis" for issue in the same form. In the meantime Mr. Sebastian Evans' translation of Brother Leo's touching record has been published by Mr. David Nutt. This looks as if there are plenty of readers interested in the story of the most beautiful figure in medieval Christendom, and the editor of the Quarterly Review evidently holds this opinion, since the first article in the January number is about St. Francis.

* * * *

While Dr. Jessopp has been discoursing in Literature of the work done by women as historians, Mr. David Christie Murray has been making remarks which have offended the lady novelists. He spoke of "the hopeless drivel of a lot of school-girls"; and Mrs. Hélène Gingold protests, in the St. James's Gazette, that "young feminines"—the expression is not ours—do well to write. In such a controversy, of course, a grain of fact is worth any quantity of rhetoric, and it is a fact that hardly any of the women writers of the past whose work is still remembered were what Mrs. Gingold would call "young feminines" when their first books appeared. Fanny Burney, who began at twenty-five, and Charlotte Brontë, who began at twenty-eight, were the youngest of them. As for the rest, Miss Edgeworth published her first novel at thirty-three, Jane Austen at thirty-six (though two of her masterpieces were written, it is true, before she was twenty-three), Mrs. Gaskell at thirty-seven, and Miss Mitford at thirty-eight. The modern sex-novel is usually perpetrated at a much earlier age; but then the modern sex-novel has not yet proved that it can stand the test of time.

Our Oxford Correspondent writes:—

It is as yet difficult to say what is the feeling of the University as to the "Labour College" which is to be established at Oxford. We are told that one-half of the authorities are in sympathy with the movement, but the other half are very antagonistic; so says Mr. Vrooman in the Westminster Gazette, but these animosities and enthusiasms are at present veiled beneath a mask of apparent calmness. In fact, nobody seems to know very much about the matter. But no doubt the beginnings of "Ruskin Hall" will be watched with the keenest interest by the University which it is (apparently) intended to regenerate. Its students are to be domiciled in a large house situated between St. Aldate's and the Castle, in St. Ebbe's, a part of Oxford more ancient than pretentious: a site which is very well chosen, as it naturally carries the mind back to the earliest beginnings of Alma Mater, and is at the same time a protest against the vicious opulence of colleges in more fashionable quarters. All household duties are to be performed by students—a rule which recalls the matriculated cooks and butlers of antiquity. On the other hand—and this at least does not smack of medievalism—female influence, represented by the "Backworth Club," is to take the place of academic discipline! This is a development which colleges will surely do well to imitate. One does not quite see why the new hall is named after the sage of Coniston. It is true that a pilgrimage is to be made to the muddy lane which Ruskin and his more thoroughgoing disciples endeavoured—unsuccessfully—to turn into a passable road, before the master rather unkindly changed his mind and discouraged the enterprise. But it is questionable how far the objects of the Labour College are Ruskinian. It exists apparently for the education of would-be vestrymen, intending county councillors, and "fellows" (it is to be hoped with a small "f")—"who harangue crowds in the streets"—a class, it must be admitted, who need all the education they can get. These and others are to be instructed how best to grapple with problems of practical sanitation and gas and water supply. Such a programme is no doubt admirable, but savours of Philistinism.

The movement for the preservation of decaying languages, to which we referred in our last number, takes shape in the Jewish World in a controversy as to whether Hebrew can become a living language. Mr. Jaffe says no, and points out that in the Hebrew version of the Bible there are only about 5,000 words, while the English language contains 100,000. No doubt one of the chief difficulties in translating the Hebrew Bible lies in the fact that one word in Hebrew may be rendered by so many different words in a modern language according to the context. De Quincey, in comparing Hebrew and Greek, while allowing that Hebrew ideas are "infinite as regards their power," pointed out that they are "meagre and sterile as regards their numerical wealth":—

The Hebrew [he says] has scarcely any individuated words. Ask a Hebrew scholar if he has a word for a ball (as a tennis ball, pila lusoria); he says, "O yes." What is it then? Why, he gives you the word for globe. Ask for orb, for sphere, &c., still you have the same answer; the individual circumstantiations are swallowed up in the generic outline.

Nevertheless, two of Mr. Jaffe's opponents in the Jewish World, Mr. Newman and Mr. Segal, both base their arguments on the many Hebrew translations of European writers—of Shakespeare, of Nietzsche, of Spenser, of Dickens, and others. Mr. J. Suwalsky enforces a somewhat stronger point by referring to the many original works in science and mathematics, lately written in the Hebrew tongue. The controversy seems to be still raging.

That eminent publicist, Mark Twain, has come to the conclusion that the way to effect universal disarmament is to begin by reducing the world's armies to the same proportionate footing as they had at the date of Waterloo. This is not the place to discuss the feasibility of such a proposal, but it is interesting to note that a very similar plan was suggested by Sir Arthur Helps just thirty years ago. In that brilliant book, "Realism," which is oddly neglected by the present generation, in spite of the treasures of wit and wisdom that it contains, Sir John Ellesmere gives a list of the reforms that he would bring about if he were endowed with a life of 900 years, and the consequent supremacy amongst mankind that accumulated experience and wealth would give him. He did not, indeed, propose to himself in his most sanguine moments that he could abolish war :—

We are such a set of foolish, quarrelsome little beasts, and we derive so much pleasure from hearing about sieges and battles and knowing of the miseries of our fellow-creatures, that I should not endeavour to abolish war altogether.

What he proposed to do was to allow the Great Powers one fighting man for each thousand that they then possessed. The naval Powers would be given a ship apiece and one or two gunboats :—

These little armies and navies should go about fighting away like fun, and undertaking what would then be thought great battles and sieges. The newspapers would still be well fed with interesting events ; and taxation for war purposes would be insignificant. I should have, outside the great cities, little model cities, which should represent them for war-like purposes—a neat little Paris outside Paris ; and I should scatter some squalidity in the way of building about Wimble-don-common, and call it in military despatches London.

Possibly Uncle Toby and his famous bowling-green campaigns afforded a hint for the last part of the plan, which is necessary to its efficiency.

The best of the literary articles in the Atlantic Monthly is by Mr. Norman Hapgood, and concerns dramatic literature. His theme is the audacity with which the modern actor will alter the text of a masterpiece in order to strengthen the part of a particular player ; and his illustration is the Daly performance of the School for Scandal. Mr. Hapgood writes :—

Sheridan wrote his comedy for a company of players, and Lady Teazle is a part no more "fat," probably less fat, than others in the play, since Sheridan, in giving an admirably balanced dramatic action, entirely overlooked the necessity of glorifying one actor. There was, therefore, nothing open to Mr. Daly but to supply Sheridan's oversight, which he did with astounding frankness. The orchestra played when Miss Rehan went off the stage ; she took away a speech belonging to Charles Surface, in order to have the last chance at the audience. In dialogues where six or eight persons are of equal importance she sat at the side while the others talked, and when it was her turn for a word she walked out into the centre, all the others faded off, and the word was spoken.

Parallel instances will, no doubt, occur to every reader ; and the theme, we understand, will be developed at some length in "The Actor and His Art," which Messrs. Downey are publishing.

Mr. Richard Gowing, whose death we regret to record, was for several years Sylvanus Urban of the Gentleman's Magazine—the oldest of all our magazines, with a history going back to the year 1731. It was eminently characteristic of the age to which he belonged that he should have doubled this rôle with those of editor of the School Board Chronicle and secretary of the Cobden Club. He was an East Anglian, from Ipswich, and wrote a book on "Public Men of East Suffolk," as well as a monograph on Cobden, and a pamphlet on "Protection," which has continued to be in demand for twenty years. A literary man himself, Mr. Gowing was also the father of literary men. His son, Mr. Lionel Gowing, at one time a journalist at Shanghai, has published a most interesting description of a driving tour from Vladivostok across Siberia to Europe.

The death is announced from Budapest of Dr. Alexander Szilágyi, the eminent historian and secretary of the Hungarian Historical Society, in his 72nd year. His funeral took place on the 15th inst., from the hall of the University Library of Budapest, whose keeper he had been for many years. He was a great favourite, especially among his younger colleagues, who always addressed him as "Uncle Sandy."

At a meeting of the Edinburgh Bibliographical Society, held a few days ago, an interesting paper was read by the secretary on the distribution of Irish Bibles in the Highlands in the seventeenth century. Kirkwood, the rector of Astwick in Bedfordshire, who undertook the work of distribution, met with a good deal of opposition, especially from those who wanted to extirpate the Irish language out of the Highlands. In reply, he published a pamphlet in which he delivered himself of the weighty prophecy that the extirpation "is not possible in this age and it is not probable to be effected in succeeding ages." Kirkwood, however, was a man who deserved well of his country, for he successfully carried a scheme of Highland parish libraries, and to him was due the institution of the S.P.C.K. in Scotland.

The unfailing popularity of Shakespeare with Parisian audiences may be gathered from an article on the theatre by M. Judith Chadel in this month's L'Humanité Nouvelle, which tells of the success achieved by Monsieur Novelli as Othello and as Shylock. The French actor's rendering of the Moor naturally departs somewhat from English traditions. Perhaps its excessive realism is enhanced by the relations of the French with the natives of North Africa. Speaking of Novelli's performance Monsieur Chadel says :—"Ne l'avions nous pas croisé cent fois, à Alger, à Tunis, à Bizerte, à Constantine, à Sousse, à Sfax, à Tripoli," and again "un autre être a jailli devant nous, dans la double obscurité de sa face de bronze et de son âme si éloignée de notre âme et quelque peu, aussi, de l'âme Shakespeareenne." His reading of the last scene is certainly more realistic than the usual English rendering :—

Il serra le cou de sa Desdémone, avec la chevelure dénouée de la pauvre femme, il l'emporta vers le lit où s'achève le meurtre tel "un grand singe de Bornéo," volant une faible proie.

Measure for Measure, which, possibly owing to the frank nature of the intrigue, is now seldom seen upon an English stage, has also just been performed at the Théâtre de L'Œuvre. Monsieur Chadel expresses regret that it was not given in "la dévotieuse et noble traduction de François Victor Hugo, au lieu de cette adaptation en vers français qui dénature la souplesse de pensée et la jovialité forcenée de Shakespeare." But Monsieur Lugué Poe's attempt to restore the mise-en-scène, "qu'on lui consacrait au temps d'Elizabeth," is of much interest (says Monsieur Chadel) "en notre époque où trop souvent au théâtre, le décor prime l'action."

The worthy Scotchman, who, after seeing the production of Home's Douglas, wanted to know what had become of "Wullie Shakspeare," is certainly outdone by an Irish theatrical manager of the last century, whose playbill has been unearthed by the Daily News. It runs thus :

KILKENNY THEATRE ROYAL.

By His Majesty's Company of Comedians.—On Saturday, May 14th, 1793, will be performed, by command of several respectable people in this learned metropolish (sic) for the benefit of Mr. Kearns, originally written and composed by the celebrated Dan Hayes, of Limerick, and insarted (sic) in Shakespere's Works.

THE TRAGEDY OF HAMLET,

This is a bold solution of the question as to the authorship of Hamlet, and opens up immense possibilities for the Irish Literary Society in the new dramatic enterprise which it is now contemplating.

The mistakes which French journalists fall into when writing of English affairs have often been the subject of humorous comment. A gay list of these fills two of the brightest pages of Mr. Roland Belfort's "Johnny Crapaud and his Journals" (The Regent Press, 1s.), a sparkling and unconventional account of modern Parisian newspapers and newspaper men. We gather that a Figaro writer informed his readers that "Disraeli was the father of Lord Salisbury," and that the famous "Whist" of the same organ gravely described Sir William Harcourt as the "leader of the blatant band of Imperialists who flaunt the British flag in the face of the nations." Another paper lately praised the "Lor Maire" for the dignity with which he filled his functions as "President of the House of Lords" ; while a fourth recently announced the arrival in the Engadine of "Sir Labouchère, Member of the Chamber of Lords of Great Britain and Vice-President of the Honourable Company of South African Indies."

Another chapter of the same book is devoted to the sources from which French journals of the baser sort derive their revenues. As there are eighty political dailies in Paris alone, and many of them have no circulation worth speaking of, one naturally feels curious to know how they are kept alive. Mr. Belfort's explanation is this :—

They command a subsidy from the Government Secret Service Fund. The Paris gambling hells pay for creating a conspiracy of silence around their pigeon-plucking exploits. They distribute about 1,000,000 francs annually. Monte Carlo spends about 600,000 francs on the Continental Press for the dissemination of puffs and the suppression of scandals. The principal financial establishments, banks, railways, steamship companies, and other commercial corporations regularly furnish their quota of support. The Crédit Foncier, for instance, probably spends 2,500,000 francs per annum for publicity and occult support.

We, who have so often been accused of insularity by foreigners who, after all, are continental for purely geographical reasons, have in one particular always shown what an interest we take in sunnier portions of the globe. That is the importance attached in journals, such as the Review of Reviews, to the opinions expressed by foreigners, like M. Verestchagin, upon our national characteristics. English writers of the most opposite ways of thinking have attached the highest value to the judgment of foreign nations on English literature and art. Dr. Johnson compared the judgment of foreigners to the judgment of posterity, and Matthew Arnold, rejoicing over the approval at last vouchsafed to Shakespeare and Milton, in France and Germany, speaks of their judgment as that of "the high court of appeal." But judges who from time to time sit upon this judicial bench certainly do not always grasp the true character of the writings on which they wish to pass sentence. It was of no use for Voltaire to put on the black cap with Shakespeare and Milton in the dock, because it was quite clear that they only offended against his own national prejudices. Even the judgments of the most urbane of foreign critics, M. Taine, frequently amuse rather than convince, if only for his attempt to see the origin of some of Shakespeare's finest characteristics in a mode of life which we associate—perhaps wrongly—with the boulevards.

Some such misunderstanding seems to lie at the root of Monsieur Verestchagin's remarks—given in the Review of Reviews—upon the haughtiness of the English. This venerable charge, which the Russian painter revives in a new shape, by referring to our treatment of the natives in India, has long been chief among French reflections upon English manners. Yet it is surely nothing more than a backwardness in certain formalities, a tendency to keep the hat upon the head, a lack of fluency in a foreign language, a love of facts, and an endeavour to find a more direct way to the heart than the decorated avenue through which the Frenchman glides so gracefully. To discover how interesting we really are we must refer to our own writers. For the stolidity with which we are so often charged by foreigners, a great English thinker deftly substituted the more interesting characteristic, melancholy. After all, his opinion was not very different to that expressed by Taine himself when he contrasted French wit and English humour :—

It matters not if French wit be wanting ; they have a form of it for their own use, which is, indeed, far from agreeable, but is entirely original, is powerful, poignant, and even slightly bitter in taste, like their national beverages. They call it "humour" ; generally it is the pleasantry of a man who though joking maintains his gravity. . . . The man who jests here (in England) is seldom kindly and is never happy ; he feels and forcibly censures the inequalities of life.

Whatever may be said of our wit, Monsieur Verestchagin has one word of unqualified praise for the English :—"There is no other country which contains so many real gentlemen."

FICTION.

CURIOS (John Long, 6s.) by Richard Marsh, contains seven stories of the strange adventures of two bachelors. The first and best, "The Adventure of the Pipe," we remember to have read in a periodical some time ago, when it struck us as particularly ingenious and exciting. Time has not robbed it of its interest. If all of Mr. Marsh's stories were as good, "Curios" would be an entrancing book, but although many of the others are above the average of short stories of mystery, they are not carried out so well as the first. There is a blithe out-setting, an appetizing air of romance, and a touch of mystery, but the interest is not always sustained to the end. Mr. Marsh's style is sometimes a little crude, but his book is one to while away an otherwise dull hour, or banish the tedium of a railway journey.

Those who love stories of exciting adventure are liberally catered for by Mr. H. Phelps Whitmarsh in THE WORLD'S ROUGH HAND (New York: The Century Co.). The author appears to have tried his hand at many out-of-the-way trades, and the account of his experiences makes most interesting reading. Now he is "sundowning" in South Australia, and now fishing for pearls on the "Ninety-mile Beach"; and the intervals of his time are filled up with silver-mining, hair-cutting, and other strange employments. Perhaps the best chapter in the book deals with the voyage of the Day Dawn, on which peacefully named vessel there is a most entrancing rough-and-tumble fight. The book is pleasantly written, is full of good stories, and reads like a true record of adventure—which last is, perhaps, the most important point of all.

THE CHILD ABEL, by Claud Nicholson (George Allen, 3s. 6d.), is very French in temper, style, and atmosphere. It is an episode, not a story. The child Abel is the undisciplined, uncontrollable offspring of a Catholic mother, Mathilde, and of an irreligious father, Aristide—although some doubt, by the way, rests on his paternity. His mother dies after a scene with her husband that is distinctly Zolaesque, and Aristide, who cannot guide aright the lad left on his hands, puts him under the care of an uncle, when he finds peace in the bosom of "fanaticism." That is all. But the experiences of Abel are very powerfully told.

If Mr. Edward B. Nicholson, Bodley's librarian, chooses to occupy his leisure with the writing of such very different and commendable stories as THE MAN WITH TWO SOULS and "The Angel of Iblis" and to publish them in a small, paper-bound volume of less than a hundred pages (David Nutt, 1s.), he may be assured of having a sympathetic public. He writes like a scholar, and his contes are above the average. He should not be too serious, however. "The 'Varsity Mile" is a good and not too smart study in undergraduate athletics and psychology, and shows Mr. Nicholson at his best.

Miss Marianne Farningham, in A WINDOW IN PARIS: A ROMANCE OF THE DAYS OF THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR (Clarke, 6s.), aims less at the amusement than at the regeneration of the human race. With the Tsar and Mr. Stead, she sighs for the establishment of universal peace, and treads in the literary footsteps of Baroness von Suttner. It cannot be said, however, that "A Window in Paris" approaches "Die Waffen Nieder" for power or convincingness.

Excellent, also, are the intentions of Gainsford Somers in THE HUMAN OCTOPUS (Simpkin, 6s.), the extirpation, namely, of the gambling spirit of the human race; but the means which she appears to advocate thereunto—terrorism, assassination, and enforced suicide—are somewhat drastic.

Major Paul Norris has surely published his EVELINE WELLWOOD (Jarrold, 6s.) a trifle late in the day. But if there still be readers who enjoy novels setting forth the wickedness of the Land League and the cruelty of boycotting, with plenty of Irish superstition, Irish buried treasure, and Irish brogue thrown in, they will find this book to their taste.

Canadian Letter.

Literature must of necessity be sometimes beforehand with its colonial correspondents. Such has been my fortune in the case of Dr. Parkin's "Life of Thring." But I may, nevertheless, be allowed to say that it cannot but be a matter of gratification to Canadians that one who is at the present time headmaster of one of our largest and most important schools should have been so congenial a spirit to the master of a great English Public School as to have been requested, as a sort of testamentary bequest, to write his life and unfold his views on education, and that he should have achieved that task so well as Dr. Parkin has done. It is also peculiarly fitting that Dr. Parkin, who has done so much in former years to promote the political unity of the British Empire, should thus illustrate in his own person what may be called its growing literary unity. Another book in respect to which you have anticipated me is Gilbert Parker's latest novel, "The Battle of the Strong," in which he so strikingly illustrates the mysterious power of right and the ultimate futility of wrong. For us in Canada a notable fact is that Mr. Gilbert Parker here deserts Canadian scenes, though he only exchanges the French of Canada for the French of Jersey. The recent visit which he has paid us in Toronto, the addresses he there made, and the hearty reception he received may, however, encourage us to hope that he has no intention of following the example of Mr. Grant Allen, or Mrs. Coates (Sara Jeanette Duncan) and losing touch with Canada so completely as to prevent his books being still claimed as Canadian literature.

One recent book, however, of, I think, a very high order of merit, your energetic staff of reviewers appears to have left to me. I refer to a volume of verse called "Nocturnes of New York," by our versatile Nova Scotian writer, Mr. Charles Roberts, whom I had occasion to mention more than once in my last letter. There is much beauty of thought and grace of diction in this little volume of the kind illustrated in

THE STREET LAMPS.

Eyes of the city,
Keeping your sleepless watch from sun to sun,
Is it for pity
You tremble seeing innocence undone;
Or do you laugh, to think men thus should set
Spies on the folly day would fain forget?

A new volume of verse by Bliss Carman is necessarily something which, in a letter on current Canadian literature, one cannot pass over without mention. His "Aurelian Wall and Other Elegies," which has lately appeared, consists mainly of short poems in honour of various poets and writers from John Keats to Henry George, and if they were not graceful and musical they would not be Bliss Carman's. But they will not, I think, add in any special degree to the reputation he has already achieved.

Apart from belles lettres precedence should surely be given to a book by no less a personage than the Speaker of the House of Commons at Ottawa. Catholicity of taste is, I take it, a very appropriate quality for a Speaker, and in his "Canada and its Capital," Sir James Edgar ranges from remarks on Canada's history and system of government to winter and summer sports at Ottawa. But the two passages in the book which would probably attract most interest in England are those in which the distinguished author says:—

No one who understands the people of Canada can doubt that if a supreme crisis should arise in which the motherland was threatened, the whole resources of the Dominion in men and money would be poured out in England's cause as freely as if we were a county in England herself. It would be unwise to commute to-day for any fixed contribution in money the unlimited debt in loyalty which Canada cheerfully owes to the motherland.

And—

This much we do understand, that no nation ever became great, no people ever emerged from Bæotian stagnation, without having the responsibility of foreign relations in some way thrust upon them.

On the same principle of classification I will next mention what I think will at least rank as a literary surprise—a work by an Attorney-General on "Love." Mr. J. W. Longley, Attorney-General of Nova Scotia, from the careful study which he has devoted to his subject, would seem at least as worthy of holding a brief in the Court of Love as he is before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Where he treats of that ideal love which is of the essence of religion, his book undoubtedly suggests considerable familiarity with the writings of the late Henry Drummond, but, in truth, he runs through the whole gamut of human affection and has his views to express on love in all its phases, in all which, indeed, he finds an essential unity.

Passing by an easy transition from love to fiction, I may mention as among books which have appeared since my last letter "Judith Moore," which may be described, perhaps, as a summer idyll of Canadian farm life, by Joanna E. Wood, a young Canadian writer of considerable promise. What, however, I think, is much more worthy of notice than "Judith Moore" is a novel by the same author called "The Untempered Wind," published originally in New York, of which a Canadian edition has just appeared. The theme of this book was, it may be, suggested, to some extent, by Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter," but it is full of originality and cleverness. Myron Holder, the heroine, deceived by the specious reasonings of the man she loves, has made the fatal slip; but her moral nature, nevertheless, retains strength enough to bear with heroic patience her subsequent life, passed in the little village of Jamestown, the narrow and pharisaical religionism of whose inhabitants and their harsh treatment of the shamed and repentant Myron are very tellingly described. Very clever are some of the touches throughout the book, and I believe I could justify the strong assertion that some of them bear comparison with George Eliot. Here, too, I may mention as something of an event in the Canadian literary world, the republication, by a Boston firm, after twenty years, of Kirby's "Golden Dog, Le Chien D'Or," which one often hears spoken of as Canada's greatest novel. It may, however, though not without cleverness, be justly described as a somewhat florid story of splendour and crime, and love and hate, of the old-fashioned type. The scene is the province of Quebec and the period the times of the Intendant Bigot, the same, in fact, as those of Gilbert Parker's "Seats of the Mighty," and a comparison between the two books illustrates in a somewhat interesting way a change of form which has come over novel-writing. A sort of continuation of Kirby's story of the "Golden Dog" has also appeared during the last few weeks in "The False Chevalier, or The Lifeguard of Marie Antoinette," by W. D. Lighthall, in which the scene is laid partly in Lower Canada and partly in Paris, and the period covered is from 1786 to the days of the Terror. It at least possesses the recommendation that if one once takes it up one is loth to put it down unfinished. I may add that the French-Canadian, who appears to be rather a favourite in literature, has recently had a chatty little book devoted to his characteristics and customs under the name of "Canadian Folk-Life and Folk-Lore," by William Parker Greenough, who, if not a Canadian, has at all events spent part of a great many years in the Province of Quebec, and in this volume chronicles his observations about the Habitants. Perhaps, however, the feature most worthy of notice in the volume is the collection of Chansons Canadiennes, with the music. Some of these songs date from the fifteenth or sixteenth centuries, having been imported generations ago from old France and kept alive among the people by oral tradition. Among Mr. Greenough's collection are such old favourites as "A la claire fontaine," "Alouette," "Malbrouck-s'en-va-t-en-guerre," and "En roulant ma boule." Any who do not know the charm and swing of these popular songs cannot too soon make their acquaintance.

A very conspicuous feature of the literature which has issued from our Canadian press during the last six months is the desire that is apparent to place on record, as far as possible, the history of the early settlement of the country and the experiences and habits of the pioneers of civilization in Canada. A book illustrating this tendency is "The Making of the Canadian West," by the Rev. R. G. MacBeth, a readable little history of the Province of Manitoba, which, if slight in texture, at all events preserves the reminiscences of an eye-witness to the progress of that country, and gives the inner history, which is of some interest, of the Red River rebellion of 1869. In a previous volume, published last year, the same author gave some account of the life of the Selkirk Settlers of the Red River Valley, who, for some half a century, enjoyed the seclusion of a home a thousand miles distant in every direction from any settled district. In this connexion, too, a "Jubilee History of Thorold Township and Town," published by the Thorold and Beaverdam Historical Society, deserves mention. Such local histories may not often lend themselves easily to brilliant literary treatment, but they tend to preserve many details of the life and early times of use to the future historian and of interest to the antiquarian. The same may be said of the Bulletin des Recherches Historiques, a French-Canadian monthly publication, consisting of short, signed articles of historical and antiquarian interest in relation to the Province of Quebec, with the very appropriate motto:—

Qui manet in patriâ et patriam cognoscere temnit,
Is mihi non civis sed peregrinus erit.

Before concluding, I will say a word about a book received with a great flourish of trumpets by the local Press and entitled "Fire and Frost," by Ethelbert H. Cross. It is a most strange medley of short stories, verses, critical essays, historical sketches, humour and satire. Mr. Cross seems determined to prove himself a literary Jack-of-all-trades. Yet there is much originality and some depth of thought and study displayed in the strange mixture served up in the volume. In his critical and historical essays, perhaps, Mr. Cross is at his best, and I may cite a passage in an essay entitled "Genius and Patriotism" as an example. Mr. Cross there declares his opinion that the sterility of Canadian literature is due not to a deficiency, but to an excess of patriotism, and that if Canadian authors content themselves with a discussion of local issues, obscurity will be their reward.

The grandeur of the Athenians [he says] lay in the breadth of their genius. While the citizens of other cities or nations were wrangling over local issues, these men walked in their groves and gardens discussing things eternal. The problems that occupied their minds were problems of human destiny, of human conduct, and of human nature. Diogenes lived in his tub and discussed the universe. Aristotle, Plato, Zeno, Socrates, and Epicurus are remembered to-day because they spoke of issues which every age could appreciate.

Many passages at least as worthy of quotation might be cited from essays on Mazzini, Talleyrand, Rossetti, and James Thompson (the author of "The City of Dreadful Night").

I will mention last of all, for one place is as appropriate as another for it, a ponderous law-book of over a thousand pages upon the Law of Mines in Canada, by two Toronto barristers of good standing, in which all that is to be said about the laws connected with mining in the various provinces is collected, both statutes and decisions of the Courts. In these days, when so much British capital is finding its way into Canadian mines, there may be readers of this letter who will be glad to have their attention called to it.

[BY A PUBLISHER.]

II.

I turn now to the estimates for cost of production.

These are furnished with the view of enabling those unacquainted with the mysteries of publishers' accounts and printers' or paper-makers' charges to know for themselves what a book really costs to produce. Here are some examples (I give the numbers they bear in the volume):—

II. "Book of 20 sheets, 320 pp., 339 words to a page, long primer type, 1,000 copies.

Composition ...	20 sheets @ 26s.	...	£26 0 0
Printing ...	20 " @ 8s. 6d.	...	8 10 0
Paper ...	" @ 15s.	...	15 0 0 "

I omit the charge for binding, since I wish to deal with this class of charges later. Now, without a copy of the book itself it is impossible to check this estimate accurately. In the first place we are not told if it is a crown octavo, a foolscap, or demy; secondly, we are not informed if the type is set solid or leaded; and thirdly, what are the number of pounds in a ream of the paper and the price per pound. None of these data are furnished. Eight-and-sixpence is a very low price for printing, and can be done only when the printer uses cheap ink. The average price for 1,000 copies of a crown octavo is about 12s., which would make the estimate wrong by £3 10s. on this item alone.

III. "For 800 copies of a book in demy 8vo., pica type, 25 sheets, 281 words, and 32 lines to a page:—

Composition ...	25 sheets @ 21s.	...	£26 5 0
Printing ...	25 sheets @ 9s. 6d.	...	11 17 6
Paper ...	12½ reams @ 20s.	...	12 10 0 "

My general criticism for estimate II. applies to this also. But, in addition, a gross error occurs. Eight hundred copies of a twenty-five sheet book requires twenty reams of paper, not 12½ reams, and this error shows itself again in the printing charge, so that even at 20s. a ream the estimate is wrong by £7 10s. undercharge. For printing an octavo book of over 500 copies the average price is 15s. per ream per thousand—the price would be reckoned on the thousand scale. Twenty reams would give £15 and not £11 17s. 6d.

Let me give an example of a reprint estimate:—

V. "A second edition of 3,000 copies [of a book of 20 sheets].

Printing 20 sheets of 16pp. @ 16s.	...	£16 0 0
Paper @ 42s. a sheet	...	42 0 0 "

Now what is meant by paper at 42s. a sheet? The statement has no meaning. And if, as in example II., it costs 8s. 6d. a sheet to machine, why charge now 16s. a sheet? And if it all means something, why not make the meaning plain, and not muddle "the many thousands who are thinking of the literary life"? Probably I could put the account into sensible English, but I am not writing a text-book.

Estimate No. IV. deals with a book (size again not specified), each page of which is to have twenty-two lines or 288 words of small-pica type. Now 288 words of small pica in twenty-two lines would make the type-page too broad for a crown, and would not give enough for a demy octavo; and in either case the printed page would look ridiculous.

It is quite impossible to check the charges for composition here given, since these must vary with the nature of the book. Binding charges also vary with the class of material employed, the amount of gold or other decoration required, and the cost of design and making of block. But to show how unreliable these estimates are I may point out that in not one of them is there a charge for printers' corrections or authors' alterations. It is assumed that an author does not or should not make them; but I have never seen a printer's account for a book which had no charge for corrections and alterations. In some cases even, this charge has exceeded the cost of composition. Again, every binder charges for making the binding-block; no such charge is here entered. It is, in truth, only misleading to attempt to give, as is here attempted, a fair idea of the cost of producing a book. It is not a lesson in theoretical mechanics, but an actual demonstration in experimental physics that is necessary. In other words, the student must have the manuscript before him; he must cast it off; he must choose the type and style and size of the page; select the paper; decide on the number of the edition, and whether it should be printed double or quad; he must select a cloth to please a taste; and if he wish to produce a pleasing effect he must employ good workmen and good material. A good printer, for instance, will assist him by his experience. He will use good ink (not ink at 6d. or 9d. a pound), and not stint it. He will have the work "read" by accomplished readers who are paid good wages, so that the correction charges are lowered, and the work is not disfigured by misprints. He will do a hundred and one odd things which are not specified in the charges, but which count materially and which could not be obtained from cheap printers. These are matters which cannot be taught by means of a text-book of the nature of "The Pen and the Book."

On pages 164-5 is given a table which is intended to "show approximately what is the commercial value of an ordinary book—not necessarily a novel—sold at 6s." The table is misleading. It is based on charges which I have shown to be inadequate: it does not give the amount spent on advertisements; and it does not state on what terms the book is sold, so that a fair division of the profits may be arrived at. The table is also inaccurate. In example iii., which deals with the sale of 2,000 copies of an edition of 2,000 copies printed, no allowance is made for "press copies." Example v. has the same error, where the income from sales of 10,000 copies at 3s. 6d. is given as £1,750.

As an appendix to this table, we are told that—

"The cost of production can be, and generally is, made very much cheaper—

"(i.) When a great deal of work is put into the hands of a printer;

"(ii.) When paper is bought in large quantities;

"(iii.) When cloth for binding is bought in large quantities;

"(iv.) By sending the book to a country printer, or to a printer in Holland."

Publishers don't buy cloth; binders do that. Many publishers do go to the country for their printing; but they go to good printers, and their prices do not agree with the estimates furnished in this work. Printing books in Holland is not an unmixed blessing. It has been tried, but not with very successful results. On a first glance at "The Pen and the Book" I thought it was "made in Germany." Certainly I would not delight in sending out so imperfectly manufactured an article. The only implication that can be intended by furnishing such statements as the above is that the author should, on these accounts, receive the full benefits of all the advantages thus obtained. Now, because I, as a publisher of good standing and capital, can obtain certain allowances on the material I buy or on the labour I employ, should it follow that I should make the author a present of them? By no means. The author is not my partner. I buy his literature as I buy the paper and printing and binding. If he desire that I should publish his book on commission, I furnish him with an estimate which he can refuse or accept as he pleases, and the details of this estimate are made up irrespective of what I may make in commission on the sales of the book. In ninety-nine cases out of every hundred I do not believe that I shall make a crown piece in commission on sales. I tell the author that, and try to dissuade him from throwing his money away. If he will have it this way, why, then, my charges are such as make it worth my while undertaking the business, and giving him the benefit of my advice, experience, and staff. Whatever "extra" terms I obtain are legally and morally mine, since these constitute the only profit I can hope to make by doing for the author what he cannot do for himself. If I make any commission on the sales, I have earned them by selling the book.

More carefully to test the costs here tabulated, I wrote to four of the printing houses I myself employ, and asked them to furnish me with estimates based on the data given in this work. Their replies were at least twenty per cent. in excess of the estimates quoted by Sir Walter Besant. But it by no means follows from this that I should accept the offer he makes and have him print the works for me, and for the reasons I have already given. It would be very easy for a publisher to produce a first edition of 1,000 copies of a crown octavo book, of even 360 pages, for one shilling or elevenpence each; but if he value his reputation he will avoid the "cheap and nasty." He must leave the manufacture of such articles to the days when "The Method of the Future" shall be in operation.

"THE METHOD OF THE FUTURE" :—

"Briefly the method will be this. The author will dis sever himself altogether from the publisher, and will connect himself directly with the bookseller and the libraries. He will appoint an agent or distributor, to whom he will pay a commission. He will take upon himself the printing and production and advertising. He will himself incur the risk, if any, of a loss on the first run of the book."

Let us for a moment look into this and see what the method means. We will imagine an author has written a work and that he has, say, £100 to spend on its production—not always an easy task for the imagination. He goes to a printer with the MS. and asks him to go on with the composition. What will the printer say? He will say :—"My dear Sir, I don't know you. You have no account with me; but I'll print your book with pleasure, if you'll deposit the money in advance." Very well; the money is deposited, and one of the terrible charges against existing publishers who ask for the money in advance vanishes. The book is composed, and the author goes to the paper-maker, who deals with him in exactly the same fashion. Well, he is settled, and the book is printed. Then the poor, tired author (who is supposed all this time to have nothing else to do) goes to the binder and is treated as the printer and paper-maker treated him; but he also is satisfied. The book is finally delivered into the hands of the "agent or distributor." The agent has agreed to publish the book at a commission of, let us say, ten per cent. or fifteen per cent.; but he says to the author :—"I don't know you. You have no account with me. The book must be advertised; will you kindly say how much you wish to spend, and deposit the money?" I should imagine this would be the last straw on the poor author's back. "A fico for your methods of the future!" he would roar. "Am I a millionaire?" Still, the matter cannot stop here, and so our author spends his last shilling. The book is advertised, subscribed, travelled, boomed, and the rest, but—it doesn't sell. Every week the author calls on his friends the bookseller and librarian, and wants to know how his book is going. He pesters his friends to buy them, he denies his relations presentation copies. He worries his agent to distribute. Weeks pass, months go by, still nothing comes in. He goes again to the agent—this time for some of the profits. His coat is worn; he has had no square meal for a month; his landlord is clamouring for the rent; generally speaking, he is physically and socially a wreck. The agent looks at him aghast, as he hears the request for profits. "Profits! Is it profits you want? Why, Sir, your book has not sold enough to pay for warehousing! I've lost all my travelling expenses. If this is what your method of the future means to me, you'd better look out for another agent. I'm going to break stones." What becomes of our author? He goes to the Authors' Society, and—but it may be wiser to draw a veil over what happens there. But supposing the book is a success. The author has had to pay cash for all his expenses, but now he finds that he must wait six months before he gets a farthing of his share of profits. What is he to do in the meantime? I see nothing else for him but either to raise loans on what may be coming to him or wait quietly in a workhouse.

Now for author number two. This is a gentleman whose reputation has been made in days when "the method of the future" was not. He is making £5,000 a year by his pen. He has a town house and a country mansion and loves interviewers. He has a social position—is probably thinking of going into Parliament. He travels in the summer and is in request during "the season." He hunts, rides, enjoys his rubber at the club. Also he writes. Has he any time to "take upon himself the printing and production and advertising?" Probably he goes to an agent and says to him :—"My dear Sir, I really have no time to look after all these details. Would you kindly do this for me? I'll pay you an extra five per cent. commission." The "method of the future" is now once more the method of the past. The agent is now the publisher, and he is but human. Time passes, and he is charged with secreting profits, keeping discounts, adding percentages. Wicked agent! He must be inquired into. The inquiry takes place and a bookseller publishes another and revised edition of "The Pen and the Book," containing new "Costs of Production" and a new "method of the future."

Lastly, there is author number three. He has read "The Pen and the Book," and "enthused" over the glowing periods of the chapter on "The Life of Letters." His breast is filled with an ambition to become a great writer. But, alas! he knows no booksellers and librarians, has no money, and cannot afford to "risk a loss on the first run of his book." He is probably a poor clerk, earning a small wage, or living on a narrow income with a wife and family. What is he to do? He can only beg the agent to do for him what he cannot do for himself. And how will the agent treat him? Why, just as a publisher would now. It might be that the Authors' Society will help him. Not at all. "You are not an author," they will tell him, "you have not published a book. Nor are you a member." So he goes home, and perhaps another "mute inglorious Milton" passes away.

But where, all this time, is the literary agent? With the extinction of the publisher, his occupation must, surely, be a very narrow one. I surmise that he has now become the "distributor," working on a commission of ten per cent. or fifteen per cent. Well, I do not envy him his lot. I think if he compares his position now and what it was in the days of publishers he will wish himself back again in "the good old times." In those days he received ten per cent. for sending manuscripts round to various houses and writing a few letters. If they were not "placed" he always had his fee. Now, for a paltry extra five per cent. he must have larger premises to find room for a staff of invoice clerks and book-keepers. He must pay them wages and employ packers, and spend money on string and wrapping paper. He must send out travellers and pay their expenses. He must keep advertising accounts and a counter-hand to attend to collectors. His stationery bill is trebled; his cartage account is an item, as are his postages. His first year's balance-sheet shows that he is working at a loss of, perhaps, ten per cent. It is his turn now to "strike"—and he does. What happens? He arranges for a twenty-five per cent. commission, which means that he works for about the same remuneration as the publisher did of old, and makes the author do all the fatiguing and harassing manufacturing work.

No! "This will never do." Authors will not, and cannot become book writers and book manufacturers; nor will literary agents become distributors. Both know well another game that pays far better.

MR. CROZIER'S MISREPRESENTATIONS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It is to be regretted that the reviewer of "My Inner Life," &c., did not test Mr. Crozier's allegations concerning my views before giving to them further currency. It ought, I think, to be a recognized principle that where an author makes injurious statements respecting some third person's opinions, a reviewer should, unless he already knows them to be true, not repeat them without having first verified them.

Mr. Crozier is described as speaking of "Mr. Spencer's pure and undiluted materialism," and my views are again referred to as "the dead wall of materialism": no indication being given by the reviewer that these characterizations are either untrue or doubtful. How untrue they are the following extracts from two of my books will show:—

Hence the reasonings contained in the foregoing pages, afford no support to either of the antagonist hypotheses respecting the ultimate nature of things. Their implications are no more materialistic than they are spiritualistic; and no more spiritualistic than they are materialistic. Any argument which is apparently furnished to either hypothesis, is neutralized by as good an argument furnished to the other. ("First Principles," § 194.)

It may be as well to say here, once for all, that were we compelled to choose between the alternatives of translating mental phenomena into physical phenomena, or of translating physical phenomena into mental phenomena, the latter alternative would seem the more acceptable of the two. . . . Hence though of the two it seems easier to translate so-called matter into so-called spirit, than to translate so-called spirit into so-called matter (which latter is, indeed, wholly impossible); yet no translation can carry us beyond our symbols. ("Principles of Psychology," § 63.)

I have not seen Mr. Crozier's book, and do not know whether in any place he has recognized the opinions thus expressed; but, judging from the notice in last week's Literature and from other notices I have seen, this allegation of "pure and undiluted materialism" must be presented in so conspicuous and emphatic a manner that qualifications, if there are any, go for nothing.

It is not a trivial matter thus to give a false characterization to the whole of a thinker's works. Many readers must inevitably be turned away from them; many others must take them up with a prejudice which prevents unbiased perusal; and those who are already antagonists are furnished with a newly-sharpened weapon with which to renew their attacks. For the charge of materialism, false as it is, is a weapon which, however often knocked out of the hand of an assailant, is presently picked up by another and used again.

HERBERT SPENCER.

Brighton, January 8, 1899.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Quoth your reviewer of Mr. Henderson's admirable book:—

As to Wallace stealing the widow's beer at Perth 'in his youth,' we scout the idea. . . . An accomplice of Wallace the thief was Matthew of York, who pleaded his clergy. Now, was the national hero likely to be priggish alone in company with a clerk of the hated English race?

Ebbene! but whose idea is thus scouted: the English provost marshal's, who accused Wallace of stealing beer, or the writer who, greatly daring, thinks it probable that William le Waleys the accused and William le Waleys the patriot were one and the same "party"? The charge was never tried, because the accused evaded capture and trial.

The beer, however, may have been drunk by the future patriot, never have been paid for, yet Wallace have been but technically a thief. Which of us can say he never left a town without settling his tavern bill? All authorities agree that, for some misdeed or other, Wallace was in hiding at the time he assumed his great rôle. Being notoriously (see Blind Harry) what Pitscottie called Gilnockie, "ane louse levand man," it is not surprising if he had to quit Perth somewhat quicker than convenient, and the English clerk might not be meticulous in distinguishing between theft and a mere neglect to pay his bills. There is this little circumstance to be noted. Blind Harry (I am sorry I have not his poem at hand to look up the reference) states that just about this time, 1386, Wallace was in Perth in the disguise of a priest. What more natural then that he should refresh himself in company with the genuine article, even were the last an Englishman?

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

HERBERT MAXWELL.

SIR WALTER BESANT'S "THE PEN AND THE BOOK."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am neither an author nor a publisher, but, as a book-buyer and a ratepayer, I have read "A Publisher's" article in the current number of Literature with dismay. A few quotations from the section on the "Royalty System" will show that my fears are only too well grounded:—

Suppose an author agrees to a 20 per cent. royalty. On a six-shilling book (sold to the trade at 3s. 6d.) this yields him 1s. 2 2-5d., while the publisher's net profit [the italics are mine] is 1s. 3 3-5d. This assumes that the first thousand copies cost one shilling each. . . . How does the publisher fare with his £26 (= 400 × 1s. 3 3-5d.) ?

Remember that this £26 is the poor man's net profit. We have a balanced account to show this in the clearest way :—

To Cost of 1,000 copies @ 1s. each... ..	£50 0 0	By Sales—400 @ 3/6 ea. £70 0 0
„ Advertising, say ...	15 0 0	„ Proportion of Profit	26 0 0
„ Author's Royalties ...	24 0 0
	£96 0 0		£96 0 0

What could be clearer ? The 400 times 1s. 2 2-5d. which the author receives goes on one side of the account, the 400 times 1s. 3 3-5d. which is the publisher's net profit goes on the other side, and everything balances up neatly. But stay—there is an explanation at foot of the account:—“ The £26 are all swallowed up in expenses, and the publisher is left with 500 copies of a book worth, probably, waste-paper price.” And the publisher reckons that he will at any rate make a few shillings by selling the remainder to the butterman. I wish, Sir, that I could break it to him gently ; but the truth must be told. He is on the high road to bankruptcy, and he does not know it. The production of 1,000 copies of that book, and the sale of 400 copies have cost him £96 in payments out of pocket ; and he has received £70 from the booksellers. He has drawn £26 of his own capital to make up the deficiency, and yet he only complains of having lost his net profit.

Lest there should be any doubt as to his meaning, he gives a second example. In this the author gets 1s. 2 2-5d., while the publisher receives but 11 1-10d. The result is that the total payments for printing 1,000 copies and selling 400 copies amount to £117 ; while the 400 copies bring in £70. And this is his comment on the transaction :—“ So that, after giving back his proportion of profits, the publisher has, in addition, to pay £28 10s.” An ordinary business man—perhaps even an author—would say that the publisher makes a dead loss of £47.

It appears, then, that publishers must have started with enormous capital to keep this sort of thing going on for so long. But no amount of capital can stand it for ever. And since publishers do not realize how rapidly they are losing money, we must be approaching a crisis when they will be ruined and forced to take refuge in the workhouses. The authors must follow them, as there will be no one left to pay them those sums of 1s. 2 2-5d. I shall have to pay higher poor-rates ; and, as no more new books will be published, second-hand books will be raised to fabulous prices, far beyond my means. But all this may be averted if publishers will avoid spending their net profits on expenses, and if they will also give some little attention to book-keeping as well as to book-publishing.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

January 17.

PLAIN FIGURES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Permit me to point out that “ A Publisher ” in his article in to-day's issue of Literature understates his case by including the “ Proportion of Profit ” twice in his column of receipts from an imaginary sale of 400 books.

The corrected table ought to read as follows :—

To Cost of 1,000 copies @ 1s. each... ..	£50 0 0	By Sales—400 @ 3/6 each, i.e. :—
„ Advertising, say ...	15 0 0	1s. cost ...	£20 0 0
„ Author's Royalties ...	24 0 0	1s. 2 2-5d. Author	24 0 0
	£96 0 0	Net loss ...	£96 0 0

It is simply by the accident of fixing Travelling Expenses, &c., at £7, and Advertising at £15, that the net loss happens to be the same amount as the publisher's portion of the proceeds of sales.

The same remarks apply to the next table, which ought to show a net or absolute loss of £47.

Your obedient servant,

HUGH D. MACDONALD.

“ LIKE HE DID.”

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I see that a correspondent of Literature gives examples of the use of this expression by a Canon, a Queen's Counsel, and myself ; and he asks whether it is going to be generally adopted. I hope not. It appears from your correspondent's letter that only one of us wrote the phrase. The preacher rolled it through Westminster Abbey, and in the evening of the same Sunday I used it at the Passmore Edwards Institute. Into such fine company I have strayed by a slip of the tongue ! My “ lecture ” on Dr. Johnson was but a series of readings connected by nervous remarks, and if I said “ like Mr. Augustine Birrell does ” I now beg to substitute “ as,” and withdraw from the gaze of grammarians.

I am, yours, &c.,

WILFRED WHITTEN.

Authors and Publishers.

Mr. Goldwin Smith is engaged upon a political history of the United Kingdom down to the Reform Act of 1832, short and popular in character. Mr. Goldwin Smith speaks of this work as the last that he will undertake ; it will probably be published in the autumn.

The “ History of Japanese Literature,” which Mr. W. G. Aston has written for the series which Mr. Gosse is editing for Mr. Heinemann, differs from those which have preceded it in the fact that two-thirds of it is translation and only one-third history or criticism. The Japanese have cultivated a voluminous literature for upwards of twelve centuries, but forty years ago no Englishman had read one page of a Japanese book. Even now no history of Japanese prose and poetry exists in any European language, and Mr. Aston, whose life has been given to this subject, has a free field, and is of opinion that the richness and variety of the ancient prose literature of Japan will astonish English readers. One curious fact is that Japanese is the only language in which women have excelled in classical times. The great writers of the eleventh century were all women, and an analysis of and quotation from their works promises much entertainment. Mr. Aston brings his subject up to the very latest writers now taking advantage of the Japanese copyright law in Tokio and in Yokohama.

We understand that Lady Burghclere is engaged on a Life of George Villiers, Second Duke of Buckingham. The career of this versatile personage has never before been written in detail, and the romantic episodes of his life—as important as it was frivolous—may well furnish material for an interesting work.

“ A Political History of Contemporary Europe ” is to be the English title of M. C. Seignobos' work which will be published here this year by Mr. Heinemann. Beginning with the critical year 1814, Mr. Seignobos' aim has been to write an explanatory rather than a narrative history, and to form a summary of a period over which it has been almost impossible hitherto to get a comprehensive view.

“ A Short History of the Saracens,” being a concise account of the rise and decline of the Saracenic power, by the distinguished native Indian writer Ameer Ali (Syed), will be published immediately by Messrs. Macmillan.

Some further additions are to be made to Macmillan's popular “ Eversley Series.” Mr. J. R. Green's “ Conquest of England" will form a suitable pendant to his two former historical works which have already been issued in this series. Under the title of "Essays from the Spectator" will appear a posthumous selection from the contributions of the late editor of that periodical, Mr. R. H. Hutton. The first volume of a new edition of Shakespeare (with introduction and short notes to the plays and poems, by Professor Herford), to be completed in ten monthly volumes, is also to be issued at the end of January.

George Borrow was a fascinating personality, and the Life, Writings, and Correspondence of the famous scholar-gipsy which are to appear early in March ought to be very good reading. He had an adventurous life, as he told the world in his delightful books, and there must surely have been many interesting incidents that he did not relate, and which will come fresh from the biographer's pen. The biographer in this case is Professor William Knapp, and the publisher will be Mr. Murray. The Life comes at an opportune moment. The expiring of the copyright of "Lavengro" is sure to bring forth some cheap editions of that very entertaining blend of romance and personal experience, while the excellent gipsy scenes of "Aylwin" ought to send many readers to the writer from whom Mr. Watts-Dunton drew much of his inspiration.

Sir Alfred Lyall is republishing his "Asiatic Studies, Religious and Social," and adding to them yet another series. The two volumes—one containing the original matter and the other the new studies—will be issued in a month or two by Mr. Murray. Another book about India—of a less serious character—which may be expected about the same time, is Mr. Mark Thornhill's "Haunts and Hobbies of an Indian Official." Mr. Thornhill has already published the "Experiences of a Magistrate during the Indian Mutiny." His new volume will deal with less exciting events, and will give a picture of an Indian Civil Servant's life and recreations in peaceful times. A third work of Indian interest which Mr. Murray has in hand is "Lumsden of the Guides," by Gen. Sir Peter Lumsden and Mr. George R. Elmslie, C.S.I.

"An account of the history, topography, and antiquities of the cities, towns, and villages of the county of York, founded on personal observations made during many journeys through the Three Ridings" is the sub-title of Mr. J. S. Fletcher's new book, "A Picturesque History of Yorkshire." The list of illustrators alone will give a general idea of the scale on which Messrs. Dent propose to produce this work; it includes Alfred Parsons, W. Hyde, John Fulleylove, Herbert Railton, George S. Elgood, J. Ayton Symington, G. P. Rhodes, Helen M. James, Jessie Macgregor, and Bertha Newcome. Mr. Fletcher, who is well known as the author of various publications closely associated with the county and its traditions, is a Yorkshireman by birth and has lived in Yorkshire nearly all his life.

We regret that in a note which we published in our last issue as to Mr. Fletcher's new novel, "The Paths of the Prudent," through the unfortunate omission of a line, an erroneous statement was made as to this novel. It is not the case that it includes "roadside scenes during the Civil War" and that it has been published in the United States. These statements referred to another book by Mr. Fletcher called "At the Sign of the Blue Bell." "The Paths of the Prudent" has never been previously published. We refer elsewhere to the little poem by Mr. Fletcher in the birthday number of the Star.

The Rev. Mr. Fitchett, author of "Deeds that Won the Empire," whose "Fights for the Flag" we review elsewhere, is a Wesleyan clergyman, who two years ago was the President of the Victorian Conference. He is principal of the Methodist Ladies' College at Hawthorn, a suburb of Melbourne, and likewise edits several religious papers as well as the Australian edition of the Review of Reviews. He is also a steady contributor to the Melbourne Argus. From all which it is clear that he is a man of extreme industry.

A rich vein, hitherto practically unworked, of architectural study is to be found in the Dutch farmsteads and country houses of Cape Colony. They are from one to two centuries old and upwards, scattered among umbrageous surroundings in the districts neighbouring on the Cape peninsula. The Cape Times has published a Christmas Annual for 1898, under the title "Old Cape Homesteads and their Founders," which gives a very attractive idea of these buildings, which embody a distinct style of domestic architecture, a variant of the Holland or Belgium urban styles of the contemporary period, adapted to rural and to Colonial conditions. The letterpress and a number of illustrations are by Mrs. A. P. Trotter, and we understand that this lady is preparing an illustrated book on the subject on a more elaborate scale.

Mr. Houston S. Chamberlain, whose life of Wagner is well known, has completed the first part of his work on the nineteenth century. The introductory volume will be published in February, and will deal with the past in its relation to and influence upon the life and thought of the present century.

On March 1 Mr. Grant Richards will publish the first issue of a new monthly magazine to be entitled the Butterfly. Our readers may perhaps remember the little venture of the same name which ran during the year 1893. This new periodical is to be a continuation of the old; but a continuation amounting to an entirely new departure. The artists who, six years ago, associated themselves in that undertaking have now recruited their ranks, and on its art side the contributions will be by Messrs. Maurice Greiffenhagen, G. D. Armour, Max Beerbohm, A. S. Hartrick, E. J. Sullivan, Raven Hill, J. W. T. Manuel, S. H. Sime, and Edgar Wilson. On its literary side the Butterfly will contain contributions by Messrs. Arthur Morrison, Barry Pain, "Adrian Ross," Max Beerbohm, H. D. Lowry, Walter L. Emanuel, and Robert Bell. The magazine will be issued monthly at a price of sixpence per number.

After passing through two editions in Germany, and having appeared in the Russian and Italian languages, Professor Max Verworn's great work, "General Physiology," an outline of the science of life, has now been edited and done into English by Dr. Frederic S. Lee, Professor of Physiology in Columbia University. Messrs. Macmillan are the publishers.

Mr. Charles de Kay has prepared a translation of M. Leon Daudet's book on his father, Alphonse Daudet, which will be published shortly by Messrs. Sampson Low. The volume will contain intimate studies of the novelist and sketches of the family life generally of the Daudets.

"The History of Educational Theories in Britain" is to be the title of the new work by Mr. H. L. Mark, of Owens College, Manchester. The book begins with the Middle Ages, dwells on the Renaissance period, and is brought down to the present day.

Mr. Fred T. Jane, whose enlarged edition of "All the World's Fighting Ships" we mentioned in Literature of December 17, has completed a novel dealing with life in East Devonshire and is now writing a story of the modern Navy on lines that have not yet been tried. Mr. Jane, by-the-by, is, we believe, a descendant of the original of "The Vicar of Bray," or at any rate of the divine generally supposed to have been the Vicar of Bray's original, the Rev. Joseph Jane, D.D., Regius Professor at Oxford, tempore James II. and William III.

Mr. William Heinemann will very shortly publish in book form the articles, written in the first place for Scribner's Magazine, on "The Cuban and Porto Rican Campaigns," by Richard Harding Davis. Mr. Davis has added a carefully-considered summary of his impressions as war correspondent, which he had no leisure to set down exactly during the campaigns. These should be valuable as descriptive of the warfare of two modernly-equipped nations. The book is illustrated by many photographs, taken on the spot, giving graphic representations of the many engagements at which Mr. Harding Davis was present.

Professor Saintsbury is to be congratulated upon the approaching issue of the fortieth and concluding volume of Balzac's "Comédie Humaine," published by Messrs. Dent. Among the littérateurs who have been associated with the editor in this entirely new translation are Miss Ellen Marriage, Mrs. Clara Bell, and Mr. James Waring, the illustrations having been supplied by Messrs. W. Boucher, D. Murray Smith, and J. A. Symington. A large paper edition is shortly to be in the hands of the booksellers, and such an edition should go far to do away with the reproach that Balzac is not read in this country as he should be.

Among the numerous histories of English literature now current in England there is, so far as we know, none in which the author has fully realized that, even for quite advanced students, it is necessary to provide a fair number of illustrative extracts. This is a point not overlooked in the "Intermediate Text-Book of English Literature," which was begun some years ago by the late Mr. W. H. Low, and has now been completed by Mr. A. J. Wyatt. The work will henceforth be issued in two parts, the first dealing with English literature from its earliest beginnings to 1660, the second covering the period, 1660-1832.

Mr. Neil Wynn Williams, whose study of Greek character, "The Bayonet that Came Home," we noticed last year as "a delicate, characteristic picture of provincial life," has now completed a story of English provincial life founded on a long acquaintance with the rural population. It is to be entitled "The Green Field: A Novel of the Midlands," and will be published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall in February.

Captain Edward Spencer—"Nathaniel Gubbins" of the Sporting Times—who achieved such a popular success with his cookery book entitled "Cakes and Ale," has just passed for press the last sheets of a work on "drinks." The title of the work is to be "The Flowing Bowl." It will form a treatise on drinks of all kinds and of all periods, and will be interspersed with many anecdotes and reminiscences. The book will be issued next month by Mr. Grant Richards, uniform with "Cakes and Ale," but with a new cover-design by Mr. Phil May.

Messrs. Methuen will publish later on this year an elaborate edition of "The Leviathan" of Thomas Hobbes, which Mr. W. G. Pogson-Smith, of St. John's College, Oxford, is editing.

During the spring season Messrs. Duckworth will publish the second edition of "Spinoza: His Life and Philosophy," by Sir Frederick Pollock, and two more volumes of "The Saints" Series—"S. Ignatius of Loyola," by Henri Joly, formerly Professor at the Sorbonne, translated by Mildred Partridge; and "S. Louis," by Marius Sèpet, Librarian of the National Library, Paris, translated by C. Kegan Paul. The translations are edited by the Rev. G. Tyrrell.

"Arbor Vitæ" is the title Mr. Godfrey Blount has chosen for his book on the nature and development of imaginative design for the use of teachers and handicraftsmen. The work will shortly be issued by Messrs. J. M. Dent and will form a demy 4to. volume of nearly 250 pages, copiously illustrated by specimens of decorative design. Another book on a different subject, which will interest lovers of home music and pianists generally, is to come also from Messrs. Dent. This is "A History of the Pianoforte and Pianoforte Players," by Dr. Oscar Bie, with portraits, illustrations, facsimiles, and new original compositions. The translators are Messrs. Kellett, M.A. Oxon, and E. W. Naylor, M.A., Mus.D. Cantab.

Messrs. George Newnes is publishing, by arrangements with Messrs. Sampson Low, a popular edition, in eighteen sixpenny weekly parts, of Stanley's "Through the Dark Continent," containing all the original illustrations and a specially prepared map, together with a new introduction by the author. Part I. will be ready on February 1.

EIGHTY YEARS OF CRITICISM.

Next week will witness the publication of the thousandth number of Blackwood's Magazine, an event which will receive commemoration in the enlarged form to be given to the February issue of the venerable periodical in honour of the occasion. Eighty odd years is of course no extraordinary term of life for an English newspaper, our journalism, daily and weekly, having, as we all know, a much longer history behind it than our monthly magazines and reviews. But we need hardly say that octogenarianism among these latter almost constitutes a "record." Their average term of existence if it were to be actuarially calculated would fall conspicuously short of the Psalmist's span; so much so, indeed, that this vigorous old monthly, which has proved itself "so strong" as to reach fourscore without any signs of its strength becoming "labour and sorrow," has, with the single, and perhaps doubtful exception of the time-honoured organ of Silvanus Urban, no living companion of anything even distantly approaching to its own age. The longest-lived of its contemporaries was born thirteen years later and expired seventeen years ago; and the next in point of seniority has still another forty odd years to live before it will be in a position to celebrate its eightieth birthday. Of the dim multitude which have fitted across the stage of literary life and disappeared after a few years of existence into the realms of Dis it is unnecessary to speak. Some half-dozen of them lived long enough and with enough distinction to leave a name behind them in the annals of our literature—though sometimes, indeed, a name derived only from the accidental and temporary association with them of some writer destined to become a classic; but the rest are shadows. Many, moreover, even of these have resembled the doyen of our monthlies only in their interval of issue. They have been "miscellanies" in the true sense of the term rather than "reviews," even sometimes when they bore the latter name; and among their varied contents they have relied more upon the serial story, the biographical or historical essay, the sketch or study from man or nature, than upon any contributions bearing directly on the subject of literature. But it has been the distinction of Blackwood—while providing, of course, for a due variety of tastes among its readers—to have maintained throughout its long life that well-marked character of a critical review, which, from the first, or almost from the first—for we might, no doubt, dismiss from consideration those early and tentative efforts so well described by Mrs. Oliphant—had been impressed upon it. Hence, in its life-history, we are able with tolerable accuracy to trace the general progress and development of English literary criticism.

The result of such a survey arouses, as might be expected, a mixture of feelings. Only, at least by those among us who have adopted the modern conception—in some important respects a fallacious conception—of criticism as a science or quasi-science can it be regarded with unalloyed complacency. To those, on the other hand, for whom criticism has always been, and who hope that it may ever remain, a branch of literature—an art which will forfeit its artistic character in exact proportion to its undue striving after an impossibly scientific basis—it must often be difficult to escape the feeling that in the course of the last eighty years it has lost more than it has gained. It is easy, of course, to enumerate the various offences against all sound canons of the critical art of which its early professors—little suspecting it, good souls, to be a Science, with or without a capital letter—were habitually guilty; and perhaps no happier hunting-ground for these errors could be found than in the pages of our revered "Maga" during the first twenty years or so of its career. To begin with, there was the well-known error—an error of such naïveté and so full of the "freshness of the early world" that it almost disarms censure—of judging a book, not on its literary merits, but by the political opinions of its author. Next there was the error—if such it can be called, for it seems to deserve a harsher name—of deliberately undertaking the criticism of a book in a spirit of personal animosity to the writer. Then, again, there was the more venial error founded on what has been described as “the complaint that the author has written his own book instead of the critic’s,” who accordingly criticizes it from the point of view of its success in realizing, or its failure to realize, not its author’s conception of what it should be, but its critic’s theory of what it ought to be. And, yet again, there is the error of treating a book, not as a work to be interpreted and appraised by its reviewer, but merely as affording him an opportunity to display his own superior knowledge of the subject, or the wit and eloquence with which he can discourse upon it or upon collateral topics more or less remotely connected with it.

Besides these there were other errors abundantly exemplified in the criticism of the past; but these, as the most frequent and conspicuous, will suffice for purposes of illustration, and of these, we may no doubt say without undue vanity that they have been either corrected altogether, or appear only in a much mitigated form in the critical work of the present day. For instance, no Tory or Radical reviewer would nowadays think of “slating” a meritorious novel or disparaging a valuable biography, or a well-written volume of essays, because it happened to be the product of a Radical or Tory pen. And though personal dislike of a writer may still occasionally—for we are still human—add emphasis to a critic’s disapproval of his work, the open avowal of such a “critical” attitude as was revealed by Macaulay when, awaiting an unpublished book of Croker’s, of the merit of which he could have no possible knowledge, he expressed not merely his desire but his intention of “dusting the varlet’s jacket for him,” would in these days be impossible. Again, though the critic is doubtless not yet wholly free from the tendency to impose his own theories on the author, and is not always proof against the temptation to exhibit the treasures of his wit and information to the neglect of his proper business, it may yet, we think, be fairly said that the more competent members of the craft make, for the most part, an honest attempt to judge of books from the standpoint of those who have written them, and show, further, a sufficient consciousness of the fact that it is their primary function to display the artistic merits or demerits of their author rather than the wealth of their own attainment or the brilliancy of their own literary genius.

On the other hand, it is surely undeniable that, in freeing itself from these defects as an art or science of the interpretation and appraisal of literary products, criticism has lost some of its attractions as literature. That, indeed, was inevitable. A judicial pronouncement cannot, without deviating from its true character, be made as interesting and animating as a fine piece of forensic advocacy; nor does it or should it reveal as much of the individuality of the man who delivers it. The frank impressionism of Christopher North, and even the prejudice and paradox of De Quincey, have for the reader of to-day a certain charm which is quite independent of the purely literary attractions of their respective styles. The most perversely aberrant of their criticisms are still alive—as much so, almost, as Johnson’s stolidly inappreciative analysis of Milton’s “Lycidas,” or his frigid examination of the poetry of Gray. For all of them have the great human attraction of disclosing to us a human personality which begins by impressing us with its original and individual elements of force or beauty, and ends by possessing us with a perpetual curiosity to study it in its attitude towards each successive work of literature which is placed before it. And the consciousness of exercising this attraction naturally reacts for good as well as evil on the writer who exercises it. No doubt it must tend—and we see plainly that in the past it did, in fact, tend—to foster in him such qualities as vanity, arrogance, and dogmatism; but, beyond question, it quickened his intellectual powers and his literary faculty to an extraordinary degree. Critics of the eminence and with the audience of those who flourished, a small but an admired—and dreaded—band, in the earlier years of the present century, wrote under something like the same stimulus as that which now sustains the energies only of the successful novelist and the popular actor. Nowadays, the critic’s public is immensely larger and indefinitely less interested in his individual performances, which, moreover, in themselves, have become so frequent as to have grown wearisome and are getting too short to be interesting. No blame for this can be attributed to anything but the influence of destiny. As books continue to multiply with the fecundity of the minutest organisms in the lowest and simplest forms of life, and as readers tend more and more to become as the stars in the sky and as the sand on the seashore, it is inevitable that criticism also should adapt itself to the new conditions, that it should become more and more of a convenient business of registration and certification adapted to the immediate needs of authors and publishers, and should retain less and less of its original character as an independent and self-sustaining branch of literature.

Hitherto, the study of English literature has not proved as attractive to German as to French critics. To MM. Taine, Jusserand, Angellier, Legouis, Davray, Filon, Morel, and Texte we owe some illuminating work, and French interest in Tennyson’s work has recently been remarkable. Quite recently we reviewed a translation of “In Memoriam,” and at the present moment Becket is appearing in the Revue d’Art Dramatique, done into French prose by Mlle. Marie Sainclair. In Germany, Hettner is almost the only contemporary critic who has dealt with English literature per se. Other critics, however, like Eric Schmidt, write of it incidentally, and Carlyle and Tennyson form the subjects of monographs by Th. Fischer. A deeper interest in our literature is, in fact, gradually arising in Germany. Meanwhile, an interesting announcement comes from Austria—viz., that Leon Kellner, of the University of Vienna, is engaged on a history of English poetry in the reign of Victoria.

In the latest list of promotions to membership of the Legion of Honour we find the names of three men of letters—M. Georges Courteline, a humourist; M. de Curel, of the Théâtre Libre; and M. Georges d'Esparbés, a writer of bloodthirsty short stories about the Middle Ages. None of the three is quite so famous as M. Zola, who was lately ejected, or M. de Pressensé, who lately retired of his own free will from that distinguished body; but their preferment serves to illustrate the importance which the French still attach to literature as a department of human endeavour worthy of public recognition. With us, when a literary man is decorated, the reason is generally to be found in some service which is not distinctly literary. Sir Martin Conway, for example, had distinguished himself as an explorer; Sir Edwin Arnold had done good work in connexion with the Indian Education Department; Sir Walter Besant had invented the Society of Authors and the People's Palace; Sir Lewis Morris had claims upon the Liberal Party; Lord Lytton's peerage was not the reward of his novels, but of the services which he had rendered his country as Colonial Secretary; Lord Houghton was not made a Baron for writing "Strangers Yet," but for political services, including a somewhat precipitate change of his political opinions. The cases of Lords Macaulay and Tennyson are almost the only exceptions to the rule that come to mind, and the former had been a distinguished public servant and a Cabinet Minister.

Ceylon is not, perhaps, the part of the British Empire that one would have expected a priori to show the way in the matter of copyright legislation. Yet, while European Parliaments are still baffled by the difficulty of dealing with the subject of copyright in Press messages, the Ceylon Legislative Council has read a first time, and has named a date for the second reading of, a Bill to secure newspaper proprietors against the pilfering of their "exclusive information" by their rivals. The text of the measure is before us, and its principal provisions may be shortly summarized as follows:—

1. A message received by submarine telegraph and published in a Ceylon newspaper is the exclusive property of that newspaper for forty-eight hours—provided that the period shall not extend beyond sixty hours from the receipt of the message—and must not be published elsewhere. Any comment upon, or reference to, such intelligence shall be deemed to be publication.
2. The punishment for the first offence shall be a fine not exceeding 100 rupees; the punishment for a second offence a fine not exceeding 200 rupees.
3. Such messages to be headed "By Submarine Telegraph," and to state the day and hour of their receipt.
4. Intelligence thus protected must not, until the forty-eight hours have elapsed, be telegraphed to any one outside Ceylon.
5. Protection is not accorded by the Ordinance to documents published by the Government Printer, or the report of proceedings in the Legislative Council.
6. The Ordinance to be cited as "The Telegram Copyright Ordinance, 189—."

The experiment promises to be an interesting one. In Ceylon the measure will probably work satisfactorily. Newspapers and press messages are few there; everybody knows everybody else's business; and the detection of offenders will be comparatively easy. Here the problem is more complicated, as any one can see for himself by reading the evidence lately given on the subject before the Copyright Commission; though even here it may be hoped—in the interest of the enterprising newspapers which spend large sums on their foreign correspondence—that some solution of it will presently be found.

In our issue of the 14th, when referring in this column to "A Child's History of Ireland," by Mr. P. W. Joyce, LL.D., we attributed its publication by an error to Messrs. Macmillan. The book is published by Messrs. Longmans.

Memoirs of the Verney Family from 1660 to 1696.
By Margaret M. Verney. Vol. IV. 9½×6in., xiv.+510 pp.
London, 1890. Longmans. 21/-

It is just four years since the third volume of the very interesting Verney Memoirs was published, and Miss Verney now brings her useful labour to a conclusion with the death of Sir Ralph Verney in 1696. Like its predecessors, this volume is full of light upon the vie intime of the seventeenth century, and the whole book (to which an exhaustive subject-index is here printed as an appendix) must be as indispensable to the historian or the student of manners as are the Paston Letters for an earlier age. Such a book can be best reviewed by the presentation of a few specimens of what it tells: this is one of the cases in which a single brick does give some notion of the whole building.

The present volume opens with an account of the courtship of Edmund Verney, Sir Ralph's eldest son, who is already well known to Miss Verney's readers. After a good deal of heiress-hunting he was safely married to Mary Abell, daughter of a Royalist merchant, turned Buckinghamshire squire, who lived just long enough to become the laughing-stock of his country neighbours by the effusion with which he welcomed the Restoration—notably by a "Collection for the poore King," which he handsomely headed with a donation of £9 16s. 2d. After his death his youthful heiress was found to be a suitable mate for Edmund Verney, whose paternal estate marched with hers. From the quaint description of the courtship, in which the maiden showed herself more eager than her somewhat languid suitor, one may quote an amusing letter of the rector of Claydon to Edmund, whom he was most anxious to see well married:—

I found Mrs. Mary in her morning dresse, a white and blacke petty Coate and wast coate, and all cleane and fine linnen, so lovely proper and briske, I protest I knew her not at first sight, though I had been there a good part of the day but three dayes before. . . . They made themselves merry at Valentine's day in drawing Valentines, and very unwilling she was to be brought to draw (six or seven papires being put together rolled up) for feare she should not draw you. But being persuaded to it at last she ventured, and they say very fairly happened on you to her great satisfaction. . . . I cannot but adde, had I gained her, as you have done, I would marry her, if she would have mee, though I beg'd; and thinke to see more happy dayes in such a choyce, than in another with thousands per an.

Edmund made a good husband, though but a backward lover. One does not augur the best, it is true, from the fact that he wrote to Sir Ralph to bewail the expenses to which the wedding journey put him, somewhat in the vein of the amiable Mr. Cheviot Hill in "Engaged." The catalogue is interesting:—

Besides spending 43 shillings for his wife's wadded cloak, he pays 2 pounds 3 shillings for her silk mantle; "one pound for my pocket money; Wife 10 shillings; gloves 8 shillings and sixpence; and for coache hire these 2 dayes 10 shillings. For a Carman sent for and disappointed 6d.; paid at a play for eight maidens in the 18d. places, 12s.; for their Extraordinaries 6d."

But this was merely a touch of unusual thrift, and Edmund behaved very well under the heaviest calamity that could befall a married man: his poor little heiress was soon attacked by insanity, and proved a heavy burden to the family. "Ah," writes Lady Hobart, the goodness of whose heart was only equalled by the badness of her spelling, "How i pety por cosen mun, that must bar this hevvy cros." Lady Hobart did her best to console old Sir Ralph for this disappointment in his daughter-in-law by urging him again to try matrimony himself, saying, "Your por son will be a very misarabell man in his wif, I fear; be sure you chuse a better, but one you must have." It was with this Lady Hobart that the young couple lived at first, in a house in Chancery Lane distinguished as having "a very handsom garden with a wash hous in it," and rented at the high sum of £55. In this situation they had almost too close a view of the Great Fire. Lady Hobart, who had to remove all her goods "in porters and carts," though her house was not actually reached by the flames, writes a most vivid description of the scene to Sir Ralph Verney. She says:—

I am sorry to be the mesinger of so dismall news, for por London is almost burnt down. It began on Saturday night and has burnt ever sence and is at this tim more fears then ever. . . . Tis thought flet stret will be burnt by tomorrow, thar is nothing left in any hous thar, nor in the Tempell, thar was never so sad a sight nor so dolefull a cry hard, my hart is not abell to expres the tenth nay the thousenth part of it, thar is all the carts within ten mils round, and cars and drays run about night and day, and thousens of men and women carring burdens.

One of the most interesting chapters in the volume is that which describes Edmund Verney's life on his wife's estate at East Claydon. With a mad wife, who habitually broke the windows and took knives and scissors to bed with her for purposes of offence, a disorderly household, and a strong natural turn for indolence, it is a wonder poor "Mun" got along so well and cheerfully as he did. Another interesting chapter describes his younger brother John's experiences in the English factory at Aleppo, where the competition for the Open Door of the East was almost as lively as it is to-day. A Merchandise Marks Act was needed:—"France was bringing cloth into the market, in combination with Spain, calling it Drap de Londres, and marking it, as was said, with the names of English makers." Holland, by way of hampering English trade with the Sultan's dominions, sent a warship into the Red Sea, with instructions to hoist English colours and take "all he could rap and ring from the Turkes, which incensed their Emperor highly." The race for trade is conducted in a more scrupulous fashion in these moral days—or is it greater publicity that we are to thank?

In 1685 Edmund Verney's second son went up to Oxford. With the assistance of the Senior Tutor, Miss Verney has been able to give a very full and graphic account of his life at Trinity, whither it is amusing to note that he carried, besides other provision and "two Guinnies" in cash, a trunk containing "18 Seville Oranges, 6 Malaga Lemons, 3 pounds of Brown sugar, one pound of white poudered sugar made up in quarters, 1 lb. of Brown sugar Candy, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a lb. of white sugar candy, 1 lb. of pickt Raisons, good for a Cough, 4 Nutmeggs." Such a cargo would arouse some interest at Oxford to-day. We should like to refer at length to the chapter entitled "Saint Nicholas' Clerks," which describes the career of two scions of the house of Verney who "took to the road" and died on the gallows, without in the least forfeiting the sympathy of the family for their peccadilloes: such was the temper of the time! But we can spare no more space, and must send our readers to Miss Verney's interesting pages for themselves. Her book, now complete, is an almost unique storehouse of facts about the daily life of the seventeenth century, and makes us deeply grateful that the muniments of Claydon House have survived their numerous vicissitudes of fortune.

THACKERAY AS PUBLICIST.

The Works of William Makepeace Thackeray. With Biographical Introduction by his Daughter, Anne Ritchie. Vol. X.—The Virginians. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ in., xliii. + 800 pp. London, 1899. Smith, Elder. 6/-

The biographical introduction to the tenth volume of the new edition of Thackeray's works tells of the novelist's second tour in America, his brief political career, and his work in the production of "The Virginians." Mrs. Ritchie's notes and reminiscences, her carefully-chosen extracts from her father's correspondence, form a most attractive prelude to the rereading of Thackeray's much discussed essay into late eighteenth century life and manners. Mrs. Ritchie lets us note for ourselves the gradual development of the book. It appears that "The Virginians" grew naturally out of Thackeray's second visit to America, that visit itself being to some extent dependent on the "Four Georges" lectures. The idea of this series had been in the author's mind since the summer of 1852. Mrs. Ritchie quotes the following characteristic paragraph from one of Thackeray's letters on the subject:—

I had a notion of lectures on the Four Georges and going to Hanover to look at the place whence that race came; but if I hope for preferment hereafter, I mean Police-magistrate-ship or what not, I had best keep a civil tongue in my head; and I should be sure to say something impudent if I got upon the subject; and as I have no particular Heaven-sent mission to do this job, why, perhaps, I had best look for another. And the malheur is, that, because it is a needless job, and because I might just as well leave it alone, it is most likely I shall be at it.

Later, in 1855, we see the further evolution when he says:—

I am going to try in the next six weeks to write four lectures for the great North American Republic and deliver them after they are tired of the stale old humourists.

The second American tour was, as is well known, a great success, and the many letters which Mrs. Ritchie gives us show that the lecturer was happy, found many a kind welcome, and was ever keenly alive to the humours of his tour. His pictures of the American life of the period are already of historic interest. In one letter home he says:—

A man came up to me in the street and asked me if I could sign him any one who wanted to buy a field hand. It was because I looked like a Kentucky farmer, my friends tell me, that this obliging offer was made to me.

There are many such touches of manners and of a world which has passed away as completely as those depicted in "The Virginians" itself. The episode of the Oxford election, occurring soon after the American tour, is sketched in Mrs. Ritchie's always charming manner, with here and there those intimate sidelights on her father's nature which mark all her introductory articles. At first, Thackeray thought he might win the seat from Lord Monck and he was in high spirits:—

My sister and I [writes Mrs. Ritchie] received the following letter relating to this eventful time:—

Oxford, July 11, 1857.

My dearest little women, as far as I can see, The independent Voters is all along with me, But nevertheless I own it, with not a little funk, The more respectable classes they do go with Wiscount Monck; But a fight without a tussle it is not worth a pin, And so St. George for England, and may the best man win.

"May the best man win" was a sort of catchword of the period. Mrs. Ritchie tells a pleasant story on the subject:—

My father, meeting Lord Monck in the street, shook hands with him, had a little talk over the situation, and took leave of him with the doggerel "May the best man win." "I hope not," said Lord Monck, very cordially, with a kind little bow.

Mr. Cardwell took Lord Monck's place, and Thackeray lost the seat as everybody knows. In a diary of the period his daughter wrote "Papa himself is a Cardwellite, he says, only he can't proclaim it," and so one sees he was not very sorry to lose the election and get back, as he said, to his desk with pen and ink. The Oxford business over, the first number of "The Virginians" came out in November, 1857. It is often said that Thackeray's work reached its zenith with the publication of "Esmond," and fell to its nadir with the issue of "The Virginians." This is a convenient conversational formula, but for those who have really entered into Thackeray's point of view, the essence of his mind, the decline cannot be said to exist. There may be dull pages, but the tradition is carried on, and any student who has read Thackeray's works up to the publication of "The Virginians" will not find anything of the old charm passing away—nay, the literary cunning of the master is often more subtly employed than ever. Like most writers who possess a sense of humour, Thackeray was often his own severest critic. Mr. Motley has recorded that Thackeray told him he hated the "Book of Snobs" and could not read a word of it. And added that:—

"The Virginians" was devilish stupid, but at the same time most admirable; but that he intended to write a novel of the time of Henry V., which would be his capo d'opera, in which the ancestors of all his present characters—Warringtons, Pendennis's, and the rest—should be introduced. It would be a magnificent performance, and nobody would read it.

But, intermixed with this quaint humour and mocking laughter, there are many touches of melancholy too, for it was by such contrasts and rapid transitions that his wit shone. And there are little sermons, too, on his old text of Vanitas Vanitatum, particularly a letter to Dr. John Brown, which compresses the Thackerayan philosophy into a paragraph. The introduction contains many interesting sketches which show that Thackeray studied the costume of the period of which he wrote with care; there is also a reproduction of a well-known portrait of Thackeray himself.

A STRUGGLE WITH FATE.

George Harley, F.R.S. The Life of a London Physician. Edited by his daughter, Mrs. Alec Tweedie. 8 $\frac{3}{4}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ in., xii. + 360 pp. London, 1898. The Scientific Press. 16/-

It would be hard to deny that the subject of this memoir deserved a biography. The late Dr. George Harley was not only a physician of note and a scientific inquirer of no inconsiderable repute among his contemporaries, but he was also a man of singular courage and force of character whose life-long battle with disease and misfortune was worthy to be chronicled, if only as a stimulating lesson to the younger members of his calling. He had left behind him a large amount of autobiographical material, and, among his children, a daughter of considerable literary experience and repute. Such a concurrence of inducements to the composition of a biographical memoir as was here present is certainly rare; and it is the more remarkable perhaps that this "Life of a London Physician" should prove in some respects a rather unsatisfactory work. Mrs. Alec Tweedie appears from her introduction to have been unduly diffident as to her powers of doing justice to her subject. She required the encouragement of Mr. Samuel Smiles before she could brace her nerves to the undertaking. And this, perhaps, is the reason why in many parts of her memoir she effaces herself to the extent of neglecting the due selection and editorial sifting of her material; while elsewhere she falls into the opposite error of unduly elaborating the comparatively unimportant. The result is a book which, considered as a life-history of its subject, is wanting in compactness and perspective, while at the same time the presence of a continuous narrative is sufficiently felt to prevent the book from frankly presenting itself as a volume of reminiscences.

The life of Dr. Harley might have been legitimately treated in either of these ways, but hardly in both alternately. His personal record has, as we have said, all the interest of conflict. It was indeed a strange mixture of minor strokes of luck and calamities which would have crushed an ordinary man. Coming to London at the age of twenty-six from Germany, where he had acquired his medical education, he succeeded in obtaining a small paid appointment at a leading London medical school—

University College—within five days of his arrival. On the other hand, he was just making a way to the front as a physician when he was suddenly smitten with blindness, driven into confinement for many months together in a dark room, and compelled to abandon his practice altogether for two whole years. Many men would have despaired at the thought of the ground they lost in the race, but Harley valiantly set to work to get abreast of his competitors, and in an incredibly short space of time succeeded. Sir Thomas Watson, to whom he had communicated his dread that he stood on the brink of professional ruin, replied cheerfully:—"I do not believe it. Quite the contrary; before six months are over you will have all your practice back again." Kind and pleasant as were the words, they were too hopeful to be accepted as literally true by the hearer, who nevertheless found them literally verified by events. Fortune, however, was cruelly persevering in her attacks upon him; for, years afterwards, in 1876, he was again stricken down by a calamity which his daughter thus describes:—

Just about his return from Sweden and Norway my father received a summons to attend a patient in the country, was put into damp sheets, had another attack of rheumatic gout, and was compelled to give up work and leave London for two years. Rheumatic gout dogged him to his grave twenty-one years later, and during all that time he was always lame from its effects. Yet he never gave in. . . .

Many men, as Mrs. Tweedie admits, have fought such battles and won, but many men, as she truly adds, have laid down their arms and died broken-hearted.

Those two years in the Isle of Man, although happy enough outwardly—for he always seemed cheery and made friends wherever he went—were in reality a living hell. He had already made two starts in life and against many odds succeeded; but he was now an older man, and the battles, though won, had left their mark and enfeebled his constitution. Other men had taken up his line of medicine and specialities; "Harley on the Liver" was no longer the sole authority, and yet so determined was he to push himself to the fore again, if only his weakened frame could stand the strain, that he collected a number of his strange cases, and strung them together, determined that as soon as ever he went back to his work he would write a book on the liver, to be the book of his life. He did write the book; it appeared in 1883 and remains the standard book on the subject up to the present day.

Undoubtedly there was a Life to be written of the George Harley who fought this gallant fight with Fate, just as there was another Life to be written of the busy and popular London physician who knew more or less familiarly all the scientific, literary, and artistic notabilities of his time from Faraday and Brewster, and from Browning and Thackeray, down to such now-obscured luminaries as Samuel Lover and that once famous dramatist whom Mrs. Tweedie, mistaking him for his father, describes as "the lexicographer James Sheridan Knowles." From his recollections of this most varied assemblage of worthies a whole and, no doubt, a much larger volume of agreeable anecdote might have been compiled; but it is only fair to say that this "Life of a London Physician" is not wanting in interest and entertainment. The chapter on Squire Waterton, for instance, gives us a most fascinating glimpse at the home life of that great but eccentric naturalist. But the book seems somehow to waver in a disappointing and, now and then, a slightly irritating manner between the biography proper and the "collected reminiscences." Both genres are represented, but they refuse to amalgamate to the complete satisfaction of the reader.

SOUTH AFRICA.

Rhodesia and Its Government. By H. C. Thomson. 8 $\frac{3}{4}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ in., xi. + 362 pp. London, 1898. Smith, Elder. 10/6

This exceedingly interesting and judicial book, the result of its author's recent visit to Rhodesia, strikes us as the most valuable contribution which has been made to South African literature since Mr. Bryce published his "Impressions." Mr. Thomson made a careful investigation of Rhodesian affairs in the autumn of 1897, when the native troubles were just dying down, and he deserves much credit for the impartial way in which he has represented all shades of local opinion. His own very definite conclusions have all the more value because he shows us the grounds on which they were formed :—

During my first few months in South Africa [he says] I was tossed about in a kind of mental whirlpool. Every man seemed to me to be in the right until I came to listen to the next. But gradually certain principles and ideas began to crystallize into definite shape ; and these I have tried to make clear, not only from what I myself heard and saw, but from the declarations made from time to time by various South African politicians and writers.

Mr. Thomson is perfectly able to recognize the great qualities of Mr. Rhodes and the useful work done by the British South Africa Company, even whilst he unsparingly condemns the policy of the one and the administration of the other ; this pleases us. Of the Chartered Company he writes :—

It has caused terrible bloodshed ; it has brought unrest into the whole of South Africa (for the Bechuanaland rising seems to have derived its stimulus from the rising in Rhodesia) ; it has given cause for just suspicion to the Boers, to the Portuguese, and to the neighbouring native States ; and it has cruelly wronged and oppressed those natives who have been placed under its control.

It must in justice be added—as Mr. Thomson adds—

That the purely administrative, as distinguished from the political mistakes, which the Chartered Company has made, have been made before both by the Imperial and by the Colonial Governments on almost every occasion on which fresh territory has been annexed. There is no reason why they should continue to be made ; but the Chartered Company cannot in fairness be blamed for failing to attain, at a time of exceptional trial and stress, to a higher standard than that of which those Governments have hitherto shown themselves capable.

Similarly, Mr. Thomson fully recognizes Mr. Rhodes' personal disinterestedness, generosity, courage, and other fine qualities, whilst he is compelled to pass upon him the adverse judgment of having inflicted great and lasting injury upon England :—

He has widened her territories, but he has unmeasurably lessened the moral force which she has been wont to regard as her proudest attribute. The Raid is but a passing episode, and the effect produced by it will pass away, but when Mr. Rhodes' career comes under dispassionate review, this lowering of the moral temperature, not only of South Africa but of the whole Empire, will assuredly be deemed the gravest of his faults.

To inquire into the accuracy of this condemnation, or the wisdom of Mr. Thomson's conclusion that Rhodesia should be turned into a Crown colony and the charter revoked, would lead us too far outside the paths of literature. But this much may be said, that Mr. Thomson's criticisms are always fair, earnest, and informed with moral purpose, and that his book is welcome alike for its picturesque account of a new country and its serious and impartial tone.

RAIDERS AND REBELS IN SOUTH AFRICA, by Elsa Goodwin Green (Newnes, 5s.), is unpretentious but interesting. Mrs. Green acted as a nurse in the Krugersdorp Hospital at the time of the Jameson raid ; afterwards she went on to Charterland in the same capacity, and was in touch with the chief incidents of the Matabele rebellion. A plain but stirring story is the result ; while a number of wash drawings of real merit add to the value of the book.

A SOLEMN APHORIST.

Joubert: a Selection from his Thoughts. Translated by Katharine Lyttelton. With a Preface by Mrs. Humphry Ward. 8½ x 5½ in., xliii. + 223 pp. London, 1898.

Duckworth. 5s. n.

One can imagine that a keen sense of humour would be an impediment to the enthusiastic appreciation of Joubert—the philosopher who took himself so much more seriously than any philosopher need. The critical faculties of Mrs. Ward are not, however, limited by this particular restriction, and her biographical sketch of the latter-day Solomon of France is written gravely, as the life of a Solomon should be. Yet the figure which she has drawn for us inclines to the grotesque, and, however hard one tries to share her earnestness, it is difficult not to smile from time to time. There is the solemn picture, for example, of the philosopher “ protecting himself against emotions,” and spending whole days in bed, clad in a “ pink silk spencer,” in order to achieve this noble end. It will not be denied that this is a picture which invites the humour of the ribald. Then there is the account of the philosopher's marriage and amours. He married, it seems, in 1793, and in 1794 fell in love with Pauline de Beaumont, with whom he corresponded on the subject of Mme. Joubert's qualities and defects. As Mrs. Ward puts it, “ He quietly says of her :—‘ I knew that she had merit and some charms. The charms are gone ; the merit remains.’ ” Comparing this with Byron's famous declaration that Lady Byron would have made an excellent wrangler, we observe all the difference between the frank outburst of the natural man and the owl-like solemnity that flourishes, even at the present day, in French professorial circles. One feels a certain malicious joy in learning that the man who “ quietly says ” things of that sort about his wife to his mistress was afterwards jilted by his mistress in favour of the more engaging Chateaubriand ; and one is also a little surprised at Mrs. Ward, who gravely records the quiet saying as the final word on the subject of Madame Joubert's intelligence.

So much for the philosopher. What of the philosophy ? The French themselves, we believe, have never been swept off their feet by it ; and a careful student of the aphorisms will have difficulty in finding many that rise above the level of mediocrity. Now and again, no doubt, there is a luminous saying. A philosopher who spent whole days in bed, whether in a pink silk spencer or otherwise, for the purpose of fabricating aphorisms, could hardly fail to strike a happy thought from time to time. But most of what is valuable among Joubert's happy thoughts has already been introduced to the world in Matthew Arnold's essay. Of the rest of his aphorisms some are too obvious to deserve attention, while others melt away when they are thrown into the crucible of analysis. Take the first aphorism of all, for instance :—“ God is so great and so vast that to understand Him it is necessary to divide Him.” Apply the test of mathematics. If the infinite be divided by a finite divisor, infinity still remains. If it be divided by an infinite divisor, nothing whatever remains. On neither alternative is thought simplified by the arithmetical operation. The aphorism, in short, is based upon a confusion of ideas. Other aphorisms are not original. “ The good is worth more than the better,” for example, is hardly an improvement on our old friend πλέον ἤμῖς πάντος. “ Comedy should never present what is repulsive ” can be traced through Horace to Aristotle. Finally, there is a great group of aphorisms which are not only true, as aphorisms should be, but obvious—which is another matter altogether. “ There is in the mind a perpetual circulation of unconscious arguments.” “ Literary style consists in giving substance and form to the thought by means of the phrase.” “ The dregs even of Greek literature in its old age have a certain delicacy.” These are unexceptionable observations, every one of them. But, then, so was the observation that there were milestones on the Dover road.

On the whole, the main difference between Joubert's aphorisms and those of other people resides in the fact that they are always serious and always well-meant. He is never malin—never cynical. Yet some people prefer the cynical epigram which, reprehensible though it may be, stimulates thought after its fashion.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY STAGE.

Actors of the Century. By Frederic Whyte. 10½ x 7½ in., xii + 201 pp. London, 1898. George Bell. 21/- n.

The acceptability—at all events to the ordinary public—of a book like this large one of Mr. Frederic Whyte's depends, in a measure, upon the facilities for cheap popular illustration which are supplied by the modern processes of reproduction. Not a plate in the volume is a work of Art—not even as much a work of Art as are those things which are the result of a combination of photography with engraving on copper—but, in their own humble way, the plates, which are very numerous, bring more within our comprehension than would otherwise be possible, the personalities of whom Mr. Whyte, by the aid of numerous extracts from all sorts of criticisms, fluently and agreeably enough discourses.

Mr. Whyte, though he is not a celebrity in literature, is at least a much better writer than many of the very insignificant people who supply the text or letter-press of those volumes of to-day which are supposed to be “lavishly” illustrated—the “lavishness” consisting in the number of “blocks,” half-tint, and so on, that are given, rather than in the effort to obtain real quality in the illustration. But, in a volume such as this assemblage of brief records and impressions of theatrical notabilities, it is, no doubt, from many people’s point of view, more important to get variety and abundance of subject in the illustrations than artistic excellence. Here not only excellence, but even mediocrity is seldom attained. For the later celebrities photographs have been employed; for those of an earlier generation, it has had to be prints—the very things that are capable, if money is spent upon them, of being reproduced well.

The range of available prints is large; but we have some fault to find with the subjects chosen, or rather, with the subjects omitted, or represented but ill. Is it possible, for example, that there was no better portrait to reproduce of Miss O’Neil than that which is given—and which occupies but a quarter of a page? Anyhow, it conveys not even the faintest suggestion of what must, by all accounts, have been the beauty and the fascination of an actress who, during the four or five years of her prominence, touched all men’s hearts—an actress whom the aged connoisseurs of our own youth were wont to look back upon as the only possible Juliet; and an ideal Juliet Miss O’Neil must assuredly have been. Talking of inadequate representation, or, if we prefer it, of omission, it may just be noted that the only passionate and delightful Juliet of thirty years ago—Mademoiselle Stella Colas—finds no representation in this book. The virtue of this book may not lie quite in its adherence to system. If it did, the absence of Mlle. Stella Colas—the blonde cendrée who overcame us all at the Princess’s—might be excused on the ground that she was a foreigner. She did nothing else in England but play Juliet in broken English—which, for once, became fascinating.

But, on the whole—though there ought, for instance, to have been something more about the Vaudeville of twenty years ago or more, Mr. Montague, Mr. James, and especially Miss Amy Fawcett as Lady Teazle, and Miss Amy Roselle in Our Boys—on the whole the volume is very comprehensive; Mr. Whyte does not appear to cherish prejudices, or to be unable to appreciate various kinds of excellence. He remembers that Miss Ellen Terry and Lady Bancroft once appeared in burlesque. What will he say when he is told that Miss Kate Terry, Miss Ellen Terry, and Mrs. Kendal (the “Madge Robertson” of those days), all of them appeared together in a burlesque in Bristol or in Bath? Mr. Whyte himself is, possibly, but young. At all events he does not affect reminiscences. He has read much of theatrical history, and he records it. Something of it, too, and something of the very best of it—at all events some of the best that has appeared in critical journals—he has left unread. But of much theatrical narrative and criticism he has made himself a master; nor does he reproduce at all pointlessly the remarks he thinks fit to select for quotation; though it is a little disconcerting for the popular journalists of to-day—and not the most distinguished of them—to be quoted upon pages which have borne extracts from the writings of Hazlitt, which have echoed the quaint fancies of Charles Lamb (on his charming Elliston, for instance), and which have cited, albeit generally with too little of approval, the finished periods of Leigh Hunt. Mr. Whyte is connoisseur enough, however, to know, for the most part, when he has got a good thing, when the sources from which he draws are pure and excellent; yet he might have assigned even more importance than he has done to the theatrical records of Westland Marston, which were not criticisms uttered at the moment, but of the nature of memories subtle and of deep understanding. The original dramas of Westland Marston may scarcely—except by the excellence of their intention—belong to Literature; but his criticisms and analysis of the art he loved and fathomed will have, as time goes on, increasing rather than diminishing value. Mr. Whyte’s volume is the work of a real lover of the theatre and of theatrical lore; and though it may not be a permanent, it is yet an agreeable, contribution to the history of the English Stage during the century about to end.

RECENT VERSE.

Seasons pass, and literary fashions change, but the flowing tide of verse shows no abatement. It is a very little while since we examined a very large output of poetry; and in the interval some forty or fifty new volumes have taken their place upon the shelf. From these we have selected the more promising, and propose to pass them under review, necessarily with brevity, but at the same time with a brevity that in many cases implies no lack of respect or admiration. For there are several excellent volumes in the collection.

The best of them, perhaps, is Mr. F. B. Money-Coutts’ THE ALHAMBRA AND OTHER POEMS (Lane, 3s. 6d. n.). We have had occasion before to speak highly of Mr. Money-Coutts’ poetical qualities, and his new volume amply fulfils the high expectations which he had previously raised. The poems that compose it are various in subject, and possibly do not so clearly indicate his attitude and philosophy as did “The Revelation of St. Love the Divine,” but those who have read the earlier book will find many of the tendencies preserved. The verse is rich and melodious, the thoughts are dignified and harmonious, and a fine, animating love for humanity inspires, in one way or another, almost every poem in the book. The address “To William Watson at Windermere,” which was first printed in Literature, is full of a lofty sense of the duties and cares of the poetic calling, and “Any Father to Any Son” is a particularly poignant expression of natural emotion. Altogether, this is a book of uncommon beauty and of not a little strength.

Humanity, too, is the inspiring note of Miss Annie Matheson’s LOVE TRIUMPHANT (Innes, 5s. n.), though the methods of treatment differ considerably. Mr. Money-Coutts is confessedly opposed to dogma and formal creed; Miss Matheson is essentially a poet of the Christian belief, and in particular of the tenets of the Church of England. Her delicate, thoughtful work takes generally a religious tone, and, in the school of Adelaide Anne Procter, we have seldom met verse better sustained or more patently sincere. She is not above the stress of politics, and one of the best of her pieces is a full-orbed and impressive ode to the memory of Gladstone; while the problem of the Semitic oppression is the theme of more than one other. The dominant note of the work, however, is sympathy—a sympathy which includes everything that knows sorrow and every one that takes part in the honourable work of the world. And in the expression of these sentiments Miss Matheson has written several poems that will appeal to every lover of high thought and finished workmanship.

Miss Louise Imogen Guiney is an American of some reputation, who has more than the common share of her countrywomen’s appreciation of British influences. Her ENGLAND AND YESTERDAY (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.) contains a series of sonnets upon Oxford which would surely have pleased Matthew Arnold, and another set dealing with London sights, all of which have atmosphere and a happy sense of the coloured and vivifying word. There are also some experiments in Celtic balladry, which have charm and feeling, and a few personal poems which combine criticism with exposition in a thoughtful and felicitous fashion.

Her countrywoman, Miss Helen Hay, is also a welcome comer. It is true that her modest volume, SOME VERSES (Duckworth, 3s. 6d. n.), is marked rather by promise than achievement, but the promise is in the right direction. We have no great faith in the young writer who turns out poems technically faultless, but implicitly void of thought; and Miss Hay's verse, while the execution is very far from flawless, contains thought which, if often thin, is always intelligent and often original. With practice she will learn to use her melodies and turn her phrases more surely. Meanwhile she has the poetic attitude, and occasionally a flash of "inevitableness"—and these things are of more value than much prosody.

The music that is sometimes denied her is rarely lacking to the Rev. G. R. Woodward. His LEGENDS OF THE SAINTS (Kegan Paul, 3s. 6d. n.) is a really delightful volume. Employing, for the most part, the tetrameter measure, he has told over again with real charm and a dramatic grasp of narrative a series of the finest stories in the Hagiology. There is a virility, and clean, muscular Christianity about these poems which is very refreshing, and in his translations, chiefly from the German, he displays the scholar's aptitude for well-knit phrases and neatly-turned paraphrase. This little book should make its way among lovers of religious poetry.

From Oxford come two paper-covered booklets which contain a pleasing share of careful, academic verse. Mr. Gascoigne Mackie's CHARMIDES (Blackwell, 1s. 6d.) is a reminiscence of University life "twenty years after," couched in sonnet form. The sonnets have not the finish of Miss Guiney's, but they, too, are often apt in the portrayal of a familiar scene. "J. A.'s" COMING OF SPRING (Blackwell, 1s. n.) is full of dainty nature-poetry, not particularly striking either in idea or workmanship, but always sincere, graceful, and well versified.

From Oxford to Melbourne is a far cry, and the two Australian poets who have found their way into our budget could scarcely be more unlike to the mild singers of University life. Both LORAINÉ, by Mr. George Essex Evans (George Robertson), and SONGS FROM THE HILLS, by Miss Marion Millar (Melville, 3s. 6d.), are touched at times by the Adam Lindsay Gordon tradition, but they are assuredly none the worse for that. Australia seems prolific just now of straightforward, manly singers of action, breezy, open-air companions, with a tendency, perhaps, towards rhetoric, but with plenty of the singing quality. Both the poets under review are vigorous and effective. We should be none the worse for a few more versifiers of this order in England.

Poetry mainly religious in tone is supplied by the Rev. T. E. Bridgett and Father Barraud, S.J. The first-named has a volume of SONNETS AND EPIGRAMS ON SACRED SUBJECTS (Burns and Oates, 3s. 6d.), which contains some good sonneteering and several well-written hymns. Father Barraud's LAYS OF THE KNIGHTS (Longman, 4s.) is sometimes narrative, sometimes emotional, and always melodious. Many of the pieces would make, we should fancy, acceptable additions to Roman Catholic hymnology.

Of a higher calibre, however, is the unassuming collection of VERSES by Miss Maud Holland (Arnold, 3s. 6d.). Here we find unusual metrical skill, and a haunting note of melancholy, which gives a vague individuality to the work. The pieces are mostly neutral tinted, but they are characterized by true feeling and a delicate touch.

A pleasant individuality is also apparent in Mr. John A. Bridges' IN A VILLAGE (Elkin Mathews, 5s. n.). This is a collection of poems picturing various characters and aspects of village life, and containing several dramatic presentments of the kind sublimated in Tennyson's "Northern Farmer" and "Spinster's Sweet'arts." Mr. Bridges has evidently much observation and plenty of quiet humour. His genre sketches are bold, and in many instances striking in their fidelity, and the whole book has a homogeneity and completeness not common in random volumes of verse. It is one of those books that ought not to escape notice in the multitude.

There are some attractive ballads in Mr. Marshall Ilsley's BY THE WESTERN SEA (Elder and Shepard, San Francisco, $1.50), and at least one really fine poem, "The Masquerade." Mr. Ilsley's strength lies in descriptive verse, and some of his pictures of Western scenery are richly coloured. Mr. R. W. Seton Watson, in SCOTLAND FOR EVER! (David Douglas, 3s.) seeks to combine Aytoun with Tom Moore, singing themes such as are treated in "Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers" to the measures of "Irish Melodies." Several of the poems are effectively wrought, and should be locally popular. The VENTURES IN VERSE of Mr. James Williams (Methuen, 3s. 6d.) range over many fields—Scandinavian, Western, Oriental—and discover in their maker narrative skill, metrical ease, and occasionally the faculty for contriving an arresting phrase. There are some pretty songs in Mr. Reginald Span's POEMS OF TWO WORLDS (Digby Long, 3s. 6d.), and their author should find a ready market for his wares among musical composers, who are generally occupied in setting far less graceful verse than is contained in his slim volume. Finally, the shorter pieces in Miss Eva Gore-Booth's POEMS (Longmans, 5s.) are packed with feeling, and the writer possesses much skill in compressing a sentiment, nervous and irradiating, into the compass of a quatrain.

In making this brief survey, we have set aside regretfully a number of volumes, concerning which, since it was impossible to say anything kind, it seemed kindest to say nothing at all. The general average, however, is encouragingly high.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Mr. Heinemann publishes MARYSIENKA, by K. Waliszewski, translated from the French by Lady Mary Loyd (12s. n.). This account, lively and picturesque, and yet full of research, of the romantic life of the wife of John Sobieski was reviewed in our columns when it was first published in French by Plon last summer. The English translation is well done, and we are glad to note that an Index, the absence of which we regretted, is added to the English edition. We can thoroughly recommend this delightful volume to English readers.

THE LIFE OF ST. EDMUND OF ABINGDON, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, by Frances de Paravicini (Burns and Oates, 5s.), is rather a pious tribute to an honoured memory than a vivid contribution to biography. The information—such as it is—is indeed drawn from the fountain-head. The list of references consulted consists mainly of books of which only antiquarians have heard, and includes manuscripts preserved at the British Museum, and Balliol and Corpus Christi Colleges; while there is ample evidence that the author has consulted these authorities with due diligence. The facts recited do not give us a picture. Yet, while discussion whether it was in this place or the other that a particular holy vision was vouchsafed will hardly help to make the narrative more convincing to the majority of readers, labour expended in the exhaustive investigation of historical by-ways is never wholly wasted, and Mrs. de Paravicini deserves at any rate the meed due to scholarly industry.

In THE EDUCATIONAL SYSTEMS OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND (Clarendon Press, 7s. 6d.) Mr. Graham Balfour has compiled a useful account of educational work in the United Kingdom during the nineteenth century, under the heads of Elementary, Secondary, and Higher Education, which, so far as we have tested it, is very complete and accurate. It should be a useful book of reference for those interested in educational questions and methods, and will help English educationists to more knowledge than they often possess of the educational systems of Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. How many persons, for example, who talk or write glibly enough about elementary education, could explain the Irish system; or what proportion of Englishmen knows anything about the Welsh Intermediate Education Act? It will, perhaps, surprise some to find how far Home Rule in educational matters is already an accomplished fact.

For his little book on WESLEY AND WHITEFIELD IN SCOTLAND (Blackwood, 5s.) the Rev. D. Butler has not drawn upon any new sources of information. He is not only largely indebted to such previous labourers in the same corner of the biographical vineyard as Tyerman and Overton, but he fills a rather undue proportion of his pages with quotations from their works; while about a quarter of the volume is taken up with a reprint of extracts from John Wesley's journals. His task, however, though humble and unambitious, is performed with taste and care, and those who are curious about the influence of the Oxford Methodists on Scottish religion will find much to interest them. The tone of the book, though sufficiently devout, is by no means narrow or sectarian.

All who read THE WAY THE WORLD WENT THEN (Stanford, 4s.) will regret that the author, Miss Isabella Barclay, passed away before she was able to work out her scheme of producing a manual of ethnology to its completion. Omnia ex eunt in mysterium, said the schoolmen, speaking of all the sciences and all human knowledge, and there is no mystery greater or more fascinating than this question of how and where man first appeared on the earth, of what kind of creature he was when he first issued from the caves of the unknown. This is the chief matter of Miss Barclay's book, which we commend to all who agree with the famous maxim of Mr. Pope, as to the proper study of mankind interpreted by a higher light than was vouchsafed to that ingenious satirist. It is a wonderful example of the very rare art of writing for children without childishness; so well has the work been done that while any intelligent boy or girl of ten or eleven would read it as a delightful story, it would be difficult to indicate a clearer or better account of human origins for those of riper age who wish, not to be expert ethnologists, but to gather a general idea of human history before history proper began.

There is a story that a mayor of Liverpool—mayoral stories have been in vogue of late—being in the chair at a public banquet at which the Bishop of Chester was to respond for "literature," complimented Dr. Stubbs on having written of the history of his native land in "a light and entertaining manner." The style of the author of THE HISTORY OF MANKIND (Macmillan, 12s. n.), the third and final volume of which is now published, is neither less nor more light and entertaining than that of the great historian whom the mayor of Liverpool praised. Professor Ratzel's work is, in short, a valuable summary of ethnological information; but, though it is apparently intended for a popular rather than a scientific audience, it is so written that all but earnest students of the subject are likely, we fear, to content themselves with looking at the pictures. These are numerous and excellent, and there are also two interesting maps. One of these, designed to illustrate the distribution of races in Europe and Asia, has the word "Germans" printed across a portion of the British Isles. Even in England one occasionally hears the complaint that the British Isles are too largely inhabited by Germans; but those who make it presumably do not mean exactly what Professor Friedrich Ratzel means.

In A TREATISE ON DYNAMICS OF A PARTICLE (Cambridge University Press, 14s.) Dr. Routh, who has already given us volumes on the dynamics of a particle and on statics, now completes this particular side of mixed mathematics. Most people are, perhaps, content to know that the earth and other planets revolve round the sun, without realizing—as those who study Dr. Routh's book will realize—that the laws for their motion, at first tentatively laid down as the result of years of patient observation, have been fixed and justified by mathematical principles, that from these we are led to predict certain variations and apparent irregularities, and that these predictions observation has in turn verified. This reasoning, first applied to forces acting on one particle, is generalized and applied to two particles acting on one another, and then to a swarm of particles, mutually reactive; and from this we deduce laws of motion for the comets. The same combination of observation and mathematics applies to the question of a resisting medium throughout space, and its probable effect on the earth's orbit, and the process of reasoning in both cases is here explained. This is not the place to enter into the more technical side of Dr. Routh's reasoning, but to the mathematical student this book will be of the highest value.

Professor Herbert A. Giles' CATALOGUE OF THE WADE COLLECTION OF CHINESE AND MANCHU BOOKS IN THE LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE (Cambridge University Press, 12s. 6d.) is welcome both as a guide to the collection and because it shows for the first time the full extent of the debt which the University owes to Sir Thomas Francis Wade. The collection, which, as Professor Giles says, "was formed, during a residence of forty years in the East, by judicious selection of the best editions of the best works in the most important branches of Chinese Literature," will, as Sir Thomas himself admitted, "in certain departments require to be gradually subsidized. It contains very little, for instance, relating directly to Buddhism; much less to Taoism and Islamism." But as it stands it is a revelation even to those who will never get further than the catalogue. Here are novels of social life written hundreds of years before the birth of Mrs. Afra Behn; and here are Chinese poets who flourished centuries before Horace, side by side with those of nineteenth century authors of the same country. The numberless encyclopædias, commentaries, dynastic histories, and memorials to the throne bear fresh evidence alike to the industry of the Chinese and to their respect for authority; but in the light of recent events it is surprising to find in the catalogue the names of so many books devoted to the subject of defence. It is perhaps less startling to find "A Record of Blood, being notices of eminent statesmen and others who met violent deaths, with portraits illustrating each scene."

The Cardiff Free Library is well known to be one of the most energetic of these admirable public bodies. We have before us its CATALOGUE OF PRINTED LITERATURE IN THE WELSH DEPARTMENT (Cardiff, Free Libraries Committee, 12s. 6d. n.), which illustrates at once the patriotism of the dwellers in the Principality and the reasons why they feel proud when the word "literature" is spoken in their presence. For this list of books in Welsh or relating to Wales extends over no fewer than 541 pages of closely-printed matter. One gathers from it that the accomplished Sir Lewis Morris is not only the author of "The Epic of Hades," but also of an ode, printed at Bangor, and bearing the impressive and melodious title, "Llewelyn ap Gruffydd ein Llyw Olaf." In the matter of Bibles and hymn-books the Welsh section of the library is particularly strong. Bibles fill more than seven pages, the earliest edition being "imprinted at London by the Deputies of Christopher Barker, Printer to the Queenes most excellent Majestie" in 1588. Hymnody covers 6½ pages, but cannot be traced further back than 1738. The earliest poetry is "Flores Poetarum Britannicorum," by Dr. John Davies of Mullwyd, 1710. The catalogue is jointly edited by Mr. John Ballinger and Mr. James Ifano Jones.

The series of "Famous Scots" appears to be somewhat "tailing off." We think that it was a mistake to couple under such a title POLLOK AND AYTOUN (Edinburgh: Oliphant, 1s. 6d.). Pollok was a very small writer indeed, and to call him "famous" at this time of day requires a greater stretch of imagination than is to be found in his verse. It is true that Miss Rosaline Masson, the literary daughter of a more literary father, has managed to invest the story of Pollok, whose "Course of Time" is practically unknown to the present generation, with a good deal of interest, derived in great part from an account of his life at Glasgow University. But one cannot but wish that Miss Masson's talent had been devoted to a more promising subject. She is not so happy as could be desired in her account of Aytoun, which is chiefly redeemed from dullness by quotation in full of the admirable "Massacre of the Macpherson." Aytoun was in reality, as we know from Sir Theodore Martin's life of him, a more interesting person than Miss Masson's need for compression enables her to show. His "Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers" have run through more than thirty editions, with much more excuse for their continued vitality than the dreary "Course of Time." Miss Masson chooses "Edinburgh after Flodden" for quotation; we should have preferred the fine account of the captive Montrose's entry into Edinburgh, but that is a matter of taste. More about that clever burlesque, "Firmilian," and the literary war to which it led, would have been welcome. Miss Masson's book would probably have gained by the omission of Pollok and the more adequate treatment of Aytoun for which that would have left room.

The last two volumes of Dr. Murray's NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY carry us in Volume IV. from "Gaincote," an obsolete word meaning "to catch up with, intercept, or encounter another person by taking a short cut," to "Germanizing," and in Volume V. from "Heel" to "Hod." The Romanic element forms an especial feature of Volume IV., but the proportion of Greek and Latin words is not so large, nor is the native element so strong as in some of the preceding volumes. On the other hand, in Volume V. there is a vast family of words which owe their parentage to the pronoun He, a number of important old English verbs, such as help, hew, hie, hit, hield, hide, and of Greek derivatives in he and hi.

But a catalogue of the leading elements in these volumes cannot give the reader any idea of the fascinating study in the history of language which they provide. Some of the most interesting articles deal with words which had once a much wider meaning than they bear to-day; others show the power of analogy to divert a word from all connexion with the derivation. Take for instance the word garb, which was once used to denote "elegance," "demeanour," or "mode," and has now narrowed its meaning to only one of the causes of elegance—"dress." Mr. Murray's quotation from Fuller's Worthies:—"So graceful is their Garbe, that they make any kind of Cloathes become themselves," shows that as late as the seventeenth century the word "garbe" could be actually opposed to the word dress. Much space is devoted to another word which has not so many meanings as it had. The word "height" was once used to express high degree of any quality, as in Cokaine's Ovid (1662):—"I am become enamoured on her to that height, that I must marry her or I shall die." In several of the quotations it is also used to signify haughtiness or pride, as in Holland's Howlat (1450):—"For my hicht I am hurt, and harmit in haist," or in Cromwell's Letters two centuries later:—"A very resolute answer and full of height." Sometimes it meant the top or summit, as in Surtees' Miscellanies (1486):—"On the height of Ouse brigge." But, perhaps, its most interesting use was as the verb "to height," which survived several centuries side by side with the verb "to heighten." To take one more instance of a word which has lost some of its meanings, Mr. Murray's quotations show that the word "hell" was originally used, like the Hebrew "sheol," to denote either Hades, the grave, or the infernal regions. Thus in Hampole's Psalter we find "thou salt noight leve my saule in hell" (now in our revised version of the Bible "Hades"); in Wyclif's Bible (1382) we have the expression "lede down myn hoore heeris with sorwe to hell" (in the authorized and revised versions "the grave"); and in Gloucester (1297), "leste the develen of helle al quic to helle him drowe"—clearly to the infernal regions. But in the Bible of 1611 we note the tendency to reserve the word "hell" for the special meaning which it bears to-day. For while the Hebrew sheol is frequently translated "hell," it is also rendered "the grave" thirty-one times, "Hades" thirty-one times, and three times "the pit." Some of the analogous applications of the term "hell," for example, to a part of the old law courts at Westminster, to a place under a tailor's shop-board, in which shreds or pieces of cloth are thrown, and to the den in which captives are carried in the games of Barley-break and Prisoner's Base, witness to the fascination which the word has always exercised and its much more extended use in former days.

Of the power of analogy to divert the meaning of a word from all connexion with its original derivation we have a good instance in "galaxy," one of the few words in Volume IV., which have a Greek derivation. The word as we use it in the phrase a "galaxy of beauty," or as Goldsmith used it when he spoke of a "genius lost in a galaxy of continuous glory," has, of course, no connexion with γάλα, milk. But when the term had been applied to the Milky Way, it is easy to trace the process of transference by some imaginative writer such as Steele, who, in speaking of fair women as "galaxies of beauty," is clearly thinking only of their starry brightness. The derivation of the word is much more directly conveyed in the American term "brandy-galaxy," brandy and milk.

Mr. Murray is as judicious as ever in withholding his sanction from derivations, however attractive or ingenious, which are not supported by evidence, such as Tillotson's proposed origin of "hocus pocus" in the words "hoc est corpus meum." He has for the first time unearthed the true derivation of "gas," which Van Helmont, the Dutch chemist, avowedly took from the Greek χᾶος.

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE.

The history of BRASENOSE COLLEGE, OXFORD, in the series of College Histories published by F. E. Robinson (5s.), has been entrusted to Mr. John Buchan, who gained the Newdigate Prize last year and the Stanhope in 1897. From the prospectus this appears to be the only volume in the series which has been assigned to an undergraduate; and, though Mr. Buchan has discharged the task efficiently and with credit to himself, other members of the College may perhaps regret that their historian should be imperfectly acquainted, as is only natural in the circumstances, with old customs and traditions that have but recently disappeared. He relates the establishment in 1701 of the Latin oration in honour of James II. (which, perhaps, produced a counterblast in the Essay on William III. at Trinity College, Cambridge); but he does not tell us that, when the range of subject was enlarged, it was still delivered in the College chapel, and such latitude was allowed that one sporting Fellow is traditionally reported to have harangued "De Cuniculis Bombardizandis!" We might have hoped, too, as the aged butler is still at his post, to have been favoured with a recipe of the famous Ale, which, alas, is now no longer brewed; but perhaps the secret is, on moral grounds, to be jealously withheld from a self-indulgent public.

There are many interesting pages on the social life of former days; but the best part of the work is the account of the buildings, of which there are excellent photographs and sketches; yet even here it is plain that the author has little idea of the immense improvement effected by the creation of the New Quadrangle in 1887, before which time there was no entrance from High-street. Much space has been allotted, as is fitting, to the glorious annals of the College, on the river, and in the cricket-field; the popular notion of it, however, as exclusively athletic has always been unjust. The most disappointing chapter is that on the famous men of the College; for, although it contains a just and sympathetic notice of Mr. Pater, names that are really important have been omitted; while a confusion is twice made between John Scotus Erigena, who was fabled to have lectured in the old Brasenose-hall, and the famous Duns Scotus of four centuries later, who is less doubtfully claimed by Merton. If, as Mr. Buchan writes, "a catalogue of distinguished living alumni would be out of place" in his book, it is a pity that he should, after all, give a list which is quite incomplete. To take only one profession, he omits the graceful poet and accomplished preacher now Primate of Ireland, the Bishop of Truro, Dr. Wace, and, last but not least, the Bishop of Salisbury, whose high influence in the College for twenty years can hardly be overestimated.

TRINITY COLLEGE, OXFORD (F. E. Robinson, 5s.).—It would not be easy to make college histories dull. They have serious matter for the student and amusing pictures of manners for the general reader; and when the historian's task falls, as it does in the present case of Trinity, to a writer possessing the requisite knowledge, industry, and power of selection, the result is sure to be good. Mr. Blakiston's book in the same series as "Brasenose College" is not quite so lively as the lighter parts of Dr. Fowler's History of Corpus Christi, published by the Oxford Historical Society. In the present series, erudition has to be compressed and gossip abridged; Mr. Blakiston shows a good deal of skill in choosing from his miscellaneous authorities (ranging from that mysterious register "Computus" to an undergraduate's letter asking for a new "Hatt"), and the result of his compilation is very readable.

Indeed, this necessity of compression must sometimes bear hardly on historians of colleges. They have so much to distract them. They are tempted to be garrulous on the contemporary events of the outside world, and on manners and customs—on most of which they must nevertheless practise a severe reticence, unless they would disregard time and space. Yet perhaps the chronicler of Trinity College has less temptation than some others to stray into the paths of contemporary history. That learned body does not appear to have played a prominent part at any time in the events of the last 350 years. There has never been anything unique about it: it began in much the same way, and passed through much the same vicissitudes as most other academic foundations. Occupying the site of, and perhaps inheriting some traditions from, the monastic institution of Durham College, it was of course affected in the usual degree by the successive influences of the ages. A period of expansion under President Kettell (whose name still survives in "Kettle Hall") was followed by the lean years of the Civil War, and the general academic revival of the late seventeenth century by the equally general stagnation of the eighteenth. But the history of Trinity was not closely associated with wars and national changes. Royalty did not lodge within its precincts; although the Court ladies scandalized President Kettell by coming to the chapel "mornings, halfe-dressed, like angels." The hand of Round-head Commissioners was not specially heavy upon it. Of course, it is natural that the college archives should show an entry of money disbursed "ad ignes accendendos" at the Restoration; but its Presidents were neither forcibly extruded by Parliaments nor violently intruded by Kings. Indeed, it is seldom that the life of an institution has been so little chequered by incident and so little before the public eye. Trinity has expelled no poets (except John Glanvill) and been libelled by no historians. Its name is associated with no movements, political, social, or ecclesiastical. It has not posed as the regenerator of society by plain living and high thinking or otherwise. It has been neither the cradle of a new religion nor the nursery of a new sacerdotalism. Other houses may at various times have been known as the home of deserving poverty or the exclusive resort of fashion; Trinity does not appear to have been marked by any especial stamp, except the stamp of a place of sound learning and education. Its annals are those of a quiet, but not a torpid life.

The story of each period is supplemented by a list of the most notable amongst contemporary Trinitarians. Undoubtedly the most honoured name of all is that of the elder Pitt; but nothing seems to be known of his academic career—at least, nothing remarkable. Another famous Trinity man was Walter Savage Landor, who appears to have been rusticated for firing a gun—not with homicidal intent—into a fellow-student's window. Newman's connexion with the college was happier; he stood rather apart from its social life, but always "retained, like many other scholars since, the warmest feelings towards the foundation of Trinity." For eighty years or so from the outbreak of the Civil War—that is, for the period of Wood, Aubrey, and Hearne—there are ample materials at the disposal of all chroniclers of things academic. Mr. Blakiston is fullest when dealing with the events of this time; and he is enabled to use a most valuable document in the shape of a metrical "Day of my Life," written by a Trinity undergraduate towards the close of the last century. But he wisely considers that a detailed treatment of the last fifty years is for the present outside the historian's province.

THE BOOK OF THE CAMBRIDGE REVIEW, 1879-1897 (Macmillan and Bowes). The Cambridge Review, affectionately known to undergraduates as "the maiden aunt," has, by a London witling, been dubbed "parochial"; and undoubtedly the cult of self-centralization is even more rampant in Cambridge than in the sister University. The editors of this collection have been frankly Academic. A hundred pages are given up to papers on "Cambridge"; and of the so-called General Articles the majority are experiments in parody of the classics or of classical editors, including a clever "letter to Freshmen" by "Chesterfield," and Dr. Verrall's delightful application of his own professional manner to Jane Austen's "Mansfield Park." The same section contains, also, a somewhat sombre account of American Universities, and a brief exposure of the happily short-lived craze, imported from Oxford, of murdering the English language according to the "uzzer" dialect. Finally, among the verses are several in Latin.

We are inclined to think that this comparatively limited appeal has been inspired by wisdom, for in purely literary qualities the Cambridge Review does not shine beside the Oxford Magazine, and she has been shorn of her fairest laurels by the editor's resolution to exclude everything which has "found a permanent home elsewhere." A little of J. K. S., but not his best, is left us; and there are contributions by others whose names are already, or will probably soon become, familiar to the reading public. It is a great pity, by the way, that the editors have not obtained permission to publish the names of the authors, for we who can recognize them to-day are few, and to-morrow shall be no more. However, for all, and they are many, who care to be in touch with University life this little volume will be of unique and permanent value as an absolutely living and authoritative reflection of a vital and invigorating atmosphere. Readers will carry away a more lasting impression of the whole tone of the book than of any particular qualities in the different pieces.

Excellent humour is not predominant, and in striking contrast to young Oxford, the love-lyric is conspicuous by its absence. Even in the lighter vein, University subjects have evoked the happiest hits:—

To Incepting M.A.'s.

Let not thy Soul towards Syndicates be soaring,
A place on Boards is scarcely worth the winning,
For Boards of Studies are more bored than boring,
And Syndicates more sinned against than sinning.

Or again:—

On a "Bohn."

Euripides, when I behold
Your work with Buckley's mated,
I pity Enoch, who of old
Died not, but was translated.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

NEWMAN HALL: AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Cassell, 12s. 6d.), does not challenge comparison with any of the great autobiographies that belong to literature; but it will, nevertheless, excite a lively interest in the circles which hunger for personal information concerning this prominent Nonconformist minister. Mr. Newman Hall was born in the year 1816, and the occurrence is noted in his mother's diary with an enigmatical reference to the raising of an Ebenezer. He was converted in 1832, by the perusal of a letter in which his sister, aged fourteen, "wrote from school telling her mother that she had that day resolved to set out on pilgrimage to the Celestial City." From such beginnings one would have expected a narrowness of mind—probably of a Methodistical, but possibly of a Baptist, description—to result. But Mr. Newman Hall joined the Congregationalists, who are probably the most broad-minded of all the Nonconformists, and became—to parody the well-known phrase—a man of the world among Congregationalists, and a Congregationalist among men of the world. He even figured, indeed, as a Congregationalist among Alpine climbers; for he is probably the only minister of that persuasion who has made the ascent of the Diablerets. In the course of his long pastorate, Mr. Newman Hall was brought into contact with a goodly number of men; and it is his account of his relations with them that gives his reminiscences interest for a wider circle of readers. He has been present at a good many intellectual breakfast parties, and a whole chapter is consecrated to his intercourse with Mr. Gladstone, who seems to have written him a good many letters of no particular importance. In the light of subsequent events the following extract from the popular preacher's diary is of interest:—

July 6th, 1877.—Mr. Gladstone spent the evening at my house, Hampstead. About fifty gentlemen to meet him—till 11.30. General conversation on the Eastern question, and various opinions. We might be led by our Government to annex Egypt in some form. This might alienate France—might lead to war—our empire was already too large—large empires were in danger from lack of brain power to manage—as businesses might overgrow capacity—we should be responsible for no more than we can properly and consistently control. The opinion of the Continent was that we were drifting towards war. The last blow of Turkey had been delivered in Montenegro.

It is also placed on record that Mr. Gladstone wrote to Mr. Newman Hall to state that he had never believed him "capable of any act at variance with a Christian or a pastoral character." This, of course, is as satisfactory as it could be, though the autobiographer omits to inform us of the nature of the circumstances by which the emphatic disclaimer was called forth.

Under the title of CHRISTOPHER CRAYON'S RECOLLECTIONS (J. Clarke, 3s. 6d.) the late Mr. James Ewing Ritchie tells the story of his life and times. His picture of East Anglia in 1837 is of wide general interest and of some historical value, for, from his earliest days, Mr. Ritchie was a keen observer, with an eye for a humorous point. His picture of Lord Melbourne as the handsomest, the most cultivated, and the most courteous gentleman that ever figured in a Royal Court is not quite so vivid as that of another historian, who spoke of him as "unbuttoned, and a laugher," but Mr. Ritchie is sound, if not epigrammatic. His sketches of bygone village life, of the difficulties of a Dissenting Minister (his father seems to have been a fine example of one) fifty years ago, are full of facts and much original observation. Mr. Ritchie's own literary career, too, makes a highly interesting chapter in a very readable book.

SPORT.

MY HORSE, MY LOVE, by Sarah B. Linard (Unwin, 3s. 6d.), is chiefly made up of conversations with a certain Count, a Polish patriot, on the subject of the horse. The Count is supposed to know everything that is to be known in equine lore, and he gives his friend, the author, little lectures with plaster-of-Paris models of portions of the animal's anatomy to illustrate them. A good deal of space is devoted to eulogy of the Arab horse, and to details about him. Much that the Count says will be familiar to all who have a slight acquaintance with stable matters; many of his ideas are just, though to speak of the bearing rein as "holding the head as if in a vice" is exaggeration. As we too often see, the bearing rein is at times used in a cruel and senseless way, and not seldom on the horses of kindly but unobservant people who would be the first to condemn its abuse if they realized the fact that the animals which drew them were thus borne up; but there are occasions when bearing reins—properly applied—are of great service, and some horses cannot be driven without them. Possibly it may be necessary to warn grooms against putting an icy cold bit in a horse's mouth, though we fancy few grooms or coachmen would do so. One of the Count's theories seems to be new. The author asked him what the dry, grey warts on the inside of horses' forelegs "were intended for." The answer was quaint, not to say eccentric. The wart is Nature's "vinaigrette and restorative."

"When the weary, overtaxed animal, sweating at every pore, and covered with foam, can reach down and rub with his wet nose this always dry, hard substance, he is instantly refreshed with an odour like that of geranium. Tossing his head with delight, and sniffing perceptibly, he applies again and again his wet nose to this bountiful, secret, and cunningly-arranged restorative, and is thus fortified and strengthened sufficiently to resume his journey."

Mrs. Linard thought that this was a "wonderful theory" and it certainly is. The second part of the book is made up of commonplaces ancient and modern. The author informs her readers with regard to Persimmon that "it was the first time the Prince of Wales had ever placed a horse to race for him"—the Prince, of course, has run horses for many years—"and his astonishing success carried everything before it. . . . Persimmon was not permitted to race again, and was put at once to the stud, with a harem of fifty mares." Perhaps it is natural that the author should not know much about the breeding of race-horses, but then it was so easy not to write about it.

THE SPORTSMAN'S YEAR-BOOK (Lawrence and Bullen) is described by its editors, Messrs. C. S. Colman and A. H. Windsor, as "a sportsman's Whitaker." It surveys the events of the year in such different departments of athletic amusement as racing and rackets, boxing and tobogganing, golf and quoits, shooting and curling, baseball and bowls. It also contains a space for a diary, in which a sportsman may enter his scores at cricket, his breaks at billiards, the weight of the fish he has caught, or any other interesting biographical detail.

There are both humour and good sense to be found in the very outspoken pages of IRELAND FROM ONE OR TWO NEGLECTED POINTS OF VIEW ("Liberty Review" Publishing Company, 1s.), by H. S. Constable. Its aim is too essentially political for it to be reviewed at length in these pages, but one may recommend it to the notice of people who want to make telling speeches against Home Rule. A pleasing story may be quoted:—

An improving landlord, finding one day a pig in his tenant's cabin, built him a pigsty. Visiting him six months afterwards, he found the pig still in the cabin. Upon inquiry he discovered that, since his last visit, one of the sons had married, and his father had set him up with his newly-married wife in the new pigsty.

The moral of THE SECRET OF ACHIEVEMENT (Nelson, 3s. 6d.) is that "there is one thing better than making a living—making a life." The principle is approached from various points of view, and anecdotes are marshalled in support of it. We gather from internal evidence that the author, Mr. Orison Swett Marden, is a citizen of the United States; and the number of illustrative anecdotes about great men which he furnishes is on the same scale as the falls of Niagara, the Brooklyn Bridge, the Chicago Exposition, and other great American institutions. A boy should get good from the book, and should not be bored by it.

Miss Caroline Gearey has had many competitors—notably Thackeray—in the period she has chosen for her latest book, ROYAL FRIENDSHIPS (Digby Long, 6s.), in which she tells of the attachments of Anne for Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, and of Charlotte for Mrs. Delany. The history of the first two friends is the more interesting by reason of the outspoken manner of the Duchess, and the frequent extracts from her "Account of the Conduct," with its remarkable details of the union of "Morley and Freeman." Miss Gearey lays no claim to originality of research in either of these essays, but has ranged freely among the memoirs and biographies of the periods of which she writes, with the result that she is always well informed and often amusing.

PROPHETS OF THE CENTURY.—Mr. Arthur Rickett, the editor of these various papers by various authors on the "Prophets of the Century" (Ward Lock, 6s.), must, we presume, be held responsible for the plan of the book and for the point of view from which the contributors to the volume were asked to regard Wordsworth, Carlyle, Tennyson, Ibsen, and the rest. We suggest the point of responsibility, because it would be unfair to give praise or blame to the several contributors for a scheme and a mode of treatment which, as we conjecture, are to be attributed to the general editor. Thus, Mr. Tudor Pritchard, who lays stress on the moral message of Wordsworth, may, privately, hold the opinion that Wordsworth strayed from his real domain of poetry into the arid ground of ethics, and Mr. William Arthur, the commentator on Carlyle, may have a strong conviction to the effect that the seer of Chelsea was a very clever man of letters, who mistook the nature of his inspiration. This possibility allowed for, one need have no hesitation in regretting the point of view which has been taken. Prophecies fail, and fail in more than one sense of the word; that which lasts is the pure æsthetic enthusiasm, with its result in beautiful literary form. Thus, much of Carlyle's essay on Burns, alluded to by Mr. Arthur, has long been obsolete as criticism, though it will always remain a vivid and picturesque piece of literature; the prophecies of Browning (expounded in this volume by Dr. Blake Odgers) have ceased to edify or to terrify, but Browning's lyrics possess enduring life and charm. However, there are many persons who look for a "message" in everything which they read, and to this class we may commend "Prophets of the Century."

THE CRIMSON MOON.

Behind the Legions of the Sun, the Star Battalions of the night,
The reddening of the West I see, from morn till dusk, from dusk till light.

A day must surely come at last, and that day soon,
When the Hidden People shall march out beneath the Crimson
Moon.

Our palaces shall crumble then, our towers shall fall away,
And on the plains our burning towns shall flaunt a desolate day:
The cities of our pride shall wear tiaras of red flame,
And all our shimmering glory be an idle wind-blown name.

What shall our vaunt be on that day, or who thereon shall hear
The laughter of our laughing lips become the wail of fear?
Our vaunt shall be the windy dust in eddies far and wide,
The hearing, theirs who follow us with swift and dreadful stride.

A cry of lamentation, then, shall sweep from land to land:
A myriad wavering hands shall shake above a myriad strand:
And Day shall swoon before a Shade of vast ancestral Night,
Till a more dreadful Morn awake to flood and spume of light.

This is the prophecy of old, before the running tribes of Man
Spread Multitude athwart the heirdom of an earlier Clan—
Before the gods drank Silence, and hid their way with cloud,
And Man uprose and claimed the Earth and all the starry crowd.

So Man dreamed out his dream, till at the last he smiled to see
Its radiant skirts brush back the stars from Immortality;
He crowned himself with the Infinite, and gave his soul a Home:
And then the quiet gods awoke and blew his life to foam.

This is the Dream I see anew, when all the West is red with light,
Behind the Legions of the Sun, the Star Battalions of the night.
Verily the day may come at last, and that day soon,
When the Hidden People shall march out beneath the Crimson
Moon.

Among my Books.

AFTER READING THACKERAY.

Had the broadcast public of the fifties been less inattentive in the scrutiny of qualities it would have ascribed to Thackeray not cynicism but pessimism. "Cynicism" (apart from the honest transcript of fact) was the most unessential of his traits, almost describable as only Thackeray's fun, whereas the writer of "Vanity Fair," "Pendennis," and "The Newcomes" was the first pessimist, save Swift, in English prose fiction. For a clear perception, nowadays, of this we need strictly to take the historic view of Thackeray in order to detach the impression made by his works from the impact of post-"Vanity Fair" novels by other hands. So contagious and augmentative has the Thackerayan frame of mind proved that fiction stood, until recently, badly in need of a rest from pessimism. So unintermittent had the earthly failure of hero and heroine become, that readers lost sight of the element of chance which made the faithfulness and the irony of Thackeray's conclusions, and novels, far from meriting the ancient impeachment of idealizing life, ignored every ground for cheerfulness till the impasse was reached of Fact rosier than Fancy. It was an almost comic sign of the times' distortedness when about two years ago a living novelist set about disposing of Thackeray by describing him as "the very Saxon optimist in perfect maturity." Triple "brass"!

But if we can let the overrunning discouragement of Tess and Jude, and their like, slip from us we may believe that to a complacent generation even such reticent pessimism as Thackeray's must have been piquant to the point of scarification. The old lady who found Thackeray an uncomfortable writer, sufficiently revenged herself upon the too sensitive great-heart by dubbing him cynic, for, even when most a calumny, the dog's name sticks.

Not alone by the perverse, disappointing sides of his men and women, nor by the unsymmetricalness of their achievements, does Thackeray evince greyneess "abundant." It achromatizes his whole commentary, and just as characteristic as his disdain of the big drum in the manner of his writing was in its matter his refusal of rose-wreaths and joy-bells to the last appearances of his personae—even those he loved best. In the most acutely interesting of the novels, Colonel Dobbin weds Amelia after the long ordeal of his guardianship of her, but instead of Thackeray's final word being an assurance that they lived happily ever after, it tells of unrest and the torture of temperament. No writer who held the world a place of possible complete well-being would have written the closing sentences of "Vanity Fair." How does "Pendennis" terminate? With Thackeray's testimony that riches are not to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill, while he bids us submit ourselves to the certainty of "maimed happiness, frequent falling, bootless endeavour." In Beatrix, Thackeray drew one of the few superb full-lengths of woman that exist in the world's art, yet how does he handle his queen rose? He sullies her bright petals, and brings her down to dishevelment in the miry ways. With deeper melancholy, because with completer æsthetic disenchantment, he exhumes Beatrix in "The Virginians" to give her wind-sowing youth a trilogy-like sequel of retribution. What passage in what history is more piteous than "Baroness" Bernstein's death-scene, where the Kneller picture on the wall of Beatrix in her beauty gazes at the decrepit figure moaning on the bed, the wreck of that brilliant creature who once staked all for a crown and lost? The story of Thomas Newcome remains the most pessimistic of Thackeray's decipherments of life. Nothing can avail to soften the Immortals to this Quixote, not devotion, not selflessness, not the most exquisite purity of heart. Colonel Newcome is an optimist and an idealist. Like Shelley, he falls upon the thorns of life, every stage of his Via Crucis is marked with blood-drops, and only towards the end are granted "the dews oblivious." Since Cervantes the character is unparalleled, except perhaps in the brief sketch in "Charles Demailly" of the uncle at Cléry-sur-Meuse. But the de Goncourts' portrait is only one of the most memorable vignettes in fiction, while Thackeray's is a full-length. Among other things it is a contribution to the study of parenthood, that enigma to men of genius, and for those chapters "The Newcomes" goes on the shelf with "King Lear," "Le Père Goriot," "Fathers and Sons," "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel," and "Weir of Hermiston."

Never exultant, and no partisan, the great humanist addresses himself to Forty Year; and we may scarcely expect to be his lovers, pendant que jeunes nous sommes. While we are busy with hope and bustle, Hugo and Charles Kingsley are our fit and proper ministrants, for Thackeray offers florid enthusiasms scant nourishment, and before him the callow heroics of fools' paradises flee like ghosts from a disenchanter. Thackeray's personal tone and standpoint early became old.

Closely knit with the pessimist temper are Thackeray's plenary mindfulness of the reverse side to every situation and every quarrel, and his habit of self-inclusion in almost every arraignment. Mercifulness and humility obscured at times Thackeray's vision of life, blurring for him the distinction between venial and great transgressions; and here and there his summings-up, as in the case of Crawley v. Crawley and Steyne, are freakish and unintelligible. Carlyle decided that Thackeray was a fierce man. In truth he was scarcely fierce enough. What his development lacked was vehemence; his irony subjugated him.

Hence, however, it is that Thackeray's pessimism is never "grim," for it is unrelated to cynicism. In it not the dear beloved brother-mortals are indicted, but the order of the universe. Undesignedly so, for Thackeray was a child in the instinct he had of acquiescence. Feeling the riddle of earth more painfully than any other man of his time, he remained unimaginably orthodox. Perhaps the traditions of his race—"nineteen parsons among them"—perhaps some hesitant inertia of nature, perhaps the fastidiousness of disciplined manners prevented his elsewhere unflinching scepticism from taking the last and highest fence. As it was, Thackeray's devoutness, in rendering him not incredulous, made his sadness ineffable.

It may be a contravention of critical canons to allege a conviction that we find the real Thackeray sooner from his letters to Mrs. Brookfield, from "Roundabout Papers," and from "The Ballad of Bouillabaisse" than from all his novels put together. Seen through the medium of these more direct and consequently less ironical expressions, the tender and stinging humanity of the novels comes freshly upon us as one of the most appealing things in literature. It is the appeal of a pessimist, it is true; but at least it must be admitted that optimism has not yet been proved the more humane creed.

NAMES IN FICTION.

Many parents find it difficult to choose their children's names, but what is their task compared to that of the novelist? To find a Christian name once a year is nothing. To christen a whole set of characters at once—surnames as well as Christian—is a task that needs some setting about.

Once upon a time it was simplicity itself. Before fiction began to take itself seriously, you labelled your dramatis personæ as a chemist his drugs. A sharper was Captain Hawk; a simpleton, Mr. Pigeon; a sailor, Hatchway; a lawyer, Mr. Gammon; a peer, Lord Livewell; and a good man, Mr. Allworthy. So did Bunyan name his figures, taking a hint from the moralities and interludes which flourished in the earliest days of drama. How dear to us are Mr. Facing-both-Ways and the rest, entirely in harmony as they are with the simplicity of the Pilgrim's Progress. In modern stories a writer who should follow this mode would be thought to insult his reader's intelligence. Nowadays, we are realistic even in our characters' names.

Balzac may be said to have set a fashion in this respect. He took enormous pains to hit upon names exactly suited to his creations, and his tramp through Paris on the search that was rewarded by "Z. Marcas" over a shop-door is a stock literary anecdote. The figures that move through his wonderful Comédie Humaine do certainly seem very aptly called. "Le Père Goriot"—how it brings before us the unblest father living alone in that hateful pension. Pons and Schmucke, too, must surely convey some idea of their owner's personalities, even to persons who have never read "Le Cousin Pons." Dickens' names are marvellously apt, as we see from the passing into common phrase of so many of them. Not a few have become synonyms for the kind of character to which they were attached. Mrs Gamp, is an instance that will occur to every one, and there are plenty of others. Chadband, Pecksniff, Micawber, Bill Sikes, Jingle, Quilp—what skill it needs to suggest character with such directness! Mr. George Gissing in his book on Dickens speaks of the "exquisite rightness" of the names in nearly all the stories. Occasionally, in subordinate figures, Dickens descended to the easier and more obvious method—the Veneerings, for instance, are named pretty much on Bunyan's plan—but instances of this are scarce. In Thackeray they are more numerous—Mr. Honeyman, Tufthunt, Lord Wallsend, the Earl of Bareacres, Mr. Pestler, the apothecary, and so on—but again only among the minor personages. With his leading characters Thackeray never played in this way and, though their names are not remarkable, they do not outrage probability or suggest that the author had an unseasonable vein of humour that he could not keep in check. In reading many of Anthony Trollope's stories it is impossible to get rid of this feeling. His people—especially in the political novels—violate likelihood by the strangeness of their nomenclature; and, whenever the reader is getting really interested in their doings, their unreality is forced upon him by this ill-placed jocularly. Who can believe in characters with such names as the Duke of Omnium, Sir Damask Monogram (which is ill sounding as well as farcical), Sir Timothy Beeswax, Lord Earlybird, or Captain Gunner? But then Trollope was incorrigible as an artist, and never consented to take his tales seriously himself. Disraeli's political novels, too, sinned sometimes in this respect. Tadpole and Taper, for instance (who correspond to Trollope's Rattler and Roby and represent the determined place-men, the impatient tide-waiters, as familiar to us to-day as they were in 1830 or 1860), are not very likely appellations. Horace Buttonhole, again, proclaims his character too loudly, yet has not the classic stamp of Justice Greedy or Mrs. Malaprop; and Lord Fitzlooms for an ennobled cotton-spinner suggests poverty of imagination.

If a name is to hint at character it should do so in the subtlest manner possible—in a manner so subtle as to escape all but the quick-witted, who will forgive the inartistic method in their pride at being so clever as to detect the writer's intention. None of the masters of English fiction have stooped to so cheap a device, save now and then. Fielding set an example in this respect in the very earliest days of "natural" fiction. "Peregrine Pickle" and "Roderick Random" almost serve to measure the distance between Smollett's tales, full as they are of bustling incident and racy character, and those of Fielding, which had no need to rely even in a slight degree upon "catchy" titles.

Dramatists have always taken more licence than novelists in this matter of names. For one thing, it is important that a stage figure shall make his characteristics known to the audience at once without any time out of the three hours' traffic being wasted in elaborately explaining them. For another thing, the standard of art and craftsmanship in drama has never been so high as in novel-writing. In these days, when craftsmanship is cared for and looked for more than ever (though one would often gladly exchange correctness of manner for a trifle more substance and variety of matter), novelists must sacrifice nothing that will lend a trick of reality to their imaginings. If they take any pains to select names for their characters they should hit upon such as will be seen to suit them when their books have been read (like Sir Willoughby Patterne or Gabriel Oak); names that attempt with clumsy impertinence to give a clue to character at the outset are best left to the inept amateur of letters who has not wit enough to dispense with such an aid.

To be avoided, also, are out-of-the-way names that may have living owners in the real world. No John Smith or Tom Jones can complain if writers christen their characters after them; but if a man owns a peculiar name, he dislikes having it borrowed and attached to some figure in fiction whose proceedings very likely do it little credit. Mr. Pinero had more than one protest addressed to him concerning "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," and he was even more unlucky with "The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith," for a real Mrs. Ebbsmith committed suicide during the run of the play, and her act was attributed partly to the annoyance caused her by the title. M. Zola had some trouble over one of the characters in his "Paris." A certain André Sagnier, whose name he had unwittingly borrowed, went so far as to demand that all the numbers of the newspaper in which the story was appearing should be confiscated by the police. He was pacified by the omission of the "g." Nathaniel Hawthorne, again, severely wounded the feelings of a certain Mr. Pyncheon by choosing the name as that of the New England family to whom belonged the House of the Seven Gables. The grievance was aggravated by the fact that in the real family there had also been a Judge. Hawthorne made a handsome apology for "seeming to sully an honourable name by plastering upon it an imaginary villain," and declared that if the fact had been known to him he "would have considered it discourteous and unwarrantable to make free with the name. It never occurred to me, however, that the name was not as much the property of a romance writer as that of Smith, and a certain indescribable fitness to the tone of my work gave it a value which no other of the many surnames which suggested themselves to me seemed to possess." Every writer must know the satisfaction that comes when an "exquisitely right" name is hit upon. But it is just as well to take reasonable precautions to avoid indignant protests such as that which Hawthorne drew upon himself. The "certain indescribable fitness" appeals in vain to a man angered at what he is pretty sure to consider an intentional insult to his patronymic.

Notes.

In next week's Literature, "Among my Books" will be written by "C. E. Raimond" (Miss Elizabeth Robins).

The American Bookman gives the most popular novels of the autumn in the United States. They were "The Day's Work," "The Battle of the Strong," "Red Rock," by Mr. T. N. Page (of which Mr. Heinemann has just brought out an English edition), Dr. Weir Mitchell's "Adventures of François," "The Castle Inn," and "Roden's Corner."

The far-famed collection of Syriac MSS. in the British Museum has been steadily growing of late, and there are now nearly two hundred volumes over and above the thousand and more that are described in the late Prof. Wright's well-known catalogue. In order to acquaint the world of students with the contents of the new acquisitions, a Descriptive List, similar in scope with the Descriptive List of the Hebrew and Samaritan MSS., is now in active preparation, and will shortly be issued. The first volumes are especially rich in Nestorian writings. The collection also includes not a few works written for Syrian members of the Roman community, and we are in other respects brought face to face with the literary activity of the Syrian Christians in modern times.

To Maga,

[on completing its thousandth month.]

Crowned with a thousand months and yet so hale!

So filled with hope, so innocent of remorse!

The magnate still of literary force

Still do you gather up the century's tale.

Launched in the years when Europe felt the gale

That shook her thrones and kingdoms to their source,

Through storm and changing tide you hold your course,

Nor trim, as many do, the timorous sail.

Wellington read you, Canning knew your cheer,

O'Connell glanced across your teeming page,

Byron, Keats, Shelley, Tennyson felt your thrust;

You saw three Kings go down into their dust,

Glad at her birth, you praise the golden age

Of that good Queen whom all Earth's kings revere.

Bishop Godwin's "The Man in the Moone, or a Discourse of a Voyage Thither," which he wrote under the pseudonym of "Domingo Gonzaleo" and published at London in 1638, is not one of those books which might be expected to cumber the street stalls, and yet a good copy, with the plate of the flying machine, was bought the other day for a few pence in the neighbourhood of the Elephant and Castle. This is the work to which Swift is said to have been indebted for portions of his "Voyage to Laputa."

The possibility of journeying to the moon has been demonstrated, on paper, more than once, notably by Dr. Wilkins, Bishop of Chester in the reign of Charles II., who wrote a book called "The Discovery of a New World; or a Discourse tending to prove that 'tis probable there may be another habitable world in the Moon, with a discourse of the possibility of a passage thither." This work was put forward as a philosophical treatise, in which every conceivable difficulty as it arises is seriously combated and finally explained away to the satisfaction of the author. Another work of a similar kind was a book entitled "Great Astronomical Discoveries at the Cape of Good Hope," published anonymously in 1836. It describes how Sir John Herschel discovered men, animals, houses, and trees in the moon, but is in reality a hoax perpetrated by M. Nicollet, the French astronomer, to entrap his especial foe, M. Arago. Should the gigantic astronomical telescope now being manufactured for the Paris Exposition answer expectations, and so bring the moon within the distance of a few miles from our earth, these and other books that might be mentioned cannot fail to appeal to the many as they have hitherto interested the few.

Mr. John Russell Young, whose death was announced last week, was best known in England as one of the editors of the London edition of the New York Herald. He did not hold the position long, however, as Mr. James Gordon Bennett was just then changing his editors with all the rapidity of genius. Mr. Young began low down on the journalistic ladder, as a "copy-holder"—a position which, as a rule, leads to nothing more exalted than a printer's readership. He was tried, however, as a war correspondent, and succeeded, accompanying the Army of the Potomac from Bull Run till the end of the Chickahominy campaign. Two newspapers which he started—one in Philadelphia and the other in New York—were failures; but he was appointed European correspondent of the New York Herald in 1871, and in 1882 became United States Minister to China. He also wrote a book, "Around the World with General Grant," which was published at New York in 1879.

* * * *

From Paris the death is announced of M. Arthur Delavigne, the grandson of Casimir Delavigne, and the collaborator of Meilhac and Jacques Normand.

We have received from Mr. J. G. Cupples, of Massachusetts, the news of the death at Mosgiel in New Zealand of Anne Jane Dunn Douglas Cupples, known to her young readers as Mrs. George Cupples. Her sketches, entitled "Tappy's Chicks, or Links between Nature and Human," were written at the request of Mr. George Macdonald, in whose magazine, Good Words for the Young, the collection originally appeared, and attracted the attention of a well-known critic in America, the late E. P. Whipple, who caused their republication under the title of "Singular Creatures." A year or two later an edition was published in England.

The latest accession to the Silver Library (Longmans, 3s. 6d.) is Mr. Leslie Stephen's well-known book, "The Playground of Europe." Rereading the delightful chapters in which the author traces through old poetry and prose the slow and gradual growth of the modern sentiment about mountains, one is struck by the number of early climbers and early climbing books left unmentioned. Among the exponents of the early repugnance inspired by the "high places" of Europe, a corner should surely have been found for Master John de Bremble, monk of Canterbury, who, not long after the Norman Conquest, wrote of the Great St. Bernard as a "place of torment" against which it was his duty and privilege to warn "the brethren."

* * * *

Nor is it quite just to write as though Scheuchzer, Haller, and Rousseau were the first of those who, in some measure, anticipated the modern point of view. Petrarch deliberately climbed a mountain (Mont Ventoux) in the fourteenth century, and described his experiences in a glowing letter, of which an excellent translation was made by the late Mr. Henry Reeve. In the sixteenth century Conrad Gesner climbed many mountains. His "Descriptio Montis Fracti juxta Lucernam" contains a long and eloquent eulogy of the pastime; and the dedicatory preface of his "Treatise Concerning Milk" is practically a call to the unconverted to devote their summer vacations to mountaineering. Finally, there is Bourrit, whom Mr. Stephen also neglects. He was the first of those who, without any ulterior scientific motive, devoted every summer to mountain expeditions as regularly as the year came round. He wrote quite a library of climbing literature—some of which was even translated into English, though all of it has long since been out of print.

* * * *

The moral of this is, perhaps, that a complete bibliography of climbing literature would be a very useful thing. Those compiled by Mr. Coolidge do not profess to be complete; the best of them omit a good many books mentioned in the "Bibliothèque Universelle" of Boucher de la Richarderie (1808). To a certain extent, no doubt, the want will be supplied in the Bibliography of Works on Swiss Travel which the Swiss Government is going to issue as a part of the "Bibliographie der Schweizerischen Landes Kunde"; but the obligation of many readers to the Swiss Government would be the greater if the list of travel books which are also climbing books could be issued separately, and a list of the climbing books relating to the Tyrol, Dauphiné, and the Italian Alps incorporated with it.

We learn that the Canadian Government has come to the conclusion that it is too busy to legislate on copyright at the present moment and that the treaty with the United States must first be got out of the way. It has been suggested in some quarters that if copyright were included among the subjects dealt with in that treaty the need of making a law to the detriment of British authors might be obviated; but it would be over sanguine to hope that anything will come of that suggestion.

A copy of Walter Savage Landor's "Simonidea," generally regarded as the rarest of all his published writings, was sold at auction by Messrs. Sotheby the other day for £9. When Mr. Sidney Colvin wrote his life of Landor in 1884 he had reason to believe that this little volume had faded out of existence; but since then five or six copies have turned up. It was published in 1806, and contains five-and-twenty English and five Latin poems, as well as a preface dated Bath, Feb. 14, 1806. All but two and a portion of another of the English poems have been republished. The following are among the lines which cannot be found elsewhere:—

Sweet was the maid who hail'd my earliest lay
And waited to receive my vow.
But Love, blind love—all hurry, for 'twas May,
Slipt it—my stars! I know not how.

Am I inconstant? Would I then betray?
To your own law, dear girls, I bow—
Sweet are the violets of yesterday,
And yet, whose bosom wears them now?

A copy of the first edition of "Gebir" (1798) was also sold for £10.

When the Lyceum Theatre reopens about the middle of February, in the season which will precede Sir Henry Irving's appearance in Sardou's Robespierre, the first production of Mr. Martin Harvey, the young actor who has taken a lease of the house, will be a new adaptation of the "Tale of Two Cities." This has been prepared by the Rev. Freeman Wills, who has written plays before and who brought out, not long ago, a life of his brother, the painter-playwright, W. G. Wills. The leading incidents of Dickens' masterpiece will be presented in a prologue and four acts. The third act will show us that Assize of Blood—the Tribunal of the Terror—while the piece will naturally end with the scene on the scaffold.

* * * *

At last, Mme. Sarah Bernhardt has made up her mind to appear in the French version of Hamlet which has been made for her by M. Marcel Schwob and M. Morand. It is even probable that her first appearance as the princely Dane may be made in London. M. Mounet-Sully will have to look to his laurels. A good many actresses have played Hamlet. Even in these days there is Mrs. Bandmann-Palmer, who had a short season last year at a minor London theatre, and whose performance in the part is very popular with provincial audiences.

* * * *

Dom Hildebrand de Hempdune, primate of Ligugé, has obtained the Papal consent to the establishment, under the shadow of his Benedictine abbey, of the religious house, the literary refuge, which, as we mentioned on December 3, M. Huysmans coveted with all the passion of an incorrigible fonctionnaire who cannot work out of harness. Thus once more is illustrated the plasticity of Romanism. But M. Huysmans' artistic curiosity is far removed from the humble docility of piety. There is about him nothing of the dérot, and this fresh stage in his progress among the ruins and monuments of the old faiths must be taken simply as a repose by the wayside of a traveller whose life is made up of the search for sensations.

There are certain analogies between the new familia sacra of Ligugé and an organization already in existence in connexion with a Benedictine monastery at Dresden. There the monks receive in their midst a certain number of artists, who, while preserving their entire liberty, and being exempted from certain religious duties, indulge in their favourite pursuits. There are painters and sculptors and poets, and the monks have already formed a little museum of the gifts offered them by the artists upon whom they have bestowed their hospitality. But at Ligugé the monks are not to invite artists to visit them. It is the writers and painters who ask to settle down under the wing of the monastery. M. Boucher, a friend of M. Huysmans, and one of the directors of the little review Pays Poitevin, describes the nature of the new compact as follows:—

Those who, having fully renounced Parisian civilization, would like to devote their life to the glorification of the Church and the renaissance of religious art will settle down definitely, and with their own resources, under the mantle of Saint Martin. They will be attached to the abbey, only according to their own good pleasure . . . the bond consisting simply in affiliation to the Third Order of Saint Benoit, otherwise known as oblature. This Third Order exacts no vows nor any special religious observances. . . . Nor does it involve a costume, although the candidate dons the Benedictine dress the day when he is admitted to oblation. . . . These new Benedictine members of the Third Order will have as their mission the reform of religious art, just as the black monks have undertaken the reform of the liturgy.

M. Huysmans, then, has found a solution for the problems which, as La Cathédrale betrayed, have been worrying him for the past two or three years. In 1900 we may expect from him a fresh report of his progress in the form of a novel entitled "L'Oblat." One matter still remains to be settled—namely, whether the novelist is to be allowed to take with him to Ligugé the middle-aged servant who has played a rôle in his life not generally known. Not only does M. Huysmans, according to the writer of a curious article in the Figaro, owe to this servant, Anne Thibaut, much of his inspiration; he owes his conversion to her as well. Readers of La Cathédrale will recall the picturesque figure of Mme. Céleste Bavoil, the bonne of Abbé Gevresin. The sketch is drawn from life. It is Anne Thibaut herself, a mystic who hears "voices" like Jeanne d'Arc and has attained a strange ascendancy over the brain of Huysmans, which he is inclined to think now to be her providential mission.

In the reading-room of the Bibliothèque Nationale, as in that of the British Museum, the behaviour of readers is the subject of censure from time to time. Their selfishness is indicted by a correspondent of the Echo de Paris. One grievance is that they keep their seats with their hats, and wander away to amuse themselves elsewhere, with a sans-gêne like that of members of the British House of Commons; another is that readers whose desks are uncomfortably crowded with their books use their neighbours' desks as hat-stands without asking leave. Such a practice is obviously unworthy of philosophers, and inconsistent with the traditions of the politest people in the world: and one can only wonder that, if persisted in in the face of protest, it does not sometimes result in damage to the hat. Among brutal Anglo-Saxons it would be liable to do so. On the other hand, the absence of any complaint of readers who surreptitiously munch sandwiches over large paper editions, or who fall asleep and are caught snoring over their labours, may indicate that, in certain of the "minor morals," the advantage is with our neighbours.

"Smelfungus, Minor," writing from the Savile Club, sends us an amusing satire on the ingenious gentlemen who are never able to see that two poets may use the same word in the same connexion without the one having borrowed it from the other—and such critics are not always dismayed even by the fact that the poets did not write in the same language. Under the heading "Audacious Plagiarism" he writes:—

In your issue of the 14th inst. you give, on p. 37, a brief notice of Mr. Poste's prose translation of Bacchylides, and you quote, as a fair specimen, the following passage from Ode I. :—

"High aloft, cleaving the depths of ether with fleet tawny wings, the eagle, messenger of Zeus, wide-ruling thunderer, boldly travels, confident in matchless might, where lesser warblers fear to venture. Neither peaks of the vasty earth nor dangerous billows of the ever-restless main stay him, but onward through the abyss of heaven with fine-spun plumage he sweeps, his sole companion Zephyr, conspicuous to mortal gaze."

On reading this passage my memory was aroused, and my critical acumen was excited. "Where have I read some verses singularly resembling this?" I asked myself. Turning to my bookshelves, I got down Moore's Poetical Works (Longmans' edition, 1850), and soon found, at p. 242, this once well-known and still-remembered hymn:—

The bird, let loose in eastern skies,
When hastening fondly home,
Ne'er stoops to earth her wing, nor flies
Where idle warblers roam.
But high she shoots through air and light,
Above all low delay,
Where nothing earthly bounds her flight,
Nor shadow dims her way.

Sir, is not the parallelism startling? Observe the "wing" in the Irishman's poem and the "wings" in the Greek! But even more startling is the phrase.

"where lesser warblers fear to venture," which in Moore's hymn becomes

"Where idle warblers roam"!

Note the use of the word "warblers" by both poets! And, again, the line in Bacchylides,

"onward through the abyss of heaven . . . he sweeps," becomes

"high she shoots through air and light"

in Moore! Not only the same idea, but, in one case at least, the identical words! Sir, I submit that a grosser instance of downright plagiarism has seldom been detected and exposed. The question now to be determined is—Did Moore steal from Bacchylides, or did Bacchylides steal from Moore?

As the poems of Bacchylides are said to have been only recently discovered, a hasty critic might come to the conclusion that the Irish poet did not steal from the Greek poet, because, for larcenous purposes, the works of the latter were not accessible to the former. Against this judgment, however, we may advance the surmise that Moore, who made such notorious use of another Greek poet's verses, may have had an early copy of the poems of Bacchylides.

As the matter is of the greatest interest to the critics of to-day and to our modern poets as well, I hope, Sir, you will permit a short discussion of this matter to find publicity in your columns.

THE FRANCISCAN LEGEND.—A DISCOVERY.

[BY CANON RAWNSLEY.]

It is not often in the realm of literature that a prophet so surely obtains his crowning reward, as has just been the case with the Cevennese chronicler of the Life of St. Francis.

Paul Sabatier had, as he tells us in his preface to the "Speculum Perfectionis," caused the friends of Franciscan lore to cry out in their sadness, when he assured them that, in his opinion, the greater part of the "Legend of the Three Companions" was missing. They did not, he tells us, understand that the first step in finding a thing was to realize that it was missing and needed to be found. But so assured was he that the last two chapters, xvii. and xviii., of the Three Companions were just a résumé of Thomas de Celano's "Life of St. Francis," placed there to hide the fact that the greater part of the original Legend of the Three Companions was lost or purposely suppressed, that he ventured to give in a note to his preface to the Speculum, p. xx., his reason for the faith that was in him.

He showed that when the Bollandists first printed the Legend of the Three Friends in 1768, the fact of the loss of the greater part of the Legend had been so long forgotten that it was not known to be defective, and that M. Le Monnier had pointed out the uselessness of the Legend and the carelessness of biographers who had not perceived this.

Sabatier next asked those who disagreed with him as to the loss of the part of the Legend to consider the following points.

First. One would have expected that a life written by the Three Friends, Leo, Angelo, and Rufinus, would be full of detail of the time when they were most intimately connected with St. Francis, but suddenly, at this point, the biography stops abruptly.

Secondly. Since Thomas de Celano passes very briefly over the last years of the Saint's life it would have been naturally expected that the Three Friends would have been particularly careful to expand the life at this point.

Thirdly. The preface to the Legend of the Three Friends, which was written after and not before the composing of the work, and tells us what they have done and not what they intend to do, contains a summary of contents which does not correspond with the Legend as it exists to-day, and further speaks of narrating not only the miracles of St. Francis but also remarkable examples of his conversation and piety, none of which latter are recorded.

Fourthly. The Three Friends assert that they have not followed the historical order of events in compiling their biography, but directly one refers to the Legend itself one finds it all in strict historical sequence, and this is doubtless the later fashion of biographers.

Fifthly. The last two chapters of the Legend are evidently not in the style of the rest, and clearly they are, as stated above, a résumé of the Life by Thomas de Celano.

Sabatier argues that, from what exists, one can guess at the missing parts as an architect can restore a building from the remains that he finds, and he urges that diligent search for the missing material should be made in Italy, in Belgium, and the Netherlands—in the last for special reasons. He has, however, no ray of light as to its probable whereabouts. He does not expect many new facts to be found, but a single new fact may add to the knowledge of the Saint and his times and to the philosophical understanding of the Life, not only of the Saint, but of the Legend. Therefore it is worth while making the quest.

A letter just received from Sabatier brings word that the discovery has been made :—

I open my letter [says he] to tell you that news of a great piece of scientific joy and gladness has just come to me. You will remember how, in my Life of St. Francis and in the note to the preface of the "Speculum Perfectionis," I assured my readers that the story of the Three Friends as we have it was only a fragment of the original, and that it was impossible to look upon chapters xvii. and xviii. as being historically of any worth as a continuation of the Legend of the Three Friends, because it was clear from internal evidence that it was but a résumé of Celano's work—just to mask the suppression of the greater part. The Catholic critics laughed at me. But lo and behold! two Franciscan monks have discovered and just published "The Legend of the Three Friends" in its entirety. It has 79 chapters instead of only 18, and those two old chapters xvii. and xviii. are not to be found. Never could I have hoped for so clear and concise a confirmation of my conclusions.

The work in question is just published at Rome by Padri Marcellino de Civezza and Benefilo Domenichetti, and one does not know whether to congratulate the lovers of St. Francis, the worthy friars, or Paul Sabatier most upon this interesting discovery.

Although there is no political, there is a literary. Greater France. Next to mystic and Catholic Belgium, with its Maeterlinck, Verhaeren, and Huysmans, in contradistinction with old African Réunion, brilliantly passionate and imaginative, with its Dumas and Leconte de Lisle, there is staid and positive Switzerland, not destitute of humour and elevation, as Vinet, Töpffer, and Cherbuliez show. Among the later Swiss writers who have come to Paris to seek their fortune, the foremost is M. Rod. Geneva was too small for him, and La Semaine Littéraire had not sufficient circulation. "Les Idées morales du temps présent," his first important work, had moreover classed him among the numerous French and German Protestants, who, at the age of discretion, cast off their plain Puritanical swaddling-clothes, and don the glittering robes of a vague Renanic religiosity. In Paris he has worked with the stubborn determination of a Swiss, heaping up novels, articles of criticism, reviews, and even attempting the stage. At last so much industry has won its reward; the Débats and the Gaulois have welcomed him; the public have forgotten his Swiss origin; M. Barrès has done him the honour of confounding him with the French "intellectuals" who signed the petition on the Dreyfus affair, and a novel published in the Revue des Deux Mondes has brought him well out of the limbo of semi-obscure from which he had so long struggled to free himself. As the title sufficiently shows, M. Rod's novel is a study of French Protestantism; the scene is laid in La Rochelle and Montauban, the two Huguenot strongholds. The personages are Pasteur Naudie, his father, Abraham Naudie, the Professor of Theology, Defos, the rich Protestant shipbuilder, and Jane Defos, his niece. The plot is the unfortunate marriage of Pasteur Naudie and Jane Defos and the scandal that accrues therefrom for the Protestant community of La Rochelle. At a time when the Protestants are violently attacked, when M. Jules Lemaitre's Ainée reveals on the stage of the Gymnase their peculiarities, it is interesting to hear what a Swiss Protestant has to say about his own kin. The Catholics praise the book because they find in it arguments against their adversaries; the Protestants, while protesting that the author, because he writes in the clerical Gaulois, is none of theirs, read it to discover personal allusions to their spiritual guides.

It can hardly be said that M. Rod has been tender to his co-religionists. The Protestants of La Rochelle are irrepressible Pharisees; "they are not very fervent. . . they respond to the appeal of the church bells because it is respectable to appear at public worship, to have everything in order at all hazard with a probable God"; a few have stronger convictions; "they are afraid of a possible persecution, and hold in their hearts, in the calm of the present indifference, the hatred of Rome, the Pope, and the Jesuits." This is bad enough, but the individual members of Pasteur Naudie's congregation are still worse. One instance will suffice, and we shall quote the French original :—

M. Merlin, l'avoué, un matois d'une habileté terrible, qui se piquait de belles-lettres, lisait des vers à la société littéraire et composait des brochures contre la littérature immorale, dont il collectionnait avec une avidité pieuse les échantillons les plus remarquables.

The readers of M. Brunetière's Revue des Deux Mondes must have been delighted to find so many faults among their Puritan adversaries. There are a few pathetic passages in this story, such as the death of old Abraham Naudie, which show that M. Rod is not only a skilful novelist, but a master in delineation of the emotions. He now and then betrays his Swiss origin by expressions that the Academy would certainly not approve, thus constantly using "plutôt" with the meaning of "assez." "Des pieds possessifs" also appears venturesome.

M. Paul Adam revels in the marvellous and the recondite. After having told the story of an imaginary war in "La Bataille d'Uhde," he has recounted the establishment of an imaginary State. About 1849, some enthusiastic disciples of Saint-Simon and Fourier, under the guidance of a very shadowy prophet named Jerome, sailed for the Malay Archipelago, and found their Earthly Paradise in the very centre of the Island of Borneo, far away from the impure contact of civilized bourgeois societies. They realized the ideal of communism by abolishing marriage and property; they very soon lost their Western prejudices by intermingling with the Malay and Chinese populations, but they retained the passionate love of the West for science. Within a few years they have made great progress—they have constructed railways—models of speed, comfort, and safety—motor-cars everywhere replace carriages; there is a telescope three kilometres long; the discovery of balloons from which torpedoes may be discharged secure their military superiority.

But M. Adam has read Swift as well as Jules Verne; there is a satirical side to these wonders. These communists are by no means an ideal nation. Convinced of the truth of their doctrine, they are uncomfortably fanatical, and when they speak of invading Europe to avenge the Armenian massacres, the reader is bound to shudder. They have retained of their Western origin two defects—pedantry and feminism. Their idea of religion savours more of Comte, the Guimet Museum, and the Madeleine ceremonies than of India or China. The Dictatorship has devolved upon a woman who seems to have learned statesmanship from Louise Michel. As M. Adam contributes to the pages of the Revue Blanche, he has no tenderness for the army. In Borneo it is only the criminals—men or women—who are compelled to serve. The commander-in-chief commits a murder, and as to the soldiers, it is enough to say that they have the care of the public shambles, and they acquit themselves of their duty with a thoroughness that betrays their ferocity and the author's realism. When it is stated that these Letters are written by a Spanish diplomatist who had been sent out to the Philippine Islands to inquire after the cause of the insurrection and wandered into the dominions of Jerome, the Frenchman, the account of this book will be complete. "The diplomatist," we are told, "has not reappeared in Europe." Is this due to the ferocity of the people, or to the fact that he was guided through Borneo by two fair Government officials, Pythia and Thea, who have too much in common with their Parisian sisters? Although M. Adam is included among "les jeunes," this is not his début in letters. He is already responsible for a series of novels in thirteen volumes entitled "l'Epoque," another in six, and a third in two, and he is announcing a great many more. He differs from Jules Verne and Swift in one respect—his "Lettres de Malaisie" cannot be put into all hands indiscriminately, the nation whose manners he describes being too much akin to those already celebrated in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries by Jacques Sadeur and the Abbé Dulaurens.

Rosserie, littérature rosse are new names given to very old things. When Swift described the manners of the Yahoos he wrote, unwittingly, the masterpiece of the littérature rosse. His spiritual descendants find their models in the higher class of bourgeois where instinct and respectability wage an epic war. Their end is to suppress all redeeming traits in the portraits of their heroes, and not to show man as he is—a sad mixture of good nature, enthusiasm, conventionality, and cowardice. Mme. de Bovet's heroes belong to the race of the Bel-Amis; her heroines are scarcely better. A long novel written seriously in that strain would give more pain than pleasure; a short story is more acceptable; its lightness, humour, perfectly-satisfied cynicism may be appreciated without an afterthought, and the utter non-existence of moral feeling in the personages warns us that, after all, they are mere creations of the fancy, not human beings whom we may meet on our path. Some of the stories in "Petites Rosseries" are perfect of their kind. One of the best is entitled "Chevalerie," and amusingly contrasts the Spanish ideal of honour with the Parisian love of scandal and veulerie. For Mme. Bovet, who wrote in the columns of the Fronde, until with the latent whimsicality of rosserie she organized the subscription list of the Libre Parole in honour of Col. Henry, the forger of the French War Office, the ideal man is a good swordsman and duellist, and the ideal woman the emancipated female of the twentieth century, possessing the wit and intelligence that the bravo lacks. The omission of a table of contents in a book of short stories is to be regretted.

M. Masson-Forestier is treading in the steps of Guy de Maupassant—"Angoisses de Juge" being the first of a series of short tales reminding us in many respects of Flaubert's illustrious disciple. Like Maupassant, M. Masson-Forestier prefers to depict people in a humble station of life, a builder, a village doctor, a soldier, a notary's clerk. Like him again, he studies precision, and takes note of the small characteristic detail. In one respect, however, he is unlike the great story-teller—he gives great importance to the part played in life by Law and Justice. The book opens with the tale of a judge who becomes convinced that a man he has helped to sentence is innocent. He does his best to get him out of the Noumea penitentiary, and is crushed at last by the man's own confession. This is followed by the tale of a witness struck down by paralysis in the witness-box when intending to charge a poor girl in whose innocence every one believed till the day she committed suicide. The "Inventaire Tarrade," one of the best tales in the book, deals not with judges, but with notaries, a variety of the legal tribe. Quartier, the clerk, who is called in after the death of M. Tarrade, finds a hidden treasure in the house, and gives it up to the heirs because he knows he cannot face his master's eye with that crime on his conscience. The heirs, true French peasants, decline to reward him, on the ground that 27,000 francs—the amount of the treasure found—is not "a round number." The country doctor who saved his rival confrère is another excellent tale, and so is "Sommations respectueuses," illustrating some peculiarities of the French marriage laws.

Although lacking the humour and powerful tragic touch of Maupassant, "Angoisses de Juge" has the advantage of addressing itself to all readers. M. Colin might almost have included it among his series "pour les jeunes filles."

With the name she bears Mme. Gautier could have described no other land but the East. She has written a novel—"La Conquête du Paradis"—on French rule in India, in which the famous Duplex and Bussy, the heroic defender of Pondichery, play a prominent part. She has studied the history of Japan and written agreeable romances to celebrate the exploits of illustrious Mikados unknown to the West. She now has thought of turning to account the latest discoveries of Egyptian scholars. In the Louvre may be seen a certain number of stèles upon which the name of the god Amon has been effaced by order of Amenophis IV. when he attempted to effect a religious revolution and substitute the cult of Adonou for that of Amon. Mme. Gautier supposes that fragments of papyrus reveal how the priests of Amon sent a beautiful priestess to the Pharaoh to bring him over to the god of his fathers, and how she herself succumbed to the charm of the new god. Skillfully interwoven with this sentimental and historical plot is the story of the boy Moses. This tale takes up about a hundred pages, and in the rest of the book we revert once more to Japan and its heroic Mikados. There is a marvellous story of the Empress Ziu-Gou and her struggle against Korea, and a delicately-written description of Tokio, in which the exquisite colouring and poetic spirit of Theophile Gautier are once again revived.

French novels purporting to describe English manners are becoming more and more frequent. "L'Amour est mon Pêché" is, for instance, a bulky volume of five hundred pages, almost as closely printed as one of M. Zola's novels, recounting the adventures of a French governess in an English family. As her name is de Neraus and she descends from a titled family, her marriage with an officer in the Guards does not exceed the bounds of possibility. Her subsequent conduct renders her less sympathetic to the simple reader who cannot always understand her complicated psychology. Her death does not altogether redeem her past. The novel is curious to read, and not agreeable. The anonymous writer is evidently capable of doing much better. He is endowed with that quality which is growing very rare among novelists and which the French call "souffle."

The Adventurers. By H. B. Marriott Watson. 7½ x 5½ in., 356 pp. London, 1898. Harper. 6/-

It may seem paradoxical to say that Mr. Marriott Watson would be a more agreeable writer if he were something less of a stylist; for it is precisely on account of his style that Mr. Watson is admired by many of his readers. The fact remains, however, that, though he has a wonderful command of the resources of the English language, he also has an irritating trick of coining superfluous words, and fashioning phrases that have nothing but their ingenuity to recommend them. "In the article of his death" is one such tiresome phrase. It conveys no meaning to anyone who does not happen to remember in articulo mortis; it would not be passed by any moderator or other examiner as a translation of in articulo mortis; and it expresses nothing that could not be expressed as vividly by simpler and more intelligible words. Then we come upon the weird locution "equanimous." Etymology, perhaps, may justify it; but when we find it addressed to a burglar by the man who has discovered him in the act of rifling his desk we feel that an excessive refinement of style is far from being an unmixed advantage to a story-teller. Nor do these instances stand alone.

The pity is the greater because Mr. Marriott Watson has invented a romantic story of a really high order of merit. Like Mr. Anthony Hope he has succeeded in finding a modern setting for the kind of adventure that one ordinarily associates with the seventeenth and earlier centuries. There is hidden treasure in a secret chamber of a dilapidated, medieval castle. Two sets of adventurers try to get hold of it; but neither party cares to call in the police, because the Crown has a claim to it as treasure trove. Consequently the one set of adventurers defends the castle and the other tries to storm it. The disused moat is filled; the portcullis is lowered; the drawbridge is pulled up. Ultimately one of the two bands of knaves gets off with the gold and jewels, and puts it on board a boat which is run down by a liner in the Bristol Channel. There is no flaw on which you can lay your finger and say that these extraordinary occurrences could not possibly have happened at the latter end of the nineteenth century. It is well imagined and well constructed and is just the sort of story—all fighting and no love-making—that Stevenson would have rejoiced to tell.

It would be hard to guess why Mr. Laurence Housman chooses as a title A FIELD OF CLOVER (Kegan Paul, 6s.), though the inscription of his frontispiece—"Mercury. God of Merchandise, Look on with Favourable Eyes"—read together with the legend opposite, "Be kindly to the weary drover, And pipe the sheep into the clover," is suggestive as a clue. We trust this volume of fairy tales may indeed prove a field of clover to him, but we are a little doubtful, for they lack the simplicity of good fairy tales and seem intended less for children than for "grown-ups," who do not as a rule care much for fairy tales. The illustrations, with all their cleverness, are often so fantastic that they remind us of those pictures inscribed with some such term as "Find the Cat." Certainly they require serious study to understand them aright.

As the title suggests, HUNTING CROF HALL, by Alfred E. T. Watson and other writers (George Redway, 6s.), is a book of the sporting type. It is a collection of short stories, most of them fresh, breezy, and well told, whose titles, "The Dead Heat," "The First Day of the Season," "Podger's Pointer," and so on, give an admirable notion of the subject-matter. The illustrations are Randolph Caldecott's.

In WINDYHAUGH (Blackwood, 6s.) Dr. Margaret Todd, the author of the successful "Mona Maclean," who still writes as "Graham Travers," has gone beyond her depth. Instead of contenting herself with the life of her own people, she must needs go further afield and try not only new pastures, but fresh "problems." Her heroine is a restless, unsatisfactory, half-Gallicized creature, who is none the better for certain spiritual and intellectual experiences, who takes to an actress's life and forsakes it, who gets married, leaves her husband, and sends for him when, owing to "heredity," she develops a weakness for something worse than Scotch drink. None of the leading characters—certainly not Wilhelmina or her weak-willed husband or her self-indulgent father—are really convincingly drawn.

Unconvincing, too, is the plot of Mr. Burgin's novel SETTLED OUT OF COURT (C. Arthur Pearson, 6s.), and though some of the dialogue is interesting there is a lack of distinction about the book. The hero, a nice fellow enough, is not a gentleman. This would not matter in the least if we were not quite sure that Mr. Burgin intends him for one. Some of the minor characters are amusing, but they do not atone for the conventional delineation of the two heroines, Edna and Mary, the former a singularly good woman, the latter of the stock type of heedlessness, supposed to be peculiarly feminine.

American Letter.

AMERICAN PROSE.

It seems to be the law of such anthologies as Professor Carpenter has published under the title of "American Prose" (New York: Macmillan), that they shall represent the literature of a past more or less remote. If they transcend this law and attempt to deal with contemporary literature, they meet difficulties, personal with the authors and proprietorial with the publishers, which are practically insuperable, and they remain partial and unsatisfactory. It will be easily imagined, then, that the well-chosen passages in Professor Carpenter's volume do not stand for recent American prose, though they so nearly achieve this office in respect of some masters of it, like Lowell, Parkman, Curtis, and Walt Whitman, whose voices are still in our ears, while they perform it for writers so long silent as Cotton Mather, Jonathan Edwards, and Charles Brockden Brown, and for one writer so little American as the Englishman, Thomas Paine.

The last was evidently included from the wish to make a more characteristic showing for our revolutionary period, when the thinking and writing from the new American consciousness was so wholly political and of a purpose so distinctly civic as scarcely to be literature at all in the usual sense. This sort of thinking and writing among us has been often so good in form, so dignified, so clear, so simple, so strenuous, not only in the case of the fathers, but in that of their sons and grandsons, from Jefferson to Lincoln, in every kind of public life, as to have literary quality in spite of itself. After the first surprise at the collocation, one finds perhaps greater reason for it in what one may call the involuntary excellence of the thinking and writing than in Professor Carpenter's more explicit motive for grouping Franklin, Washington, Jefferson, Webster, Lincoln, and Grant as our prose authors, with Irving, Emerson, Poe, Lowell, Holmes, and Parkman. He believes that they have a right to the place he gives them, not so much artistically as intellectually, because their utterances are expressive of the mind of "a people whose life is based . . . upon a single and consistent set of principles," acting "under given responsibilities and in pursuit of given ideals" of freedom and self-reliance. "Our prose literature," he thinks, "consists largely of what may be described as the ideas of individuals on matters of wide general interest, presented for adoption, as a series of resolutions might be, to the assembly of the people," and on this ground he admits our statesmen to the company of our scholars as in one sort masters with them of a common art.

His suggestion is ingenious and interesting rather than convincing, though it is unquestionably true in a certain measure and in a certain light; and for my own part I cannot regret that the American student of our prose should, on any theory, be invited to renew his acquaintance with the Farewell Address and the Declaration of Independence, in a day when they seem passing into the honourable oblivion which awaits all classics. They cannot be comfortable reading for many of us, at present, with their notions of Governments deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, and their counsels of perfection in our own civic life, when we are straining to impart our administration, in all its imperfection, to our recent conquests. Perhaps, however, their formulation of early ideals may have for the finer sense the charm of a delicate irony. The artistic delight of Franklin's prose is, of course, independent of accident and theory. It is so positive and so modern that if he were not a father of the republic he would be regarded as one of the first of its literary men, not to say the very first.

Professor Carpenter's introduction is a notably excellent piece of criticism in a volume where all the criticism is so good; though I am not sure that I am quite able to agree with him in his claim that American prose should have the fourth place in the literature of the world, and follow the German, which he thinks should follow the English and French. This, like his proposition concerning the nature of our prose, is rather interesting than convincing. I should like to assent, but when I think of what has been done in Russian, Norwegian, Spanish, and Italian prose, I have my modest misgivings. On the other hand, I doubt, when it comes to a question of form, whether any European prose (and ours, unless it is now Asiatic by right of conquest, is European prose) ought to be put after the German, which Professor Carpenter recognizes as "still floundering in the medieval fashions" cast off by England two centuries ago. Without pretending that we equal the Germans in length, breadth, and thickness of thinking, or even saying that they have not hidden away in their inner consciousness a grace beyond us, it seems to me that until German prose shall be written in German verse, it is an effect of over-impartiality to give it precedence of ours.

Perhaps, however, it is at some such point as this that the comparative method ceases to be of value in criticism; and I much prefer to affirm the positive excellence of the essays by various hands in Professor Carpenter's admirably-edited volume. In their presence one must try for something of their own self-restraint, and I intend to keep myself well within bounds when I say that we may be willing to let them represent recent American criticism at its best. They do not touch contemporary work, they are necessarily retrospective and historical; but in the things which dignify criticism, as insight, breadth, clearness, candour, temperance, they leave little to be asked. Above all, they strike me as having form, objectively as well as subjectively; each in its way is a shapely piece of literary work.

In the matter of outward grace they conform to the spirit which, I think, has always wrought in American literature of the æsthetic sort, and even of the civic sort. It appears to me that our instinctive endeavour for form has had its most distinctive effect in our prose; and that the reader will be sensible of this in the criticisms of William P. Trent, Brander Matthews, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, George Santayana, Edward Everett Hale, Jr., Lewis Edward Gates, Charles Eliot Norton, and John Fiske, as well as in the work of Franklin, Irving, Prescott, and Motley, Emerson and Whitman, Hawthorne and Poe, Lowell and Parkman, which they severally comment. For myself, I cannot help regretting that I had not their work at hand when I ventured in this place not long ago some guesses at the nature of American criticism, and I should still like to refer the reader to them as illustrations of what this may be in favourable circumstances.

[By SIR WALTER BESANT.]

I.

The "Pen and the Book" is a little book intended for the literary aspirant alone. It has only been advertised in the Author—not yet in any other papers; it has not been sent out for review; the preface states that it is "in a sense, privately printed." But the statements it contains on the methods of publishing are not new; they have been already advanced in the reports and papers of the Society of Authors.

I have, however, no desire to hide behind the screen of private printing. Anybody may review the book who likes. Of course, I should prefer it to be reviewed by one who can be impartial. On the other hand, I venture to think that, had the attack made upon the book in Literature been shown to me before it appeared, it would not have been allowed to pass. For my reply must be simply, I am sorry to say, a series of flat denials—unqualified denials, denials supported by a witness who is the first authority on the subject—of every important point in the paper.

First, however, I must ask for certain references.

Thus (I quote the writer) "'Never sell your work' is the advice given; for the publisher, in asking you to sell outright, is 'simply trying to buy a property which may be worth many hundreds, or even thousands, for a song.'"

The words in inverted commas—"Never sell your work"—I cannot find in the book. Now, inverted commas mean a quotation all the world over. The words may be in the book, but I cannot find them. On what page do they occur?

Nor can I find that advice. On what page does it occur?

The word "for" connects the alleged advice (which is not on the page) with certain words which are. With what object was this conjunction invented? The passage itself on buying cheap shall certainly stand. Are we to suppose that publishers, alone of mortals, buy dear in order to sell cheap? I go on, in the book, to instance certain miserable prices, and I advise young writers to refuse to accept those prices. But not, certainly, "Never to sell their work."

In fact, on selling outright your readers will be astonished to hear that the advice actually given is exactly the opposite of that alleged!—namely (p. 316):—

"This [the method of selling outright] is in many respects the most satisfactory if a proper price can be obtained. But the transaction should be managed by a competent agent."

This point touches my personal character. For years past I have given this opinion in the Author, month after month. The greater part of my own literary property has been dealt with in the same manner, through my agent, to the complete satisfaction of myself and, I hope, of my publishers. I am therefore made to stand before the public, and paraded, as one who practises secretly what he denounces openly.

Your readers will, I am sure, acknowledge that I have the right to demand where the writer found those words and that advice; and also to ask for an explanation of the suppression of the advice actually given. If the writer says that he had not read the words, he stands convicted of attacking a book without reading it. But there are other references wanted.

Again, the writer says:—"But can a decently-produced edition of 1,000 copies of a six-shilling book be obtained at a cost of £50? I think not."

I want to know on what page is to be found the statement that such a book can be produced for £50. I cannot find it. If it is in the book, it shall come out. If it is not, what excuse is there for this passage?

He says, again, that I expect unknown authors to get sales of 3,000 to 1,000 copies. On what page is that expectation stated?

I cannot find any passage anywhere which justifies this statement. Still, he may have quoted accurately. I may be mistaken. Where is it? If it is there, it shall come out. If it is not there, what excuse is there for the allegation?

Let me now proceed to other points which do not require the verification of references.

I. He speaks of the "fallacy" of literary property. Does he mean that a man who has a MS., which, when printed, will produce sums of money, large or small, is not to be considered as having a property? Can this point be seriously advanced? In that case a chair, a house, a mine is not property.

II. "But in profit-sharing agreements the author has a voice in the choice of printer and binder, and often knows beforehand what the estimate is. Certainly this is always so when he shares in the expenses." These are the words of the "Publisher." Now, I have had a very large experience in publishers' agreements, but I have never known one single case in which, in a profit-sharing agreement, the author has had any voice at all in the choice of printer or binder. I have had four books of my own published on that system. I have never once had this choice offered me, nor have I ever had an estimate of the cost laid before me.

III. "Wilful overcharging can only be tested by giving definite accounts from definite individuals. As these are not furnished, the general charge may be dismissed as unworthy of consideration." These are the words of the "Publisher."

This statement is simply amazing! For ten years and more the principal charge that authors have brought against certain publishers is that of making secret profits. Let me define. I mean charging more than they paid for printing, paper, binding, or anything else without power obtained by open agreement with the author. But I can give you one simple and unanswerable proof. In another paper of Saturday, the 14th (the Outlook), another publisher actually confesses the practice and tries to defend it.

IV. "The reader is told that advertisements are charged for which either never appeared or which appeared in the publishers' own organs." These are the "Publisher's" words.

I cannot find anything said about advertisements which have never appeared. I should like to know where it occurs. Counsel's opinion has been procured by the Authors' Society on the subject of advertisements in publishers' own organs. It is strongly to the effect that they can only be charged at the rate of typesetting and paper. The "Publisher" asserts the right to make such charges.

Your readers do not probably understand what is meant by this contention. It is extremely important, because the publisher's claim means nothing short of the power, by repeated advertisements in his own organs, or by unpaid exchanges, to put into his own pocket the whole profits of a book. I know of an agreement in which the publisher made a great point of charging the author only half the usual tariff for advertisements in his own organs. Observe that, even if he offers to charge only a tenth part of the ordinary tariff, the power of seizing everything still remains in his hands. It is in the desire of retaining this power that the liveliest resistance is made to this opinion of counsel. I can only hope that we may be able before long to bring this claim into open Court and to get a decision. There is no other way of settling the point.

V. "Office expenses." My point is that publishers have no more right to be paid extra for office expenses than booksellers and authors, or, indeed, any other men in trade or in professions. The point seems to me too clear to admit of dispute. Do lawyers charge office expenses? Do doctors? Do any men of business whatever? Of course publishers have office expenses. These must be paid out of their profits just as with lawyers and everybody else.

VI. "Royalties." It is difficult to understand the "Publisher's" objection to my position. This is, that the deferred royalty can be made, and too frequently is made, a method of "besting" the author. It is attempted in two ways—first, by deferring the royalties till an immense number of copies have been sold, and then by giving a very low royalty. The writer says that any book may fail. Not any book. But, if so, that is the publisher's business, not the author's.

The "Publisher" says that the royalty figures in my book do not include advertising. But they do—advertising such as is given to a moderately successful book.

VII. He speaks of my giving certain figures as the cost of a certain book. The figures are expressly stated not to be mine at all, but actual printers' estimates and accounts. To this point I shall refer in my notes on the second letter.

VIII. Publication on Commission :—

I don't know what fees are—I have never heard of their being charged. 'Percentages' are the creation of the imagination of prejudiced counsel. With commission books it is usual for the authors to suggest the amount they wish to be spent on advertisements, and the medium in which these are to appear.

These are the "Publisher's" words. What are the facts?

1. Fees are frequently charged.

2. As to percentages being the invention of any one, the statement strikes me with amazement, a kind of despair, that such a thing should be advanced after all that has been said and done. Why, the proposed "agreements" issued last summer by the Publishers' Association actually claim the right—the right, mind—in commission publishing, of adding a percentage on everything—a percentage of whatever they please!—for they leave a blank in the agreement.

3. As for asking the authors to name the medium of advertising, I have never seen, in all my experience, such a clause. It may be done, but I do not know of it. Nor does my witness—as will be seen.

He quotes my illustration of what a commission account should be, and what it probably would be, as baseless. I can only assure your readers that the latter is not by any means "baseless," but is drawn up with a lively recollection of things that I have seen.

"Publishers," he says, "care not a rap for books on commission." This is simply absurd. Many publishers are always willing to undertake this kind of business.

"Incidental expenses," to which he objects, are a common charge, as much as "out of pocket" expenses with lawyers. If they are honest statements of expenses, why not?

A deduction for "bad debts" does appear regularly in some accounts. I will show your readers, later, the objection to the appearance of "bad debts."

If your readers should still be in any doubt on these points, I would refer them to a book published by the Society of Authors, not written by myself, called the "Methods of Publishing." They will find there actual agreements that have been forced upon authors and their true meaning. There are other publications of the society—also not written by me—which I would advise those of your readers who wish to form an independent opinion to read and ponder.

Correspondence.

BORROW AND THE GIPSIES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It is the copyright of "The Romany Rye" and not, as you suppose, that of "Lavengro" which remains at present unexpired. Indeed, it is now some years since I myself edited "Lavengro" for the Minerva Library, and prefaced it by some reminiscences of George Borrow, whom, in the latter years of his life, I had the privilege of knowing.

And now may I, without presumption, add a word about your generous reference to me? You say, "the excellent gipsy scenes in 'Aylwin' ought to send many readers to the writer from whom Mr. Watts-Dunton drew much of his inspiration." I am quite conscious that to say of a writer that he "drew much of his inspiration" from a great English classic is not to disparage him; perhaps it is to honour him. But I can easily show that I did not draw my inspiration from Borrow. It is a fact, and a singular one (as has been often pointed out), that Borrow in the gipsy reminiscences of "The Romany Rye" takes the reader to the very border of Wales and then stops. And even afterwards, when he came to write "Wild Wales," he for some reason or another avoided saying anything about the Welsh gipsies—the gipsies who figure in "Aylwin." Again, in Borrow's two delightful books—to be mentioned in connexion with which is an honour to any writer—there is scarcely a word showing that he had given any attention to the superstitions and the folklore of the gipsies with whom he was brought into contact in England.

Now, it is the superstitions and the folk-lore of the gipsies alone that "inspire" the gipsy portions of "Aylwin." Once only in "Lavengro," as far as I remember, does Borrow even allude to that mysterious symbolism of nature implied by the word "dukkeripen," which plays so important a part in Aylwin. Indeed, his general indifference to the subject of gipsy superstition and folk-lore was, as an old friend of his—Dr. Hake—once said to me, very remarkable.

THEODORE WATTS-DUNTON.

"THE PEN AND THE BOOK."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am obliged to your two correspondents for pointing out the understatements of my case in the two accounts I presented. I was perfectly aware that I had understated it; but I wished to follow the writer of the book I was criticizing in his method. My use of the term "net profit" is not mine. In "The Pen and the Book" the royalty tables give comparative profits made by author and publisher on various royalties, and it is there assumed that this profit is net profit. My object was to show that the assumed net profit disappears in expenses not taken into account. I confess my balanced account does not show this. It ought, certainly, to have taken the form given it by Mr. Hugh D. Macdonald. In both accounts, of course, the publisher makes dead losses.

"Plain Figures," however, appears to be incredulous about these dead losses. I think, however, his attitude would change if he saw the actual returns on many of our publications. Not only are these dead losses due to manufacturing and advertising expenses alone, but oftener still to a too large advance payment of authors' royalties. These advance payments are based on sales of a certain number, and this number is never reached. Successful authors take care that they will not "take refuge" in work-houses." Successful publishers, if they escape that refuge, have little cause to thank authors of the class of the writer of "The Pen and the Book." Publishers do require large capital, and often enough they do not "stand it for ever." It would, of course, be ridiculous to assume that they make no profits. My object was simply to point out that there is another side to the "rosy" one shown by the author of the book under notice.

I envy "Plain Figures" good spirits and sense of humour. Evidently he is not a publisher.

Yours, &c.,

"A PUBLISHER."

AUTHORS' PROFITS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—There are three methods in ordinary use for settling the share that the author of a book is to receive of the profits that accrue from it—(1) sale outright, (2) half-profits, (3) royalties. Some, I might even venture to say many, of the readers of Literature will be interested in seeing some figures which express the results of my experience in this matter.

When I was a young man I proposed to a publishing firm a book which, if it succeeded, might be expected to have a steady sale for some years. I need not describe it further than by saying that it was of an educational kind. As I was unknown, the publishers, though seeing merit in the work, stipulated for a previous payment of £50 before undertaking the risk. The book was well received, and two or three years afterwards I received a letter informing me that the sale had been satisfactory. No account was given, but a cheque for £100 was enclosed. By this the £50 advanced was repaid and a further sum of £50 was added for the purchase of the copyright. As some other literary work which I had done for the firm was included, I may say that the sum offered for the copyright was about £30. I was a fool to accept it—that I freely acknowledge. But I was young and inexperienced; this was almost my first literary earning; and I was poor. And the money came with a curious felicity—as I thought then, but do not think now—on the first day of my holidays. Anyhow, I took the money; the book still sells—after more than a quarter of a century—but I have never received anything more from it. A few years later I had finished what may be called a second part. I was now more experienced and less needy. Accordingly I stipulated for a royalty. This has brought me in a little more than £400. The publishing price is, it is true, somewhat larger, but then the second part has not been on sale for so long. I may fairly contrast the £30 with the £400 as the results in pari materia of sale outright and royalties. There are, of course, books which it is best to sell outright. But if there is any chance of a permanent market such a sale is the very height of improvidence.

The contrast between half-profits and royalties is not so startling, but it is sufficiently marked. I find that two volumes for which, for reasons that need not be described, I accepted this mode of remuneration, when compared with two of the same kind published on the royalty system (the sale in the two cases being about equal) show a result of £70 as compared with a result of £145. The half-profits accounts are complicated almost to the point of unintelligibility. There are items which I have no means of checking—e.g., advertising, trade allowances, and a contribution to shop expenses. Then the books are sold at all kinds of prices, not a little to the damage of other works of mine. A publisher who is bound to pay a fixed royalty cannot "cut" prices. On the half-profit system he can do almost what he likes. And if everything is done with scrupulous probity—and I willingly acknowledge that this is the practice of many houses—there is the grave inconvenience that a new edition swallows up all the profits of the year. The simplicity and regularity of the payment by royalty is one of its great recommendations. Nothing interferes with the author's income except the one thing which he must accept without complaint—the indifference of the public. SENEK.

P.S.—Since writing the above I have had the advantage of reading the two letters in which "A Publisher" deals with Sir Walter Besant's volume, "The Pen and the Book." I entirely agree with him in thinking that the "Method of the Future" is impossible. The "literary agent," if he is to be of any real use to the author, must take up the function of the publisher, and nothing will be gained by a change of name. Publishers there will always be, and they will always, I suppose, have "a good deal of human nature" about them, and human nature is all the better for safeguards.

I suppose that "Publisher" will allow that his confrère, with his very appositely timid cheque, was too sharp. Sale outright will always produce some hard cases, but a proviso might be introduced that, in the event of exceptional success, some benefit should accrue to the author. One half-profit account that I yearly receive is accompanied by vouchers from printer, paper-seller, &c. This example might be followed with advantage. I remember submitting another such account to a practical printer, who told me that the charge for composing was 50 per cent. too high. But in this case the publisher expected to wait—and did wait—some years before the book paid its expenses. But this method of recouping the partner who finds the capital is an objectionable one. These vouchers would furnish an effectual check on the sales, for which the author, whether on the half-profit or the royalty system, must now take the publisher's word. I have heard that the publisher appropriates the whole profit on odd copies—i.e., the printer sends in 1,025 for 1,000, and the sale of the 25 goes wholly to the publisher. This may easily become a serious abuse. S.

FORCING THE NOTE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The problem of the causes for the diminution in the number of novels published in the last year may, I hope, be explained in small part at least by the quality of those published in the year before. I have not been in the habit of reading novels largely, because work in hand has employed all the time I could give to library work, but last year I was confined to my room by a slight bronchitis for ten days, and, having no exercise or pastime, I had to do a great deal of reading to get through the day. I read, therefore, all the latest novels I could get from the circulating library, promiscuously.

As literature I was surprised at the standard of excellence which seemed to content them; it was as if they had been mostly written by amateurs who had never been taught style or construction, and they put me in continual wonder what could have induced the publishers to take some of them up; and I concluded, judging from my own experience, that the authors must have published the greater part at their own expense and that the speculation must have been very discouraging. The effect on me was a sense of disgust with all fiction, so that for a long time I could not read even one of the better class of novels, Besant or Meredith, with any enjoyment—it was as if a nasty taste in my mouth had prevented me from recognizing the quality of a good wine. In default of literary ability, healthy imagination, or subtlety of plot, they generally resorted to forcing the note of sentiment, of sensational expedient, and of the eccentricity of human nature, to such a point that the mind, unaccustomed to the pitch, tired, flagged, and finally became nauseated until even a remote suggestion of the late diet was like the memory of an attack of sea-sickness. It was months before a really good novel gave me any enjoyment or overcame the nausea sufficiently to permit me to get interested in it.

It is supposable that the rush of new and inexperienced writers, dazzled by the reports of the profits made by the standard novelists, had resulted in complete disenchantment by the meagre results afforded by the publishers' statements; that the amateurs were convinced that even novel writing requires an education for pecuniary success; and that practically screaming at the top of one's voice continually does not keep the ear or strengthen the attention to the discourse. Nor is it only in the field of fiction that the falsetto seems to obtain. History, if we may accept even the critics, demands warmth and colour—the fight for the flag—in oblivion of the great fact that the advocate of any side will, in the end, be the opponent of the mass of thinkers (for there are many sides to every question, and he can only support one), and his flag will ultimately be the target of the missiles of those ranged under all the others; so that the only history that offends no one and remains the standard in the end is that which employs no rhetoric or persuasion. And the essayist, disturbed by the memory of Carlyle's word-mint and its numismatic richness, or by the tropical luxuriance of Ruskin's "Pascua Florida," seeks, as he polishes his phrases, to give them the cutting facets of the diamond till the glitter makes a balas ruby in its mild lustre a solace to the mind's eye.

Is there not in all our literature a tendency to force the note, which sober and conservative criticism ought to set its face against? It will not, perhaps, sober the common sense, but in time it must compel the recognition of the higher standard and make the distance greater between the good and the bad literature, so that the wayfarer, even though a fool, may read as he runs, in time.

Yours truly,

W. J. STILLMAN.

Condercum, West Bournemouth, Jan. 19.

A PLEA FOR THREE VOLUMES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It is interesting to note, from the statistics quoted in Literature, January 14, that the abolition of the "three-decker" seems to have appreciably diminished the number of novels published last year; but there is an aspect of the matter which might make us pause before congratulating ourselves on this result.

Unquestionably a certain amount of trash has by this means been prevented from attaining to the dignity of print, and so far the gain is clear: but it may have been purchased at too heavy a price. After all, the contents of circulating libraries do not very seriously affect the social organism, and it is not only foolish fiction that has been suppressed by this reform. For any return on a six-shilling novel the publisher must secure a large circulation, and he has consequently rejected manuscripts with which he might otherwise have been disposed to venture; but the (comparatively) small number accepted have not been chosen for their intrinsic merit. This is not a question of taste, but of necessity; popularity is the one quality which remains of practical worth to a novelist. The only novels which can be reasonably accepted for the six-shilling form are those by well-known writers, or those which possess the elusive characteristic of being in some way "striking." And the publisher is further confronted with the difficulty that what was "striking" when he read the manuscript, may have become commonplace before the book is out.

This state of things is most damaging to literature, for it means practically that a man has no chance of a hearing unless he can catch the public ear straight off. Such success, as a rule, is ensured by a mannerism in style or subject, which (because the public will not listen to him in any other part) becomes a trick and ruins his work. But, perhaps, an even greater evil directly arising from the diminution of output is the driving of fiction along certain set grooves. A publisher is naturally inclined to work of a similar kind to that with which his neighbour has made a hit; the author is even tempted to actually produce it against his own bent; and as the competition grows keener from the imperative demand for big sales, the number of recognized successful "types" becomes steadily diminished, and the chances of development and widening from fresh blood rapidly dwindle away altogether. The laudable desire to give the public good value for their money, on which this reform was based, stands a fair chance of producing the very opposite effect.

The fact has been surely overlooked that every book is not either a hit or a miss. There is plenty of good work which could never attain to immediate popularity, but yet might easily secure enough critical recognition to float a "three-decker." It is most important to remember, moreover, that a man who is once floated may always rise gradually to his proper level, from which an early extinction might shut him out for ever. On the old system the very small sale needed, which was practically secured by the libraries, reduced the elements of speculation and risk to a minimum; so that the publisher was able on the one hand to confidently exert his own best judgment, and on the other to check his fallibility at the public bar. An opening really existed for all but the absolutely bad, whom nobody misses.

There is a striking warning of the very dangers into which we are now running; on the stage. There the speculative possibilities of large profits have led to the inartistic methods of long runs and expensive staging, by which a manager is practically prevented from accepting good work. Fiction has not yet come to this pass, but the abolition of the three-volume edition has given it a rapid impetus down hill; and the literary agent is working in the same direction, for he chokes off the smaller men by artificially keeping up the prices of the "favourites"; and in so doing incidentally jeopardizes the very existence of the young publisher, who feels that, literally at all costs, he must "get them on his list."

Yours, &c.,

R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON.

MR. SPENCER AND MR. CROZIER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Perhaps I may say, in reply to Mr. Herbert Spencer, that the writer of a short review cannot discuss large philosophical questions. My business was, not to vindicate Mr. Spencer from the charge of materialism, but to give your readers some account of Mr. Crozier's book. It was precisely in order that no injustice might be done to Mr. Spencer that I spoke of "what Mr. Crozier calls" Mr. Spencer's materialism. These qualifying words do not imply agreement with Mr. Crozier, but rather the reverse.

Your faithfully,

YOUR REVIEWER.

CAPTAIN STENZEL'S "THE BRITISH NAVY."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the last issue of Literature you have a short article on my translation of Captain (not Major von) Stenzel's work on the "British Navy." In it you say—(1) that the translation ought never to have been made, (2) that no blame whatever attaches to "Major von" Stenzel, (3) that it is the translator who is to blame for making the translation. I will deal first with (2) and (3). You apply to me, I am willing to believe in good-natured banter, the Italian proverb, traduttore, traditore (=translator, traitor). Whom have I betrayed? Certainly not your "Major von" Stenzel. He was aware from the beginning that the translation was being made, and not only did he never hint to me that he objected to the translation, but he even expressed approval of my work and helped me in it. His account of our training ships was imperfect and confused. I was at much pain and some expense to remove this defect, as any one can see who will compare pp. 389 and 390 of the German original with pp. 163 and 164 of the English text. With respect to this matter Stenzel wrote to the German publisher, "Ich kann ihm nur gratulieren." I have in my possession eight closely-written pages in Stenzel's own small handwriting giving me advice on difficult points of the translation, which I gratefully accepted. It is clear then that Captain Stenzel has a considerable share in the demerit, or as some may call it the merit, of my translation.

Now as to the first point. I have before me about a score of English reviews of the German work, inclusive of such high authorities as the Daily Chronicle, the Daily News, Literature, and The Times. They are all highly laudatory without a single adverse word. For want of space I will quote only from the last two. Literature says (April 31, 1898):—"The author's description of the British Navy is singularly complete, and the mass of detailed information here brought together is not to be found in any book in our language." The Times says:—"There is no work in the English language which gives so full an account of all that concerns the fleet. We have at present no 'Navy Book,' and a translation of Captain Stenzel's excellent study would be a useful undertaking." Was I wrong in following the advice of such eminent authorities?

I am, Sir, yours,

A. SONNENSCHN. E.

Wandsworth-common, Jan. 20.

 We are glad to publish Mr. Sonnenschein's letter, but with reference to the quotation which he makes from our own columns, we must point out that the review he quotes from was a review of Captain Stenzel's work in the German language. The point raised in our note was the question whether it was desirable, as a matter of literary ethics, to translate into English a work which was itself—so Messrs. Bell contend—to some extent a reproduction of works first published in English.

MACAULAY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—A "Reviewer" has good precedent for his fondness for studying the marginalia of Mudie. On at least one occasion Macaulay turned his wide experience of circulating libraries to similar advantage. Croker's notes on Boswell, he said, "remind us of nothing so much as of those profound and interesting annotations which are pencilled by sempstresses and apothecaries' boys on the dog-eared margins of novels borrowed from circulating libraries: 'How beautiful!' 'Cursed prosy!' 'I don't like Sir Reginald Malcolm at all,' 'I think Pelham is a sad dandy.'" Apparently the modern scribbler on margins has become more critical.

Speaking of Macaulay reminds one of an odd mistake in the last volume of the "Dictionary of National Biography," where it is stated that Sir Charles Trevelyan married "Hannah Moore, sister of Lord Macaulay." Setting aside the dubious correctness of giving Macaulay his title in 1834, one is grieved to see that the virtuous Hannah More is so totally forgotten as this misspelling of her godchild's name implies.—Yours, &c.,

W. E. GARRETT FISHER.

Authors and Publishers.

Messrs. Methuen go so far in their recognition of the tendency towards cheap literature that they are about to issue at sixpence, under the general title of "Methuen's Library of Fiction," stories by well-known authors, most of which will be new works hitherto unpublished in book form. This is an interesting experiment. Sixpenny reprints are well known, but in no case has the work of an author of high repute been published in the first instance at that price. The first book thus published will be a novel by Mr. E. W. Hornung. Mr. Robert Barr and Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne will follow, and later will be published books by Mr. Baring Gould and others. In some cases the book will be published simultaneously at sixpence and at a higher price.

Loyalists who will celebrate the memory of the "White King" on Monday next at St. Mary-at-Hill will welcome the life of Prince Henry, Cardinal Duke of York (1725-1807), by Mr. Bernard W. Kelly, to be published by Mr. R. Washbourne, of 18, Paternoster-row, at a low price. The biography, which will contain about 160 pages, will be bound in scarlet à la Cardinal, with his Eminence's armorial bearings emblazoned in gold on the cover. The portrait of the Cardinal Duke, taken from the painting by Batoni, now in the National Gallery, will serve as a frontispiece.

A still more interesting volume on the Stuarts, however, is to come from Messrs. Innes—viz., a Legitimist Calendar, compiled by the Marquis de Rivigny and Mr. Cranstoun Metcalfe, the intellectuals of the Legitimist party in England. The book will contain what is believed to be a complete list of the non-jurors of both the regular and irregular succession, a tentative list of Ministers appointed by James II. after 1688, and a complete list of all the living descendants of Mary Queen of Scots, showing the order in which they stand in succession to the Throne, both from the point of view of heredity, and from that of the Act of Settlement. It appears that there are no fewer than 5,000 of these descendants—including every European Sovereign except the King of Servia and the Prince of Monaco—and several hundreds of them have, from the point of view of the authors of the Calendar, a better title to the British Crown than has her Majesty Queen Victoria.

The publishers of the Art Journal have conceived an original and interesting idea in their "Jubilee Series." The Art Journal has now completed fifty years of life, and during this year twelve monthly parts containing selected examples from the volumes of the past fifty years will be issued, each part containing two extra plates. The first part of the "Jubilee Series" contains two engravings, after "Venice—The Dogana," by J. M. W. Turner, R.A., and after "The Countess," by Sir Thomas Lawrence, P.R.A.

A considerable interest is evidently taken in the personality of the late "Lewis Carroll." Mr. Collingwood's Life of his uncle has already run through the first edition of 5,000 copies and a second is ready. Not only this, but there is in preparation by Messrs. Dent another book containing some reminiscences of Mr. Dodgson by Miss Isa Bowman, one of his nieces. This volume will contain a diary which "Lewis Carroll" wrote for Miss Bowman while she was a child and which is in the fantastic manner of "Alice in Wonderland."

Messrs. Downey and Co. have in hand "a new novel" by Charles Lever, called "Gerald Fitzgerald, the Chevalier." It now makes its first appearance, in England at any rate, in book form, Lever not having resuscitated it from the pages of the Dublin University Magazine, and his executors evidently having lost sight of it altogether. It follows the fortunes of a son of Prince Charles Edward, who is supposed (by Lever) to have contracted a secret marriage with "Geraldine"—one of the romantic Irish family of which Lord Edward Fitzgerald was a conspicuous member. The book will be published early in February.

Messrs. Hutchinson announce a work by Prince Kropotkin, which we mentioned some months ago, called "Fields, Factories, and Workshops," and a novel entitled "The Mandarin," by Carlton Dawe, author of "A Bride of Japan."

Mr. Frederick Greenwood is assisting the widow of his old friend, Coventry Patmore, to arrange the materials which exist for a life of the poet.

Messrs. Macmillan have nearly ready a History of the British Army, which has been written by the Hon. John Fortescue, who is already known in this branch of literature as the author of a history of the 17th Lancers and a monograph on Dundonald.

Mr. E. H. Cooper's account of the improvements on the St. Gervais route to the summit of Mont Blanc was published recently in The Times, and some photographs of this route will shortly appear in Cassell's Magazine. A volume of Mr. Cooper's short stories, to be called "Children, Race-Horses, and Ghosts," will be published by Messrs. Duckworth next month, besides the book which we mentioned a week or two ago, called "Wye-marke and the Sea Fairies."

The February number of Macmillan's Magazine will contain, besides the opening chapters of a new novel, "Valda Hanem, or the Romance of a Turkish Harem," the scene of which is laid in Cairo at the present time, an article on "The Press of Paris," one on "The College at Khartum, and after" (indicating the lines on which our education of the Sudanese should proceed), a review of the recent changes in the status of "The Army Doctor," by Captain Trevor, "Diplomacy and Journalism" (a letter to the editor on Mr. Frederick Greenwood's article on "Public Opinion in Public Affairs" in the last number), and a paper on "Mr. Watts-Dunton and his reviewers," by a Country Cousin.

Miss Florence Stacpoole, the well-known writer on hygiene, domestic economy, and on astronomical subjects, has written some sections of "The Book of the Home," an encyclopædia on domestic matters which Messrs. Blackie, of Glasgow, are bringing out. Miss Stacpoole is also writing a novel dealing with the psychological aspect of some social questions and also a volume for Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Children's Library" on popular astronomy.

Messrs. Duckworth will publish in February a book on "Our Industrial Laws," by Mona Wilson, edited, with a preface, by Mrs. H. J. Tennant, late H.M. Superintending Inspector of Factories. The book will deal with working women in factories, workshops, shops, and laundries, and how to help them.

Mr. R. B. Douglas, the author of the "Life and Times of Madame Dubarry," will have his translation of "Les Cent Nouvelles" published in the spring. These tales were originally written to amuse Louis XI. in his younger days.

Mr. Lafcadio Hearn's volume of essays on Japan will shortly be issued by Messrs. Sampson Low.

Among the forthcoming works announced by Messrs. J. M. Dent is a new edition of Mr. Maurice Hewlett's "Earthwork out of Tuscany," which is to be illustrated by Mr. J. Kerr Lawson. Mr. Maurice Hewlett was the guest of the evening at last Monday's dinner of the Authors' Club. The chair was taken by Mr. Oswald Crawford.

A notable series of articles appeared in the Saturday Review during last year, under the initial "X," in which the right of some well-known people to the arms they used was seriously questioned. These articles, which have been revised and considerably added to, will be published in a volume very shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock.

Messrs. Duckworth are publishing a new novel called "Omar, the Tent-maker," a romance of old Persia, by Nathan Haskell Dole, a well-known student of Persian literature and history. Omar's admirers will be interested in a tale based on authentic facts in the career of the Persian poet. The scene is laid partly at Naishapur, which, about the period of the first crusade, was at its acme of civilization, and partly in the mountain fortress of Alamut, south of the Caspian Sea, where the Ismailians established themselves towards the close of the eleventh century.

"A Son of Empire," Mr. Morley Roberts' new novel, will be published by Messrs. Hutchinson toward the middle of February. Indian frontier fighting is the theme.

For the spring Messrs. T. and T. Clark announce an exegetical study, by Professor A. B. Bruce, of "The Epistle to the Hebrews," a companion volume to "The Kingdom of God," by the same author: a book on "I. and II. Samuel," by Mr. Henry Preserved Smith, late Professor of Hebrew at Cincinnati: and "The Theology of the New Testament," by Professor G. B. Stevens, of Lane University. For the same publishers Professor W. M. Ramsay is superintending the translation of Professor Deissmann's "Bibelstudien."

M. Molmenti, whose historical works on Venice are well known, is issuing a work entitled "Sebastiano Veniero e la Battaglia di Lepanto." Another historical work which will appear shortly in Florence is a collection of essays by Emilio Pinchia on the same subject as Madame Weil's last book, the evolution of the House of Savoy and Italian Unity.

M. Marius Vachon is preparing a monograph on the works of Jules Breton, which will contain over a hundred heliograph reproductions of Breton's principal pictures.

BOOKMEN IN PARLIAMENT.

The Parliament which meets next Tuesday has reached a period which, in all probability, entitles it to the epithet "middle aged"; and the security of its tenure of life gives it some right to be the standard by which we should judge later Victorian Parliaments, or, at any rate, those that have sprung from the new electorate of 1884. Every one has probably said, or read, that the House of Commons is less cultured than it was, and that Latin quotations were "buried with Mr. Gladstone." The fact does not really bear stating quite so broadly; and what truth there is in the indictment must find its explanation in social almost as much as in political changes. At any rate, if the comparison embraces a period of a century and a half, the change seems to correspond to a change in the fashions of society. In the days of Chesterfield, literature was fashionable. Nowadays that exponent of polite social conventions would not, we fear, find it quite so necessary for a man of fashion to know something of books; and the House of Commons, though its links with fashionable society are less than they were, is still more closely allied to it than is the case in any other democratic country, and reflects to some extent its culture, or the absence of it. But we may console ourselves for the deficiencies of the average M.P. by noting one very remarkable circumstance, which is, in Carlylean phrase, "significant of much."

Lord Rosebery, in his recent speech on Literary Statesmen, did not venture to discuss living politicians; nor would he be likely indeed to suggest the circumstance to which we allude save, in those communings with his own heart which have recently been for him almost the only form of political activity. But if he had let his mind run over the names of the gentlemen who compose Lord Salisbury's Cabinet, and those who composed the two preceding ones, he could hardly fail to be struck by two notable features of their composition. The first is that out of thirty-five ministers ten only have, or have had, any direct connection with literature either as authors or journalists. The second feature is still more worthy of attention. Two of these literary politicians have retired into private life. Of the remaining eight, three have become Prime Ministers; two have risen to be leaders of their party in the House of Commons; and a sixth, though not the leader of a party, has been so near becoming one that he has found it necessary to disclaim his candidature.

Now this may not give any ground for undue optimism. It may do little to support the belief that the democratic Parliament of to-day is, or is likely to become, as cultivated a body as the oligarchic Parliament of a century ago. But it does go to show that culture is a necessary equipment for the highest statesmanship. At one time in America there was a widespread prejudice against literary politicians, and to be learned or to possess a valuable library was almost a fatal disqualification to one who aspired to be President. And there has been something of the same feeling in England. Cobden scoffed at the study of history as part of the training of a statesman. And readers of Matthew Arnold's "Culture and Anarchy" will remember how he deals with the views of a political thinker—himself a man of the highest literary attainments—who inveighed against culture as a distinct bar to success in public life. These sentiments certainly do not represent any body of opinion at the present day, and Cobden's ideal of the purely practical businesslike statesman is now as little popular (at any rate in England) as are many of the political maxims which had much vogue when he first enunciated them. The appeal to the popular imagination made by a Cabinet Minister who has some taste of letters was enhanced, of course, by the example of Mr. Gladstone. But Mr. Gladstone himself was the product of our political system, which affords in some respects a much more favourable field for the growth of literary statesmen than other democratic Governments.

For one thing, the union of learning and politics does not by any means always take the same form. If we like a statesman to be highly cultured, to have that love of books his own lack of which Walpole so much regretted, and to show the range of his intellect by his high attainment in studies which are no more than a diversion from the main business of his life, it is by no means certain that we should regard with the same satisfaction an influx of professional politicians who happened also to be professors or journalists. The latter class is more fully represented on the Continent than the former. But in France, the only continental country completely under a democratic Parliament, men of high cultivation more and more shrink with dismay from the life of a Deputy and the troubles of his candidature—a sad result, indeed, when we think of what a Chamber of Deputies might be. If a nation famous throughout the world for its wit, its eloquence, its facile handling of facts, and its lucid exposition of principles could but place its highest intellectual representatives on the benches of its Chamber, its Parliament would be the most brilliant assemblage in the world. It is a suggestive incident that is recalled by Mr. Bodley in his “France”—that, namely, of M. de Freycinet’s reception by Professor Gréard at the Academy, when it was observed that the great speech of the occasion was made not by the statesman, but by the Professor. The United States present a parallel. Though it is easy to think of names in America, as in France, which have been distinguished alike in letters and in politics, yet, on the whole, similar causes operate in both countries to encourage the man who has risen, who has by business qualities obtained local influence, and mastered the machinery of politics, rather than the man of cultivated training and intellectual interests.

The Nation, of New York, in a review of American literary statesmen suggested by Lord Rosebery’s address, found that, “As we come down in the scale of rank of our public men, we distinctly go up in the literary scale.” The Presidents, it thought, made a poor show compared with Lord Rosebery’s Prime Ministers. This is a curious inversion of English experience. America, of course, is in the peculiar position of having no great questions of class or religion to engage the attention of Parliament, and, until lately, no international complications. For administrative purposes the man of purely commercial and local experience is all very well; as a guide in matters of higher policy, where such higher policy is needed, he is not only unsatisfactory, but may be positively dangerous. An acquaintance with social and constitutional theory, with political science as illustrated by history, the literary instinct essential both for the orator and the diplomatist, the general temper of mind which can only be attained by intellectual culture—all this the higher order of statesmanship requires, and it belongs to the literary, or, if you will, the bookish statesman. And while a politician so endowed is the least likely to err on the side of intolerance, the instances we referred to at the outset surely prove that such endowments do not disqualify him from being what in a healthy state a politician must necessarily be—a partisan.

Doubtless Mr. Hare was right in observing at the Playgoers’ Club Dinner, the other night, that no speech on the Drama would be considered quite complete without reference to the name of Ibsen. Indeed, it would appear from a certain volume which we notice elsewhere in this issue that the “newest new” play of a new English dramatist which is given to the reader before being presented to the playgoer cannot be properly introduced to the public except by a wave of the flag of Ibsen over the head of the aspirant—or, shall we say of the Ibsenite coat before the feet of the unconverted critics. Mr. Hare did not exactly tread upon this provocative garment; or, at any rate, he did not plant his foot so firmly on its tails as to commit himself to an acceptance of the challenge. He may be more correctly described, perhaps, as detaining it on its course for a moment or two by a slight pressure of his toe on one of the sleeves. “As an original genius,” he said, “I admire Ibsen; as an acting playwright I frankly detest him.”

The enthusiastic Ibsenite is, we fear, quite capable in his “high seriousness” of criticizing an after-dinner utterance as severely as if it were an extract from the most solemn of treatises on the drama; and if he takes Mr. Hare in this spirit, he will certainly invite him to explain his frank detestation of a playwright whose genius, almost exclusively displayed in dramatic writing, he admires. Such an explanation is still more likely to be demanded from a speaker who had previously admitted that Ibsen’s “realistic method has done much to reform what was artificial and false in the drama of the day,” and that “his influence on the younger school of dramatists may prove of incalculable value in making them go directly to truth and nature for their models.” It appears, in fact, to come to this, that Mr. Hare admires everything about Ibsen except his choice of subjects, and that it is because these are not to his admirer’s taste that he “frankly detests” him. That is a feeling which a good many people share with Mr. Hare, though they do not often express it with so engaging and, from the argumentative point of view, so dangerous a candour.

The growth of French interest in our literature, on which we commented last week, has had the fortunate effect of raising the general standard of translations from it. Few English readers, perhaps, are acquainted with the very inadequate versions of some English books which have found their way into print in France, though it is only fair to add that they can probably be paralleled on this side of the water. M. Augustin Filon has just explained the genesis of these inferior translations in the course of a feuilleton in the Débats.

Like Mr. Andrew Lang in our own country, that eminent critic is plagued with people who think that he possesses the “Open Sesame!” of the printing-house. M. Filon tells us that every now and then he gets a letter asking him to find work and a publisher for some young lady whose family has suddenly come down in the world, and who “knows English.” In such a case it seems that the average French girl has two resources. If she is pretty, and knows how to dress and to dance, she proposes to go on the stage; if she has had an English governess and has waltzed with a Guardsman, she desires to translate an English novel. We must all be grateful to M. Filon for the very plain terms in which he sets himself to discourage this amiable weakness.

"The wages of a road-mender for the labour of an Academician"—such is the reward which M. Filon displays in the sight of the would-be translator. It is pretty much the same here in England, where translation, when really well done, owes its being rather to the artistic ambition of the translator than to the golden lures of the publisher. Regarded from a mercenary point of view, translation can usually be regarded by the professional writer, in M. Filon's striking metaphor, merely as the raft by which he may keep himself afloat until his ship comes along. The translator who is moved to consider his "price per thou," indeed, either here or in France, must sigh for a return to the days when Latin mottoes with English versions fetched sixpence each, and Greek (as we know from Fielding) were considered "plaguy dear" at a shilling.

M. Filon is filled with respectful wonder that good translations are so numerous as they are; it is hard enough to put one's own thought into words, he says, and to undertake that task for another man is to raise literary labour to the second power. He was once asked to translate Shakespeare, but—in spite of M. François Victor-Hugo—he thinks that it would be an easier business to teach every Frenchman to read him in English. This is a noble ambition, which in English eyes should more than excuse M. Filon's blunt declaration that, nowadays, France does not care about any foreign authors.

The February Pearson's discusses—or at any rate enumerates—the amusements of contemporary men of letters. We read that Dr. Doyle plays cricket, that Miss Sarah Grand bicycles, that Mr. Frankfort Moore rows, that Mr. Andrew Lang fishes, that Mr. Zangwill rides, that Mr. Max Pemberton hunts, and much more to similar effect. It might have been added that Mr. Norman Gale earned a bat last summer by making the highest average in a Midland Cricket Club, that Mr. Morley Roberts can give a knight to most amateurs at chess, that Mr. Rudolph Lehmann was a well-known Cambridge oar before he wrote for Punch, that Mr. Leslie Stephen has made many first ascents in the Alps, that C. S. Calverley was a high jumper of more than average merit, that Byron swam the Hellespont, and that Mr. Herbert Spencer is fairly proficient at the game of billiards.

From these miscellaneous facts it is obviously difficult to draw any general conclusion. Perhaps, however, taken in conjunction with other facts for which there is no space, they may warrant the deduction that literary genius and athletic proficiency seldom go together—though academic distinction and athletic proficiency may. Mr. Norman Gale's bat and Mr. Leslie Stephen's first ascents indicate that the rule may have exceptions, but the rule seems to exist. So far as billiards may be included among athletic sports, the philosophy of the matter is summed up in a reported saying of Mr. Herbert Spencer's. "A certain address in games of skill," the author of the System of Synthetic Philosophy is said to have observed to an antagonist who had worsted him, "is an indication of a well-balanced mind. But proficiency such as you have just displayed is strong presumptive evidence of a mis-spent youth."

WEST AFRICA.

West African Studies. By Mary H. Kingsley. With Illustrations and Maps. 9½×5½in., xxiv.+639 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 21/- n.

In the Niger Country. By Harold Bindloss. With Two Maps. 9×5½in., x.+338 pp. London, 1899. Blackwood. 12/6

Mr. Harold Bindloss is singularly unfortunate. He has written a book which is at least much better reading than any of the several volumes recently published about West Africa, but the accident of its appearing at the same moment with Miss Kingsley's new volume makes it inevitable that he should be a foil to her peculiar excellence. When Mr. Bindloss writes of what he has seen with his own eyes—life and death among the mangrove swamps of the Niger delta, steamers bumping on the bars of rivers, canoes threading their way through a labyrinth of creeks—he observes well, and he writes picturesquely. When he writes from hearsay he is still picturesque, but he is so inaccurate as to lose all value. Samadu and Amadu, for instance, are not different forms of the same name, though each was a black king who made war against the French; Say is no longer the boundary-line of British and French possessions on the Niger; Samory never invaded, much less devastated, the colony of Senegal, and he is a negro, not an Arab; while it is really absurd to talk of the "battle" of Weima. In short, Mr. Bindloss tends to exaggerate, and, when he has not the evidence of his senses to go on, is perfectly untrustworthy.

Yet he writes well, often eloquently; and the impression left by his observations coincides with that given by Miss Kingsley, who never exaggerates, is laboriously accurate, and shows on every page evidence of a mass of reading. She also writes well, but Heaven forbid that we should recommend her as a model of style. Respect for established institutions is not her strong point, and she has less respect for grammar and the dictionary than for most things. We could not advise any one else to write habitually, for instance, "disassociate" for "dissociate," still less to make abrupt transitions from serious to jesting talk, or lapse into slang in the middle of a discussion upon the religious ideas of mankind; yet Miss Kingsley does all these things, and more too, and frankly the result is delightful. One feels behind the whole thing a perfect intellectual honesty, a determination to give the devil, or even the Colonial Office, his due, and a resolute endeavour to express her exact meaning, combined with the shrewdest observation and unfailing animal spirits. It is the animal spirits that make Miss Kingsley such good company in her books. She is desperately interested in everything, from the religious ideas of the African down to the statistics of liquor traffic, and her enthusiasm is contagious. You begin to feel not only that you would like to fish for catfish in mud creeks, and be upset among the crocodiles, but that you really have a longing to analyse Dutch gin and see whether it is so fiery as Exeter-hall paints it. And by interesting you and the world at large, Miss Kingsley, with her knack of being readable, is doing service to the Empire. She is accomplishing in her way what Mr. Kipling has done in his. She makes you feel (and so does Mr. Bindloss, though not to the same degree) that men of our race are doing good work out in that deadly region, taking their lives in their hands and getting little thanks for it. Miss Kingsley has a woman's admiration for the bravery of soldiers and sailors, but she holds a special brief for the trader, who is, she maintains, serving his country as well as himself, and who "hasn't got no medals nor rewards," to give him the alternative of death or glory. But for our traders we should have been without a footing on the coast at this moment, and that makes it all the harder, in Miss Kingsley's opinion, that the class who have the strongest claim to be considered there should have no control in the administration, though they provide the revenue. Trade is the most important thing in West Africa; the history of European action in West Africa is a history of trade, save in so far as it is a history of missionary endeavour, and consequently the bulk of Miss Kingsley's book is concerned with trade.

"How to make West Africa pay" would be an obvious sub-title for her work, or rather, since first and last we have made a great deal of money out of West Africa, "How to prevent West Africa from ceasing to pay." And Miss Kingsley's answer is instant and decisive—Abolish the Crown Colony system. And to the succeeding question, "What to put in place of it," she has her answer ready. The very elaborate scheme which she proposes we shall not criticise here; but its leading principles may be indicated. To govern tropical Africa so that it shall pay you must govern it in the interests of trade. If you desire trade as an end, you must desire also the means, which can only be the prosperity of the subject peoples. Africans have in their own country all the prime necessities of existence; what we can supply to them are things which progressive civilization will teach them to require, but which, if they are not prosperous, they can do without. Now, the African is not a European baby who can be taught to grow up into a European; he is a man with a definite set of ideas, especially relating to justice, capable already, as Miss Kingsley says, of attaining to a civilization like that of Europe in the thirteenth century, but incapable of being suddenly hurried over that immense gap in development within a single lifetime. Now, the Crown Colony governs the African from London on European ideas; he should be governed in Africa on African ideas. The thing has been done, and done admirably, once only in the history of Africa; it was done in the territories of the Royal Niger Company. Miss Kingsley is careful to guard against the inference that the true way to govern tropical Africa is through chartered companies; the credit of this piece of work belongs not to the system, but to Sir George Goldie, who used the system. What you want in Africa is not a system but men; not European law, but men who will go and study African law and African languages, and help in getting the country administered by Africans; who will not attempt to impose an alien civilization, but will endeavour to develop such germs of civilization as exist upon their natural lines of development. The great value in Miss Kingsley's book is that she proves the existence of this rudimentary civilization and analyses its ideas. She sets herself to find out and to explain what African law is, what are African notions of property, morals, and religion. And the great importance of her book is that we stand actually at the parting of the ways. After centuries of supineness we have begun to administer Africa. Mr. Chamberlain has not been content, as were all his predecessors, to let the machinery in existence alone; he has tried to make it work. The result has been the hut-tax war in Sierra Leone. Miss Kingsley says with justice that all previous wars in tropical Africa have been undertaken either from the religious motive of putting down barbarous customs or to revenge attacks made upon the lives or property of Englishmen or protected natives. The hut-tax war was undertaken to enforce payment of a tax imposed in total disregard of African ideas of property. Direct taxation implies, to the African mind, servitude. These people accepted protection and friendship; they find themselves treated as slaves. The great Chambers of Commerce advised the Government that trouble would certainly result; the authorities governing in Sierra Leone confidently asserted, on the other hand, that there would be none; the result has been a massacre and inevitable reprisals. Nor is that all. Hausaland is to be taken over from the Niger Company, and bitter opponents of the Company say that, bad as the Company is from their point of view, the natives will suffer by the transfer. At the bottom of the whole series of blunders is contempt for the African and absolute refusal to consider his point of view. Miss Kingsley's book will force not merely those in authority but the public in general to open its eyes and recognize that in Africa they are dealing, not with a set of vicious children, but with men who have a code of conduct and a conception of justice quite as definite as the Europeans, and not less well observed.

It has seemed better to emphasize here the importance of Miss Kingsley's book rather than to attempt any analysis of her results. One may instance, however, her correction of the popular belief that women count for nothing in Africa. An African's strongest attachment is to his mother; women lose no right to their property by marriage; and the influence of the women is everywhere thrown strongly against European ideas. Missionaries, who often do not learn African languages nor attempt to understand with African ideas, have never as a body realized this; nor have they, with rare exceptions, endeavoured to touch the religious ideas which embody themselves in the various forms of fetish. Miss Kingsley has, in this volume, arranged her views on the subject, and this will be, not only to ethnologists but to many readers, the most interesting part of the book. This, however, is a special matter that can hardly be discussed at length here in the last paragraph of a review. There is only space left to speak of the opening chapters to her book which supplement the narrative of her travels.

These are, of course, much lighter in tone than the rest. Her chapter on fishing is very cheerful reading, but we blush to think of the methods which Miss Kingsley prefers. She draws the line at poisoning the water, but we should be sorry to trust her with a landing-net near a weir that salmon were running up, and if she ever got a chance of tickling trout she has probably done it. African fish, to judge from her description of their formidable fins, would be awkward creatures to tickle. The account of her voyage outward, and the education freely afforded to new hands by old coasters, is full of the grim humour which these death traps seem to produce; and there is a very funny story of a heroic rescue from driver ants. Here is a characteristic description of the "stupendous sweeps of monotonous landscape so characteristic of Africa":—

From Sherboro' river to Cape Mount, viewed from the sea, every mile looks as like the next as peas in a pod, and should a cruel fate condemn you to live ashore here in a factory you get so used to the eternal sameness that you automatically believe that nothing else but this sort of world, past, present, or future, can ever have existed; and that cities and mountains are but the memories of dreams. A more horrible life than a life in such a region for a man who never takes to it it is impossible to conceive; for a man who does take to it, it is a kind of dream life. I am judging from the few men I have met who have been stationed here in the few isolated little factories that are established. Some of them look like haunted men, who, when they are among white men again, cling to their society: others are lazy, dreamy men, rather bored by it.

And here is a curious parallel from Mr. Bindloss, in whose book many memories of many countries jostle each other, for he is plainly one of the wanderers:—

When you have once moved among his kind there is no mistaking the man who has dwelt far apart in the lonely bush. As it is beneath the great redwoods of the far North-West, so it is in the steamy tropics and under the feathery palms. There is something in this man's gaze which differs from the rest of his fellows, his hearing grows keener, and he generally seems to be listening for something, as though every sound were significant. Often he has learned to think aloud, perhaps for the mere sake of hearing a human voice, and at various times and places you may hear him talking half-audibly to himself. But, perhaps, the most curious effect of such a life is the way he lies awake the greater portion of every night. One man I dwelt with in the midst of a great cedar forest in British Columbia used to ramble through the bush until it was nearly dawn. The same thing characterizes many primitive peoples, as it does most of the wilder beasts and birds, and in our own islands you may hear curlew, snipe, and dottrel crying all night long. I do not believe the Krooby is ever really sound asleep in the darkness, though he can slumber well enough when he should be at work by day; and I have seen the same thing as far away as the Siwash of British Columbia and the Kaloshians of Alaska. Possibly there is something in their nature akin to that of the fiercer beasts, or it is the smell of the earth and trees which leads even a white man back to the ways of ancestors who died in times far off at the beginning of things.

MORE LITERARY DRAMA.

Mr. George Moore is a writer of much vivacity and a critic of an amusing dogmatism, and the combination of these two qualities naturally makes for the entertainment of the reader. In his introduction to THE HEATHER FIELD AND MAEVE, by Edward Martyn (Duckworth, 5s.), we have him at his liveliest, "forming and expressing," like Mrs. Wittitler, "a vast variety of opinions on a vast variety of subjects." He tells us, in his opening sentence, that "many things are involved in the publication of this volume"; and he is right. "Le Théâtre Libre" is involved, and "its echo in England, 'the Independent Theatre,'" also. Ibsen, Mr. George Alexander, and Mr. William Archer are involved; and the "New Century Theatre," and the "Irish Literary Theatre," which Mr. W. B. Yeats is about to start, and "the normal intelligence of theatrical audiences in France and England." This is a lengthy concatenation, and perhaps it would hardly hold together if Mr. Moore did not piece it out with an occasional link from his abundant store of preferences and aversions. He is as good as his word, however, about this variety of involved topics. They are all in it. He puts the Théâtre Libre on the back, and "sits on" the Independent Theatre; he extols Ibsen to the skies as the greatest dramatist since Shakespeare; rallies Mr. Alexander on his refusal of The Heather Field; and twits Mr. Archer with his "benevolent insincerity" in forcing admiration for dramatic work which Mr. Moore does not happen to think admirable. Then he ridicules the management of the "New Century Theatre" and gives a "send-off" to the Irish Literary Theatre with the announcement that The Heather Field will be performed on its stage on alternate nights with Mr. W. B. Yeats' play of The Countess Cathleen. When to these we add that, besides the persons and institutions "involved in the publication" of Mr. Martyn's two plays, Mr. Pinero, Mr. Henry James, M. Sardou, M. Rostand, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, the late Sir Edward Burne-Jones, Mr. B. W. Leader, Mr. George R. Sims, and the authors of Admiral Guinea come in either by name or by unmistakable allusion for a rap from Mr. Moore's shillelagh, it will be seen that readers of this Introduction have plenty of fun for their money. Indeed, we cannot remember any recent exercise in criticism more divertingly animated throughout by the immortal counsel given by one of the author's countrymen in his "introduction" of a novice to Donnybrook Fair:—"Wherever you see a head, hit it."

Of course, the most interesting—perhaps because it is the only relevant one of the many controversies which Mr. Moore directly raises or incidentally suggests—is that which he has since been waging with Mr. Archer in one of the morning papers. He complains that "even discussion" did not help Mr. Archer to understand that The Heather Field, on which Mr. Moore elsewhere bestows the most enthusiastic, not to say extravagant, eulogies, was "the first play written in English inspired by the example of Ibsen"; to which Mr. Archer has replied, in substance, that whether The Heather Field is or is not inspired by the aforesaid example—and it is surely impossible for any human being to doubt it—it suffered from the disadvantage of being simply not good enough for early production on the Experimental Stage. This is comic but embarrassing, for when two of the leading doctors of Ibsenism in this country thus violently disagree, who is to decide? All we can say for our own part is that Mr. Martyn's play not only strikes us as a pure piece of imitation-Ibsen from beginning to end—in motive, character, and dialogue—but that to our benighted judgment it appears quite as good as many specimens of the great original. Carden Tyrrell, the visionary landowner, who—as if the mere contemplation of his rents were not sufficient exercise for the imaginative faculty of an Irish squire—is ruining himself with loans and mortgages in an imprudent attempt to reclaim unprofitable moor land to cultivation, might have stepped straight out of Ibsen. So might his sympathetic but wiser fellow landlord Barry Usher, and his affectionate younger brother, Miles. Mrs. Tyrrell is simply the eternal, uncongenial, sternly practical wife of Ibsenite drama. Her attempt to get her husband pronounced insane by two medical men—an episode which, in the hands of a dramatist who was not pledged to avoid anything like strong dramatic interest, might have made the fortune of the play—is frittered away in the well-known perverse fashion of the Master, and there is all his characteristic flatness in his final "curtain" which is brought about by Usher's exclamation:—"The wild heath has broken out again in the heather field." As to the dialogue, it is written throughout in that strain of resolute commonplace, and diversified here and there by that symbolism of the obvious, which goes straight to the heart of the Ibsen worshipper. No doubt for stage purposes it is all the better for that, as the Norwegian dramatist has often shown; but to literature proper, whose business it is to transfigure the commonplace, it stands related much as the tale of Betty Foy stands related to the best Wordsworthian sonnets, or to the Ode on the Intimations of Immortality. Nevertheless its production at the Irish Literary Theatre, and still more that of Mr. Yeats' exquisite fairy poem The Countess Cathleen, to all appearances absolutely unsuited for dramatic representation, will be a highly interesting experiment, the issue of which we shall await with no little curiosity.

Additions to two "theatres," widely differing, as Mr. Moore so disdainfully insists, from that of Ibsen, have appeared simultaneously with Mr. Martyn's tentative publication of his as yet unrepresented play. The "theatre," of Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, indeed, is advancing rapidly towards completion. Eight of his plays have already been published. The two now before us, THE MASQUERADERS and THE ROGUE'S COMEDY (Macmillan, 2s. 6d. each), have varied singularly in their theatrical fortunes. Not many of its author's works have exceeded the former in temporary popularity, nor has he often—perhaps never, if we except "The Triumph of the Philistines"—more completely failed to hit the taste of his public than with the latter. To those who are familiar with the conditions of the stage this diversity of fates will appear explicable enough from a perusal of the two plays; but—alas! for the purpose with which our dramatists are soliciting the attention of the reading public—the explanation has little or no reference to literature. The Rogue's Comedy presumably owed much of its unpopularity to the tenuity of the "love interest." The success of The Masqueraders was assured by one highly-exciting but violently melodramatic scene at the close of the third act. But, considered on their strictly literary merits, the quality of the less pretentious comedy, in which are set forth the grandeur and the downfall of the clairvoyant charlatan, Mr. Bailey Prothero, appears to us distinctly superior to that of the sentimental melodrama, in which David Renon and Dulcie Larondie play the principal parts. One cannot help wondering which of the two Mr. Moore would regard as the more literary—or the less unliterary—and which of them seems to him the more defiant of the influence of the greatest dramatic genius since Shakespeare.

Two or three of Mr. Pinero's plays—not those, perhaps, which have pleased most on the stage—have stood the test of publication pretty successfully. We fear, however, that TRELAWNEY OF THE WELLS (Heinemann, 2s. 6d.) will not add to their number. Its humours are essentially of the kind which depend for their diverting power on the grotesque in character and action; and without their assistance the written record of them is too often apt to read like mere foolery and clowning. Mr. Ablett and Mrs. Mossop, for instance, and the company of the Bagnigge Wells Theatre appear simply impossible figures on the printed page. They require to have the footlights in front of them and the “flats” behind them to make them credible at all. Even as it is, however, their effect upon a reader is less disconcerting than that of Vice-Chancellor Sir William Gower, Knt., and Miss Trafalgar Gower, his sister. Here presumably Mr. Pinero was aiming at strict realistic truth, and not giving the rein to his agreeable fancy; and it may be that the actor and actress to whom these two parts were allotted contrived on the stage to tone them down into some sort of semblance to the social types which they are supposed to represent. But as offered to us in these pages the judicial magnate is really as bizarre a figure in his drawing-room in Cavendish-square as any one of the company of Bohemian players who assemble at Mr. and Mrs. Telfer's at Brydon-crescent, Clerkenwell. He is surely a caricature, not only of the character but of the period, of which, by the way, Mr. Pinero's comparative youth makes it impossible for him to have had adult experience. No doubt there was less freedom of manners in the early sixties than there is now; but the “domestic interior” of a Vice-Chancellor in those days would not—unless he was a very exceptional Vice-Chancellor—quite so closely resemble, in its Puritanic prudery and primness, the back parlour of a small Nonconformist tradesman. And where is Mr. Pinero's authority for this strange old gentleman's pronunciation? Elderly people in those days did not say “aweer” and “cheer” for “aware” and “chair,” to the best of our recollection, though some of them did say “goold” for “gold.” Nor was “obleege” for “oblige” a then surviving form, even if it ever existed generally. Indeed, it was regarded as so essentially an idiosyncrasy of the late Lord Russell that he was habitually rallied upon it in the comic papers till the day of his death.

LORD BRAMWELL.

Some Account of George William Wilshire, Baron Bramwell of Hever. By Charles Fairfield. 9×6 in., 382 pp. London, 1898. Macmillan. 10/- n.

Any life, good, bad, or indifferent, of Lord Bramwell is certain to be welcomed. So striking was his personality, so strong his influence, so much flavour all its own was there about what he said and did, that he is likely long to remain a figure of interest to his countrymen. Mr. Fairfield did not know him; and that is a disadvantage from which his book, from first to last, seriously suffers. Mr. Fairfield is not, we should surmise, a lawyer—his inaccurate references to the Circuits and some other slight mistakes prove as much—and that also is a drawback in the biographer of one who was above all things a great master of the common law. Nor is the book written with the clearness of expression, the directness of thought, which were characteristic of Lord Bramwell, who probably never uttered an obscure sentence in the course of his long life. But Mr.

Fairfield has been industrious; he is a sincere admirer of Lord Bramwell; he writes fluently and cleverly; and, besides giving an interesting sketch of the life of the Judge, he has drawn freely from pamphlets, letters by “B.,” and judgments relating to subjects of living interest. These extracts and Mr. Fairfield's commentary will enable the reader to understand Lord Bramwell's way of looking at the problems upon which, in his later years, his thoughts ran. We are grateful to Mr. Fairfield for bringing to light again some of the vigorous letters, masterpieces of incisive good sense, which used to appear in The Times under the once familiar signature “B.” It may do this age good to look, even for a short time, at the world as he looked at it.

He believed that every man was the best judge of his own interests. Above all things, he prized manly self-reliance and liberty. No one, not even Herbert Spencer, has in our time more consistently and vigorously maintained the individualist theory of life. No one disliked more the various legislative devices by which the weak contrive to lean upon the strong and the unscrupulous to shuffle off responsibility for their misconduct. And yet this zealous defender of liberty and property was heard often to admit that every good man had at one time of his life been a Socialist. “I am a bit of a Socialist myself,” he once remarked to the late Mr. Newmarch. Though popularly supposed to be a “hanging Judge,” and undoubtedly stern towards all criminals guilty of brutality, he had a kind heart easily touched by a tale of true distress and a hand open to appeals from the unfortunate. Mr. Fairfield gives an example of the susceptibility of a Judge who was thought by those who did not know him to be all for “blood and iron,” the lash, and solitary confinement. A woman was tried before him for the murder of her husband. She was guilty; but it came out that for years she had suffered cruelly from his brutality. The end of the story is thus told by Mr. Fairfield:—

When he came to sum up, Sir George Bramwell related to the jury the old woman's life and treatment. By degrees the misery and pathos of the story was too much for him: he put his hands before his face and burst into tears. Recovering himself in a minute or two, he warned the jury to banish from their minds that irrelevancy in his charge. They thereupon found the old woman guilty. She died within a day or two in gaol. “I can't think,” said Baron Bramwell afterwards to a friend who saw those tears, “how I came to make such a fool of myself.”

Let us add one instance to those given in these pages of Lord Bramwell's conscientious care to administer justice with no needless severity. Shortly after he returned to town from his first Circuit a friend said to him:—“I have seen again and again in the papers, ‘Baron Bramwell proceeded to sentence the prisoner to penal servitude.’ Do you know what penal servitude means?” “In a general way I do,” was the answer. “But have you any clear idea what suffering you have been inflicting?” “No, I cannot say I have,” was the answer. So much did Lord Bramwell take to heart this conversation that, at the earliest opportunity, he made a prolonged visit to a great many prisons in London and the country, spending, in company with a friend, many days in studying the treatment of prisoners. Lord Bramwell was “ever a fighter.” As his biographer says, “his way of taking his holiday—of enjoying that leisure which he had surely earned—was to ‘descend into the street,’ as French rhetoricians say, to take his chance like the humblest volunteer in the bodyguard of truth.” But he had the true humanity, as well as the courage, of the soldier.

Round Lord Bramwell gathered naturally a mass of legends as to his sayings and doings. He could not try an important case or make an after-dinner speech without letting fall some pithy saying which “caught on.” He never did even the most commonplace work of a Judge without importing into it a strain of originality. We wish that Mr. Fairfield had told us more of the stories which still circulate as to the great Baron. The book repeats only a few, and these by no means the best available. Here is a glimpse of him as he might be seen any day in the Long Vacation at Edenbridge:—

One spring day in the year 1889 the local constable at Edenbridge noticed Lord Bramwell intently watching a noisy group of village boys, apparently much excited about something. It was the first day of the cricket season, and they were, in fact, drawing up rules for their cricket club. Fancying they might have annoyed the old lord in some way, the constable approached, and asked whether such was the case.

"No, no," said Lord Bramwell; "those lads have been teaching me something—how the Common Law was invented."

The constable considered this a remarkable proof of juvenile precocity, and observed:

"It's wonderful what they do learn at school nowadays, my lord—over-education, I call it."

Lord Bramwell kept up a large correspondence with the most diverse classes of persons; this volume gives only an inadequate idea of the people who consulted him on subjects far remote from his ordinary occupations and who obtained his aid and advice, no matter how much immersed in business he might happen to be. A few interesting samples of his correspondence are quoted; for example, extracts from letters by the late Lord Coleridge, in which he expresses his admiration of Bishop Butler and defends the reasoning of the "Analogy," and some letters of the late Chief Baron Pollock, who, while on Circuit, never failed to correspond with his colleague. Lord Bramwell delighted in plain statement; Mr. Robert Lowe, too, liked calling a spade a spade; and when the former joined with his brother Judges in protesting against the transfer to them of the duty of trying election petitions, Mr. Lowe, in a letter which is quoted, replied in a style which Lord Bramwell might well mistake for his own:—"You don't like the job because it is full of anger and discord. My butler might just as reasonably object to carry the urn because it is hot."

Lord Bramwell was the last person to talk of style; and he always spoke very modestly of his letters and pamphlets. "I only say what other people say a little later," was his own account of his gifts as a writer. But the extracts from his letters to The Times and some of his judgments leave no doubt that he had a genius for the art of expression. There is much more studied art in Paul Louis Courier, and we are not going to compare Lord Bramwell as a literary artist with the prince of pamphleteers, the many-sided, richly-equipped master of colloquial eloquence. But not Paul Louis Courier or Cobbett could make subtle ideas look more simple or homely. There is no rhetoric, only argument; but it all stands out as clear as if it were a first-rate fable or a series of pithy proverbs.

The portrait prefixed to the volume is far from successful. It gives no idea of the genial, humorous smile which often played about the rugged features. It is some compensation to have the following fairly accurate sketch of Lord Bramwell as he appeared in later years:—

He was a big, burly man, sound and strong; never had any of those ailments which induce a man to pity himself, and make cures, systems of diet, and so on, important everyday questions. All his life he was an early riser, a habit which is probably quite as much an effect as a cause of physical and nervous healthiness; after he was fifty years of age he generally went to bed at ten o'clock, and could sleep nine hours on a stretch. On fine summer mornings he would leave his bed room at six o'clock, carrying his coat and waistcoat over his arm. On the stairs he usually finished tying his neckcloth, at the breakfast-room door put on his coat. At Edenbridge and in Cadogan-place, if there were no guests and the weather was hot, he would sit at table in his shirt-sleeves—the servants, no doubt, shocked and awed, for he inspired awe. Coat or no coat, he always had that emphatic, kingly air and manner—nowadays all but extinct—which one fancies the figures in some of the old historic portraits must have had.

Mr. Fairfield's running comment on Lord Bramwell's opinions is often epigrammatic and always clever. It is often also a little irritating by reason of its plentiful innuendoes—never very spiteful, to be sure—against persons who happened to differ from Lord Bramwell. But we forgive much to a writer who occasionally gives us glimpses such as these of the real nature of the man whom he describes:—

When on Circuit, the moment the Court rose, the Baron would be off on a ramble, spying out the objects of interest in the neighbourhood. He was an insatiable walker, and mountain climber of the amateur kind; few men knew rural England better than he; never read in a railway-carriage; would say to his travelling companion, "Do put down that newspaper and look at the country we are passing through." An immense, child-like faith in the infallibility of the Ordnance Map was one of his orthodox failings, and often led him into adventures which amused him vastly; he always took with him a section of the Ordnance Map belonging to the particular circuit he was on, and would insist, as against the oldest inhabitant, that wherever a road was marked on the map, there a horse and trap could go. Occasionally it turned out that the official road had never been quite made—had been closed or abandoned for years. In consequence he more than once landed himself and his travelling companions, late at night, at the end of a sheep-track on a desolate Yorkshire moor, twenty miles from the assize town.

THE BAYREUTH PILGRIM.

Mr. Bernard Shaw is as amusing as ever in THE PERFECT WAGNERITE (Sonnenschein, 6s.). Wagner, it is well known, was a political revolutionary, and an attempt to explain the allegory of "The Ring" in the light of his political opinions is here made by Mr. Shaw. We notice that in last week's Critic he replies to some criticisms of his book and speaks contemptuously of the many guide books to "The Ring," which he believes have coloured the impressions of his reviewers.

The compilers of these books [he says] profess to pick out from the score of 'The Ring' the representative themes, and present them, duly sorted, docketed, and labelled for the instruction of Bayreuth pilgrims, who buy them and read them piously. . . . First they not only quote the themes, but invent trivially sentimental titles for them, to the confusion of the pilgrim, who finds that the theme and its meaning undergo all sorts of modifications, while the spurious label remains woodenly invariable throughout.

Here Mr. Shaw shows much solicitude for the pilgrim, who will doubtless do well to bear in mind the "modifications," which "the theme and its meaning undergo." But it is doubtful how far the most original part of Mr. Shaw's book—his reflections upon the meaning of the allegory of "The Ring"—will be of any real assistance to the Bayreuth pilgrim. It is open to question whether it is not better to leave people to plumb the mysteries of an allegory for themselves, especially when they are presented in the form of a music drama. An idea which is conveyed through the medium of poetry and music loses some of its persuasiveness when these subtle mediators are withdrawn. Again, "The Ring" is an allegory, and an allegory of universal significance. If too much stress is laid upon its local and contemporary bearings it is apt to become more of a satire than an allegory, and ephemeral instead of for all time.

The danger is still greater when, for the music and poetry which envelop the ideas of Wagner, a Fabian commentary half serious half jocose is substituted by a writer who deliberately assumes the rôle of satirist. But it is only for the Bayreuth pilgrim that we fear—lest he should look to Mr. Shaw for his staff and scrip before setting out on his journey to the shrine. To the reader who is not a pilgrim the book will be full of amusement. Sometimes he will laugh with, sometimes at, the writer, but throughout he will be amazed at the astonishing ingenuity with which Mr. Shaw discovers the principal actors in the industrial struggles of to-day behind the mask of the heroes, giants, and gods of the Nibelungen Ring. Mr. Shaw has a particularly strong pair of opera glasses. The two giants, Fasolt and Fafnir, are fighting for the Ring. By the help of his lorgnette they become the "brutalised toilers" of to-day, "honest fellows enough until their betters betrayed them." Again, the giants have built a palace for the gods and demand their promised reward in vain. Mr. Shaw has his lorgnette upon them. The scene is in an instant transferred to the modern stage. It is no longer the wrath of the giant who longs in vain for the goddess Freia, but the "noble rage" of the worker on making the discovery that "his betters are corrupt, greedy, and treacherous."

Such are the scenes which Mr. Shaw weaves into the old world tapestry of "The Ring." In a sense they, no doubt, to a certain extent, reflect Wagner's own thoughts. But in his completed work he was carried far beyond the realm of satire. It is owing to Mr. Shaw's attempt to snatch us from the ideal world of the poet and musician back again to the sordid material of actual life that his book is more suited to the cynic than to the pilgrim. He is truculent where Wagner is romantic. Some of his illustrations of the meaning of the text will be, to say the least of it, distressing to the pilgrim the next time he takes his seat at a performance of "The Ring." He will have Mr. Shaw beside him to whisper in his ear that the magic helmet which Alberic is putting on in order to assume what shape he pleases is nothing more than the modern tall hat, which disguises a man as "a shareholder, a subscriber to hospitals"; and that Alberic, the giants, and the mine itself are nothing less than the capitalist, the labourers, and the match factory. At each whisper he will become more and more unable to appreciate the wider significance of the allegory, the unworldly character of the music, and the legendary beauty of the drama.

THREE CENTURIES OF SPANISH HISTORY.

Spain: its Greatness and Decay, 1479-1788. By Martin S. Hume. 7½ x 5½ in., x. + 460 pp. Cambridge, 1898. University Press. 6/-

Major Martin Hume begins his preface by a sentence which will have the approval of every fit reader:—"The mere relation of the events of history adds but little to the stock of useful knowledge, unless it enables us to apply the experience of the past to the conduct of the present, and so to avoid for our own time some of the errors into which previous generations have fallen." The mere relation of events is what Dr. Johnson called old almanac, and is indeed highly unprofitable. If Major Hume and his colleague, Mr. Armstrong, who writes an introduction, have not always succeeded in avoiding this bare narrative, the overcrowding of their pages can be accounted for, we presume, by the fact that the book is meant to be used in places where examinations are passed.

According to a now prevailing custom, this book is the work of two hands. Mr. Armstrong contributes the introduction, which is a sketch of Spanish history from the conquest of Granada to the resignation of Charles V., with the help of a paragraph here and there from his colleague. Major Martin Hume then takes up the story with the accession of Philip II. and carries it on to 1788. We should have liked to see him carry the history further or stop it sooner. The decay of Spain did not end in that year. Besides, the period between the accession of Philip V. and the death of Charles III. was one not of decay but of revival. The true stopping-place would have been the death of Charles the Bewitched, the last of the Spanish Hapsburgs. If this division had been preferred, he would then have had an opportunity, which his knowledge would have qualified him to use, to tell the story of "the declination of a Monarchy." There are few more interesting in themselves or less worked. From a reference which Major Martin Hume makes to the correspondence of Philip IV. with Sor Maria de Agreda, it is clear that he knows where to go for evidence as to the inward and spiritual things which do more to make the history of a people intelligible than any amount of "old almanac" about wars of the Valtellina, revolts of Naples, fights in Flanders, diplomatic schemes, and so forth, instructive as these things are when you can get the workings of human nature and the causes of success and defeat fully explained. However—dis aliter visum—the Cambridge University Press wanted another thing—namely, a sketch of Spanish history from the accession of Philip II. to 1788. If the result is a certain amount of congestion and some omission, the fault must not be laid only at the door of the authors.

The minute reviewer could find slips, both in Mr. Armstrong's share of the book, and in Major Hume's. The first, for example, calls Diego de Mendoza, who was the Emperor's representative at the Council of Trent, an ecclesiastic, which he was not, while his colleague says that we took St. Vincent and St. Lucia from the Spaniards, whereas we took them from the French. Much is made by them of the bad financial and commercial system of Spain as causes of her ruin. Yet the French were not much if at all better; but France was not ruined. Major Martin Hume seems to see the real cause of the mischief in "the transmission of unrestrained power from father to son." It is an explanation we have a traditional inclination to accept. And yet the immense development of the royal authority which came at the end of the middle ages was common to Spain with all her continental neighbours, and not unknown to us. But nowhere did a nation go the road followed by Spain. Something is needed to complete the explanation, and we venture to suggest that it is a clear comprehension of the character of the Spaniards, their passions, the turn of their intelligence, the things they take for granted, their strength and their weakness.

But the work is, on the whole, very well done. The important thing is that a great deal of information is given about parts of Spanish history of which English readers commonly know little enough, and events are carefully and accurately chronicled, while Major Martin Hume is very full and clear in his account of the "alcabalas" and other barbarous financial devices of the Hapsburg dynasty. We can, therefore, recommend this little volume as a text-book, and we hope that Major Hume will, some day, have a chance of dealing with Philip III., Philip IV., and Charles II. on terms more satisfactory to his reader and, we are sure, to himself.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The issue of a third edition of THE COMING OF LOVE (Lane, 5s. n.) gives Mr. Watts-Dunton an opportunity of explaining the genesis of "Aylwin." Quoting from our issue of Oct. 29, he says:—

One of my most generous critics has said of "The Coming of Love" that, "although published earlier than 'Aylwin,' it is a sequel to the novel." And a sequel it is; so far, at least, as an important character in "Aylwin" is concerned—Rhona Boswell—though between "Aylwin" and "The Coming of Love" another story intervenes.

One of the most interesting parts of the preface is the expansion of the distinction between the two Aylwins with regard to Romany women. Henry Aylwin's feeling was the very opposite of Percy's. Henry's sympathies were like Borrow's:—

Supposing Borrow to have been physically drawn with much power towards any woman, could she possibly have been Romany? Would she not rather have been of the Scandinavian type?—would she not have been what he used to call a "Brynild"? From many conversations with him on this subject, I think she would have been a tall blonde, of the type of Isopel Berners—who, by-the-by, was much more a portrait of a splendid East Anglian road-girl than is generally imagined.

Percy, on the other hand, is of the type that is strongly attracted by the unique physical attractions of a Romany girl like Sini Lovell: and for the difference there is no accounting, "as there is no accounting for anything connected with the mysterious witchery of sex." In a note on "Christmas at the Mermaid" Mr. Watts-Dunton states that recent discussion has fortified him in the opinion that the friend of Shakespeare to whom the sonnets are addressed cannot be identified. In any case, so thinks the critic, to be a friend of Shakespeare a man must be a lover of nature and a lover of England. We hope this is an accurate description of the "obscure stationer, William Hall," in whom Mr. Sidney Lee finds the "only begetter" of the sonnets.

The latest addition to the Eversley Series is an EVERSLEY SHAKESPEARE (Macmillan). It is admirably printed and bound, and is to be in ten volumes at 5s. per volume. The scope of the edition is explained in the introduction, thus:—

A detailed critical apparatus would have been foreign to the aims of this edition; textual notes have as a rule been limited to the two purposes of specifying important departures from the old texts, and, where the old texts are incorrigibly corrupt, of indicating the least unlikely conjectures. The bulk of the notes are intended to provide, in the briefest possible form, such information as may smooth the reader's path without insulting his intelligence.

These notes, which are refreshingly few, as well as the introductions, which are conveniently short, are contributed by Dr. Herford, of the University College of Wales, Aberystwith.

TOPOGRAPHY.

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN NORTH WALES.—Mr. A. G. Bradley, who has braved alike the terrors of the Welsh mountains and the Welsh language in his journey through the "Highways and Byways in North Wales" (Macmillan, 6s.), has managed to collect a very pretty store of anecdotes, traditions, and historical reminiscences relating to an interesting though comparatively little known corner of Great Britain. Here, for example, is a tale which throws a good deal of light on the manners of the Welsh clergy at the beginning of the century:—

"Your uncle was a saintly man, indeed," said a very old Welsh peasant to a clergyman of my acquaintance some twenty years ago, alluding to the rector of a Llyn parish about the time of Waterloo. "I never saw him drunk, even on Pwllheli market days."

The story might be paralleled by the anecdote of the South Wales parson, asked by his Bishop if he had ever been to the University. "No, my lord," the clergyman replied, "but I've been to Bristol fair." Mr. Bradley is, on the whole, favourably impressed by the character of the people of North Wales. He found them sober, though with a pleasant feeling for cwre, hardworking, and polite, and he notes with especial satisfaction that all the efforts of the sour land-agitators have not taken from the popular heart the old respect for "the squire." There is, of course, something to be said for the case of the Devil's Advocate. As a result of the Erastianism of the last century, which made a Welsh bishopric the reward of political "dirty work," the Welsh Church became impossible to the emotional Welshman, and the succeeding régime of Calvinistic Methodism has made Wales, and especially North Wales, perhaps the most provincial of all provinces. To the average villager the doings of the local ministers are of infinitely greater import than the doings of the Imperial Ministry, and Mr. Bradley is no doubt right in thinking that, the Church and Chapel question once removed, politics would practically cease to exist for the mass of the people. We must note that, while the author has diligently traced the steps of Borrow through North Wales, he has forgotten that De Quincey wandered also through those wilds; Llanystumdwy, for instance, mentioned by Mr. Bradley, is also mentioned though strangely mis-spelt, in one of the most picturesque chapters of the "Confessions." Peacock, too, dealt largely in Welsh culture and Welsh scenery, and it is curious that Mr. Bradley, who tells the story of Elphin, seems unaware of the existence of the "Misfortunes of Elphin," Peacock's masterpiece, as a few believe. "Headlong Hall" also was in North Wales, and there, amidst the mountains, Miss Touchandgo met Mr. Chainmail, the medieval enthusiast of "Crochet Castle," though Mr. Bradley makes no allusion to any of these delightful histories. Mr. Hugh Thomson has done some excellent and characteristic figure-pieces for the book, but in Mr. Pennell's landscapes the well-known skill of the artist wants a larger canvas.

Guide-books and local histories may be roughly divided into two classes—interesting but inaccurate, and accurate but dull. GLIMPSES OF A BEDFORDSHIRE VILLAGE, by Mr. W. Steward (Beds Publishing Company), a sketch of the growth and vicissitudes of Harrold or Harewold in Bedfordshire, belongs to neither species: it is both accurate and interesting. The author has gone to the proper sources—Domesday, the Hundred Rolls, Harvey's History of the Willey Hundred, Seeborn, "Social England," and the rest—but that does not necessarily mean a charming result. Yet Mr. Steward's chapters are in their way delightful, and the reason is that he has not written for visitors or tourists, but for the villagers themselves. Hence he was obliged to absorb his materials thoroughly before presenting them in a popular and intelligible form to a country audience. Here and there, of course, he grins through a horse-collar, after the fashion of medieval Harroldites, to tickle his yokels, and sometimes he moralizes (or "pijaws," as schoolboys say), yet with a sense of humour and insight into the life and conditions of primitive villagedom. We are not given too much of Roman coins, &c., though we observe that "the Classical Master" of Bedford Grammar School has aided in the deciphering of a Roman seal for the apothecary's pot of ointment. The best chapters deal with feudal Harrold, and for a brief, elementary, but very clear and graphic picture of what the feudal plan meant in a village a schoolboy might do worse than "mug up" Mr. Steward's pages. We wonder whether it will occur to the authorities at the Bedford schools that history may be better taught by a local instance like this than by general text-books just dipped into at odd periods twice a week. We should not set the boys the Latin of the Rolls as a specimen of "comp.," however, especially as it is rather badly misprinted here, but there is enough besides in this little volume to interest them. Indeed, it is full of odd touches. There is an amiable periwig maker, by name Forty Aresum (which should make the fortune of a novelist), who came from Wellingborough, with a proper certificate of migration, to settle opportunely in Harrold just when periwigs were going out of fashion, and who, finding that even county family pigtails did not pay as well as periwigs, took to mending the church clock and such other clocks as Harrold possessed. It was not a lucrative profession, however, when the village had a businesslike churchwarden who got the clock cleaned and kept going for 2s. 6d. a year. The bellringers had a better time of it: they were paid 5s. for joy peals on the report of Tom Paine's execution, and when it was found that he had not been executed after all, the 5s. had been drunk. Mr. Steward says this was in 1792, when Paine was in France; but that visit began in December, 1793, so we presume he means 1793-94. For the Battle of the Nile the ringers were regaled to the tune of 12s. 6d. The official mole-killer, on the other hand, was paid by the year, £2, caught he never so many: now he gets 2d. a mole. The mill of Harrold was put at "36s. 8d. and 200 eels" in Domesday. One suspects that Gilbert de Blosseville of the "gret house" wished the miller would catch him a more varied diet. There is a pretty tale told by Layton to Cromwell about the suppressed Austin priory at Harrold: how "my lord Mordant dwelling nygh the saide howse intyessed the young nunnes to breke up the cofer whereon the covent seale was; Sir John Mordant, his eldyeste son, then present ther, perswading them to the same, caused the prioress and hir folyashe yong floke to seale a wryting in Latten," which the foolish young flock could not read, nor the prioress neither. But what the "Latten" was about is left a delicious mystery; the poor, skittish young nunnes got their deserts from King Hal in 1536, and now not a stone of their priory remains.

Mr. J. Arthur Gibbs has given us a delightful book, full of country air and vernal sounds with a pleasant literary sub-flavour, in A COTSWOLD VILLAGE (London: Murray, 10s. 6d.). In its pages he has admirably painted the characteristics, both human and other, of that vast tract of hill country, with Cirencester for capital, which stretches "from Broadway to Bath, and from Birdlip to Burford." Mr. Gibbs begins by describing the Manor-house, "nestling amid a wealth of stately trees," in a fashion which paints it to our eyes as clearly and as pleasantly as Mr. Austin has done for the garden that he loves. Then comes a long and picturesque account of the neighbouring village and its people, in which one seems to see the affection of Kingsley for the west country mingled with the intimate comprehension of Richard Jefferies. Mr. Gibbs next takes us out into the open; we follow the hounds with him and wander by a trout-stream, where, as Stevenson said, the lesson of contentment may be got by root of heart. The rustic sports follow, and there is a most amusing chapter on village cricket. Then, greatly daring, Mr. Gibbs follows Mr. Justice Madden and Mr. Richmond Roy, and shows us Shakespeare hunting on Cotswold, where Master Shallow observes that "good sportsmen are ever welcome." The latter part of the book is devoted to birds and beasts, flowers and trees, and the other dumb inhabitants of the country, to whom so much of our rural pleasure is due. We are glad to come across the full version of "George Ridler's Oven," a song known far and wide from the snatches of it given in "Two Years Ago." We can commend "A Cotswold Village" to all readers of healthy tastes; it brings a most refreshing breath of the country among our smoky skies and muddy streets.

Miss Margaret Stokes is an honorary member of the Royal Irish Academy, and her name is familiar to antiquarians. A special value attaches, therefore, to the monograph which she has published on THE HIGH CROSSES OF CASTLEDERMOT AND BURROW (Dublin, Academy House, 21s. n.). An introductory chapter gives a full and erudite account of the high crosses of Ireland in general, with an explanation of the system of iconography and its symbolism. A particular and detailed examination of the Burrow and Castledermot crosses follows, and this is illustrated by a series of admirable photographs. The careful pains taken to make these as nearly perfect as might be is described by the author:—

I waited [writes Miss Stokes] through the day till the sun had illuminated each side in succession, if not prevented by over-shadowing trees; I then made $\frac{1}{2}$ plate photographs of each side, which I afterwards enlarged and printed on platino-type paper. Having mounted these, so that they would bear touching with a fine sable brush and Indian ink, I returned to the monument. Then, having the help of friends whose skill in deciphering patterns often exceeded my own, careful rubbings were made of every separate panel, those at the summit of the monument being taken with much pain and trouble from the tops of ladders, and, finally, the whole photograph was gone over with touches of white in the high lights and black in the shadows.

The result obtained quite justifies the labour which it involved; and the book will be welcomed by all students of ecclesiastical archæology.

THEOLOGY.

LAW'S SERIOUS CALL, the "finest piece of hortatory theology in any language," as Dr. Johnson called it, forms the first volume of the "English Theological Library" (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. n.), and contains the general preface written by the Bishop of London for the proposed series. Canon Overton, who has "introduced" and annotated the "Serious Call," has done his work very well, though we think he hardly does justice to the "remnant" that kept the fire of Anglo-Catholicism burning through the long night of the eighteenth century. Parson Adams and Parson Trulliber are, no doubt, types of large classes of eighteenth-century clergy, and Adams, though an excellent man, has not much of the distinctively Anglican about him; but men like Wilson and Law did not absolutely stand alone. Thus Canon Overton, in his comments on the passage—

You would justly think it a great profaneness to contemn and trample upon an altar, because it was appropriated to holy uses, and had had the body of Christ so often placed upon it, remarks that such an outspoken expression of belief in the Real Presence is rare in eighteenth-century writers. The expression of such a belief is possibly somewhat rare, though we have such instances as Charles Wesley's hymns, in such lines as:—

We need not now go up to Heav'n
To bring the long-sought Saviour down;
Thou art to all that seek Thee given,
Thou dost e'en now Thy banquet crown;
To every faithful soul appear,
And show Thy Real Presence here!

But the belief itself was probably much more common than has been thought.

Four more volumes of the excellent MODERN READER'S BIBLE, edited by Professor Richard G. Moulton, have been issued (Macmillan, 2s. 6d. each). "St. Matthew and St. Mark and the General Epistles," "St. Luke and St. Paul" (two vols.), and "St. John" (the Gospel, the Epistles, and the Revelation) are all arranged in modern manner under subject-headings in place of the old chapter and verse. The new presentment unquestionably emphasizes the purely æsthetic beauty of the unique Bible literature, and Professor Moulton's introductions are all admirably done.

THE EXPOSITORY TIMES.—There is a good deal within the covers of "The Expository Times" (Edinburgh, Clark, 7s. 6d.) which will interest, not only the theological, but the universal curiosity. Of course, there are many articles of purely technical value: "Arabisms in Old Testament," "Good News about Codex Bezae," the "Transliteration of Hebrew" are papers that appeal to a special circle of readers. But a larger public will be attracted by Mr. St. Chad Boscawen on Babylonian witchcraft, by Professor Sayce's series of articles on the Archæology of Genesis, and by the inquiry into Hebrew divination and sorcery, in which Professor Van Hoonacker, of Louvain, shows that the mysterious word 'ôb, generally interpreted "bottle," must probably mean the cavern or pit where the oracular responses and visions were given.

Sir Charles Dilke's little book, THE BRITISH EMPIRE (Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d.), is a reprint of a series of articles contributed to newspapers in the course of 1898. The general tenor of the papers is platitudinous, though, of course, the platitudes have a value because they are based upon first-hand knowledge. The most luminous of the articles deals with the Newfoundland question—a subject of which Sir Charles Dilke never wearies. His words are strong:—

The whole story [he writes] is one of abdication of rights in consequence of threats. No such state of things would be tolerated in the case of any other self-governing colony; and we have only to ask ourselves what we should do, if the Newfoundlanders had the spirit of the Australians, in order to convince ourselves of this fact.

This, of course, is what we are all saying nowadays. To Sir Charles Dilke belongs the gratifying knowledge that he said it first, and has said it oftener than anybody else.

COMFORT AND COUNSEL FOR EVERY-DAY LIFE FROM THE WRITINGS OF ELISABETH RUNDLE CHARLES (Hodder and Stoughton, 3s. 6d.) is the latest addition to the great host of birthday books. The author of "Chronicles of the Schönberg Cotta Family" was a deservedly popular writer, but her work is not quite of the sort which can conveniently be cut into lengths and served up as a series of aphorisms. A good many of her sayings, though creditable to her heart and appropriate to the place assigned to them in her books, are very different from those universal verities which are acceptable without a context. "There is more strength in silence than in invective" is one case in point. "It is sin that obliterates individuality, not saintliness" is another. A brief introduction is contributed by Mr. Basil Champneys; and there is also a bibliography. One is so accustomed to associate the name of Mrs. Rundle Charles with one book only that it is something of a revelation to learn that she wrote fifty.

A similar book is THE MORE EXCELLENT WAY (Frowde, 3s. 6d.), by Mrs. Lyttelton Gell. The subtitle, "Words of the Wise on the Life of Love," explains the purpose of this "sequence of meditations" from many authors of varying fame and merit. The book is tastefully got up and the taste and care bestowed upon it by the editress have certainly here produced a volume which many people will value.

The nature of THE FAMOUS HOUSES OF BATH AND THEIR OCCUPANTS, which Messrs. B. and J. F. Meehan have published at the small cost of 6d., is explained by its title. In effect, it is a hand-list of localities and persons eminent in every walk of life who have made their homes there. An elephant folio at least might be written on the social and literary history of Bath by any gentleman of elegant leisure who would not mind growing old during the process. Bath is not as it was when Beau Nash held sway in the Assembly Rooms of the city and all fashionable London journeyed there to drink the waters and plan intrigues, but its memory remains and furnishes abundant material for many romances. This hand-list is an interesting little guide and will no doubt prove useful for reference purposes as well, since it seems to cover the ground effectually. It is like a sign-post that points to many places.

THE WHITE MAN'S BURDEN.

Take up the White Man's burden—
Send forth the best ye breed—
Go, bind your sons to exile
To serve your captives' need;
To wait, in heavy harness,
On fluttered folk and wild—
Your new-caught, sullen peoples,
Half devil and half child.

Take up the White Man's burden—
In patience to abide,
To veil the threat of terror
And check the show of pride;
By open speech and simple,
An hundred times made plain,
To seek another's profit
And work another's gain.

Take up the White Man's burden—
The savage wars of peace—
Fill full the mouth of Famine,
And bid the sickness cease;
And when your goal is nearest
(The end for others sought)
Watch sloth and heathen folly
Bring all your hope to nought!

Take up the White Man's burden—
No iron rule of kings,
But toil of serf and sweeper—
The tale of common things.
The ports ye shall not enter,
The roads ye shall not tread,
Go, make them with your living
And mark them with your dead!

Take up the White Man's burden,
And reap his old reward—
The blame of those ye better
The hate of those ye guard—
The cry of hosts ye humour
(Ah, slowly!) toward the light:—
"Why brought ye us from bondage,
Our loved Egyptian night?"

Take up the White Man's burden—
Ye dare not stoop to less—
Nor call too loud on Freedom
To cloke your weariness.
By all ye will or whisper,
By all ye leave or do,
The silent, sullen peoples
Shall weigh your God and you.

Take up the White Man's burden!
Have done with childish days—
The lightly-proffered laurel,
The easy, ungrudged praise:
Comes now, to search your manhood
Through all the thankless years,
Cold, edged with dear-bought wisdom,
The judgment of your peers.

Among my Books.

THE BRITISH MERLIN.

Any one that has gone gypsying about the world ever since arriving at the years that might have brought discretion has few books that are not recent acquaintances. There is just one here on my shelves in London that has come down to me from the days when I was not tall enough to reach the "grown-up" books, and solaced myself with thinking the volume in question promised better because it, too, was "quite little."

At the risk of admitting a poor taste in literature, I may confess at once that if any book were to keep on turning up, in the North, in the South, surreptitiously following me over seas (by a faithful subterfuge concealing itself in some clothes like a stowaway in a hold)—if all this were to be achieved, it was well from my point of view that the adventure should be essayed by "The British Merlin." Although he came originally from London, I am perhaps his only friend here now. He is of unimposing stature, travel-stained, and scarred. He could never have cut much of a figure, even when the faint gold tooling on his brown leathern jerkin was new and bright—and that was many a year before he and I started out on our travels.

If upon introduction you take too seriously his opening remarks, you may be minded to think him a dull dog, and to turn aside. For he pretends to be a "Royal Kalendar or Annual Register for England, Scotland, Ireland, and America for the Year 1773; Including a compleat and correct List of the 13th Parliament of Great Britain, summoned to meet for their first session on the 10th of May, 1768; and from thence continued by Prorogations to the 26th of November, 1772, when they sat for the Dispatch of Publick Business."

One has sympathy for this false start of Merlin's; one knows all about it oneself—this mournful affectation of being about serious "Business," on making one's first bow to a utilitarian world. But it is not for his Lists of Peers and Commons (although we used to look there for a name as familiar as our own)—it is not for his Royal Army and Navy List—Eclipses, Comets, and Plagues, Tables of Roads of "fixed Fairs and Marts in England and Wales," not for information about Knights of the Garter, nor to learn that the Duke of Northumberland had been Vice-Admiral of all America, the Hon. Robert Cholmondeley Auditor-General of the Plantations, and John Wentworth, Esq., Surveyor-General of the Woods of America for Life—it is not for any such matter that I find on the browned fly-leaf other names than mine setting forth with uncertain childish strokes a claim on "Merlin." If his first observations have not alienated you, you find him capable of turning over a new leaf and discovering his true value. Here, enlivened by a cheerful red lettering, you find yourself face to face with:—

Rider's British Merlin for the Year of our Lord God 1773, being the first after Bissextile or Leap Year, Adorned with many delightful and useful Verities fitting all capacities.

Merlin knows his world and the charms of pseudonymity. Even upon this festive page it is pretended that the work is "Compiled for his Country's Benefit by Cardanus Rider." Further to inspire confidence, upon its blushing face is set the brown Duty Stamp.

Well, having made his bow with a grave air and discharged his duty to society, my friend tells you at the top of the next page in a gay red legend, that "January hath XXXI. days." What plenitude in the sound—how full of pleasant promise! Hath January still so many days? or any called Red Letter? Who thinks to tell us now that even a common black-letter date like the 5th is old Xmas Day, that the 11th is Plow Monday—who reminds us to keep Queen Charlotte's birthday on the 18th, or that the 30th is the anniversary of the "martyrdom" of King Charles? Who provides us in these grudging days with a weekly forecast of the weather for the whole of the "year of our Lord God"? It is as easy for Merlin, as to give you in his list of Holy Days the exact date of the conversion of St. Paul, or to tell at what moment in every twenty-four hours it will be high tide at London Bridge. He generously leaves you two blank pages for each month, and he covers one with his own observations, meteorological, horticultural, therapeutical, hygienic, and general; but all so pleasantly, so airily, urged, that the instruction sits lightly. Who would be so churlish as to resent being told in January, Let not Blood, and use no Physick, unless there be a Necessity; Eat often.

Or in June,

Cooling Sallads, as Letuce, Sorrel, Purslane, &c., will prevent too great a Perspiration, and throw off feverish Disorders. Who would not have a garden, in order next month to obey Merlin's behest:

Sow on shady Borders the Seeds of Polyanthus. Sow Corn Sallad, Marigold, Aniseeds and Dutch Brown Letuce. Set Osiers, Willows, and other Aquaticks. Rub Moss off Trees after Rain.

It isn't very useful, perhaps, but I should like to have Maundy Thursday set down in my Kalendar for '99, Candlemas, Old Mid-Summer Day, Ember Week, Lammas;—and to be reminded on the 2nd of September in a pleasant conversational style: "London burnt 1666," or "Thomas à Becket murdered"; or that I myself am to "Hough carrots" or "earth up Sellery and Chardoons." This is to humanize a dry mathematical problem, and give us back our old illusion of man's proud place in a universe of ruthless tides and planets. It is like that kindly warning in one of our daily newspapers:

"Lighting-up time for cyclists, 6.28 p.m."

That is to bring Meteorology home to men's bosoms, to emphasize our personal concern in the great business of sun-setting and the coming on of dark.

Had Merlin made my Kalendar for '99 I should feel myself to be so delicately flattered by the solicitude that in October bids him say: "Avoid being out late at Nights; or in foggy Weather; for a Cold now got, may continue the whole Winter"—so much would this touch me, that I might at a pinch go the length of following his directions for November: "If any Distemper afflict you, finish your Physick this Month and so rest till March."

If it were not that the perversity of experience is always upsetting reasonable calculation, one might wonder what in this book, beyond its appealing littleness, and its red lettering, made it to be coveted by the very young. It was, perhaps, partly that no one recommended it—it was "a find"; and here and there the names of people whose fame had endured even unto our day becked and nodded to us out of the yellow pages. There was General Gage, a tiresome person to keep track of at school, but quite friendly when encountered unprofessionally. A lot of people seemed to be alive in 1773—Catherine, Empress of all the Russias, Gustavus III. of Sweden, Louis XV., "King of France and Navarre," and Frederick the Great. There seemed in our time to be people (they were all dreadfully old) who were interested to know that the Thrale mentioned as Member for the Borough of Southwark was "Dr. Johnson's Thrale," that King George's deputy-cofferer was Hans Sloane, and that Edmund Burke represented Wendover, Bucks, in Parliament, and was "Agent to the Province of New York." Some one underlined the fact that Sir Joshua Reynolds, Kt., was President of the Royal Academy, and that Bartolozzi, Gainsborough, Angelica Kauffman, and Nollekens were Academicians.

But these were all dull discoveries beside the fact that the King had "Pages of the Back Stairs," and that oddly enough they got more pounds than the "Coffer-Bearers"; that John Yvounet was Royal "Brusher" at Kensington Palace; that Rich. Stonhewer, Esq., was "Knight Harbinger," and that the King had an "Embellisher of Letters to the Eastern Princes," whose emolument was less than half that of the "Master of the Tennis Court," exactly as much as that of the "Deliverer of Greens," and only a little more than that of the Royal "Ratkiller." There was a splendid uncertainty about the offices of "Herb. Strewer" and "Spatterdash-makers," which brought them into eminence with us.

Although not one of our little company shone in the History Class, each could have told you that the "Sedan Chair maker to their Majesties" was Samuel Vaughan; that in 1773 Mary Rickley swept out the Courts at St. James's, and that the Royal "Rockers" were Mrs. Rhelingen and Mary Meales.

As I turn over the pages to-day I am struck with the evidence of the superior esteem in which women were held a century and a quarter ago. In nearly every Department there is this entry, without explanation or further ado: "Necessary Woman." Then follows her salary. You find her everywhere. She is indispensable to the Clerks of the Council in Ordinary, to every one of the King's Households, to George Augustus Frederick, Prince of Wales. Merlin gives you the name of the "Woman" who was "Necessary" to the Northern Department of the Secretary of State, to the Southern Department; "Necessary Woman" to the American Department, to the Commissioners of Trade and Plantations, to the Admiralty—you meet the concise and flattering admission wherever you turn. As if this were not enough, you find taking precedence of Antiquary Society and British Museum "The Laudable Society for the Benefit of Widows." And some people talk of Progress !

Give me back the days when it could be said : "America, the Fourth Part of the World, and of latest discovery, consisteth of these two parts—Mexicana or North America, Peruviana or South America. The Provinces of Mexicana are New Spain, Florida, New Albany, New England, New France or Canada. The chief islands are Newfoundland and California."

GRUB STREET.

"You have read in books, no doubt, of men of genius starving at the trade. At present I'll show you forty very dull fellows about town who live by it in opulence. . . . I resolved to accept his proposal, and, having the highest respect for literature, hailed the antiqua mater of Grub Street with reverence." Goldsmith, who knew Grub Street intimately, goes on to show how the Vicar of Wakefield's son commenced author in the approved manner, and how he failed to live in opulence, and was rescued from his misery by a young gentleman of distinction in St. James' Park.

What of Grub Street to-day, 140 years after Goldsmith's own bitter experiences ? Its surroundings may have improved in certain respects, but the old street stands where it did, dingy, full of memories, and not altogether uncomfortable. As for its memories, mostly of the last century, De Foe lived here when he was not travelling on Harley's political business ; so did Gay, for a year or two after the loss of his South Sea stock, and Crabbe, until Burke discovered him ; Fielding, after he had spent his patrimony ; Smollett, while he was writing "Roderick Random" ; and Johnson, about ten years before Smollett ; to say nothing of the pathetic and nameless crowd of scribblers who never emerged from this unlucky street. Of late years it has hardly maintained its reputation, the chief Victorian writers having lived nearer the West-end ; but as some of its younger inhabitants show great promise, it may be able to boast of another batch of celebrities before long. Meanwhile, the traditions of the street remain unaltered, and, just as doctors swarm in Harley Street—a multitude of counsellors—and carriage builders in Long Acre, so Grub Street is tenanted by men whose business it is to feed the printing press, and, incidentally, themselves and their families.

Whether they do this well or ill we need not inquire. As the thing has to be done, some of them are content to do it, and to spend all their lives in Grub Street, without thinking themselves martyrs. These, of course, are the older men, who have ceased to dream dreams of coming greatness. They have no illusions as to their literary powers, or their political influence, or the general superiority of the pen to the sword. Their pens have done little for them, and not much for any one else. They know the secrets of the Press, know how the oracle is worked and who works it ; they write more for hard cash than for the advancement of learning. Such are the modern successors of the poets, pamphleteers, and booksellers' hacks, some famous, some infamous, but most of them unknown and forgotten, who lived here in old days. Nor does a single famous man live here now. It is the same old Grub Street, now as ever the home of the unfortunate and the undistinguished, of men who are as yet on the lower rungs of the ladder, or of those who have already got to the end of their restricted literary tether. They are not always prepossessing in appearance, not over-refined, nor too well educated, nor blessed with all the external advantages that come so speedily from success. But we owe something, all the same, even to these poor failures, considering how much of what we read is manufactured by them.

Not that they are all failures by any means ; it is only that the world passes by on the other side, without leaving cards for them. Let us take a walk down Grub Street and see who they really are. Here is a young man in shabby lodgings, where he will not stay long. His is a very old story ; years wasted at College, an imprudent marriage, a family quarrel, and two rooms in Grub Street. He has good manners, splendid health, a wife, a baby, and an inexhaustible imagination. He is working hard now, and in a few years more will be a successful novelist, and may live where he pleases. Overhead is a youngster of twenty-one, who writes endless verses, sketches, short stories, dialogues, anything that he can sell, and goes to a good tailor. His friends, perhaps, would not let him starve, but he is in no need of their help. These are new arrivals, and have not come to stay—every one says that at first—and naturally they are not as completely at home here as the plump, elderly man a few doors off, the chief sub-editor of a daily paper, who is at the top of his little tree, and has no further ambition. His work does not demand original genius, as his blue pencil destroys more than it creates ; but he is a true journalist, a kindly chief, a faithful servant to his paper, and a good husband and father. Shall we call him a failure for his small income and ordinary brains ? His principal friend is an ancient Parliamentary reporter, whose songs and carouses formerly added much to the gaiety of the street. He is still fond of the House, and enjoys his whist and other modest pleasures as much as ever. No one knows his age, for he is one of those men who will never seem old, though, sooner or later, just before he dies, he will "appear to be mortal." His reminiscences of Pitt and Fox are not to be believed. Close by lives the smartest reviewer in all Grub Street, a brilliant man now and then, that is, when he is sober, which is not every day. His fellow lodger, like himself a bachelor, is a clerical gentleman who has twice mistaken his vocation—once when he took orders, and again when he imagined himself a writer. These two will never leave Grub Street, but will die in it ; first the clever drunkard, and then his commonplace, disappointed friend. The most picturesque figure, and the pleasantest, is a venerable man, perhaps the oldest inhabitant, who spends most of his time at the British Museum. He is a perfect mine of learning, both classical and Oriental, but since his great book on Assurbanipal did nothing for him, he has had to condescend to the meanest hack work in order to keep the wolf from the door. The world has not treated him well, but he would die rather than say so ; and as for patronage, though he has known "toil, envy, want," he would be a bold man who would attempt to patronise this patriarchal old fellow. Sometimes, when the old man has had very bad luck, his next-door neighbour, a friendly young reporter, will drop in and resume his intermittent lessons in Greek, so that just a few shillings may change hands in a timely way ; for there is kindness as well as competition in Grub Street.

But these are imaginary people ? Not at all ; and they would not be imaginary even if we varied their fortunes. Let the rising novelist die of consumption and the youngster shoot himself ; let the sober sub-editor take to drink and the brilliant writer take the pledge ; give the ancient reporter a wife and the old scholar an annuity. Grub Street is quite familiar with all these ups and downs. Mutatis mutandis, the portraits are portraits still.

Somewhere or other, unless we are mistaken, the great cheque received by Macaulay for his History was once exhibited to the public in all its ample proportions. It is impossible to say how many young men began to live laborious days after an inspection of that document, but it is certain that in the majority of cases their performances were found inferior to those of Macaulay. To counteract the effect of that £20,000 cheque, there should have been exhibited at the same time a cheque for £5, drawn by some well-known author, and marked with the fatal letters N.S., just to show the other occasional results of writing for money. Still, while Pope had only a villa and a lasting reputation, the successful writer of to-day often has a Manor, and sometimes a Castle. How genial is the illustrated interview with the great man ; how sumptuous his study ; how hospitable his dining room, with the table laid for half-a-dozen eminent guests ; how domestic his appearance as he stands at the garden gate, with his wife, his beautiful children, and his favourite collie ! One epoch-making novel, or two or three at the most, and all this is within the young man's reach—either this or Grub Street, but most likely Grub Street, where no one will wish to photograph him or his dining room. There he will find his level, and plenty of good company, among the "forty very dull fellows about town," and a few others.

Notes.

In next week's Literature "Among My Books" will be on "The Classics of Forestry," by Mr. J. Nisbet, the author of "British Forest Trees" and "Studies in Forestry."

It is with mixed feelings that the lover of poetry must look forward to the approaching publication of the love-letters of Mr. and Mrs. Browning. Certainly they will be very interesting ; no doubt the decision that they should not be withheld from the world has been wisely taken ; and yet one cannot but recall Browning's somewhat exaggerated depreciation of the writers who invite the world to consider their private affairs :—

"Take notice : this building remains on view,
Its suites of reception every one,
Its private apartment and bed room too ;

For a ticket, apply to the Publisher."
No : thanking the public, I must decline.

A peep through my window, if folk prefer ;
But, please you, no foot over threshold of mine !

When it comes to reading a man's love-letters, however, his threshold is pretty far behind one. One must remember, too, Mrs. Browning's fine sonnet on her love-letters' crescendo :—

This said, I am thine—and so its ink has paled
With lying at my heart that beat too fast.
And this . . . O love, thy words have ill availed
If, what this said, I dared repeat at last !

Now, however, all the world is to know what it said. No blame can attach to the editor or publishers, of course, who are merely carrying out Browning's implied wishes. And we cannot deny that we shall read his love-letters with very great interest. All the same, we would rather that he had burnt them.

English authors do not often speak with a single voice on matters of foreign politics ; they certainly did not do so when some of them took it upon themselves to issue manifestoes about President Cleveland's Message and the affairs of Venezuela. In the Hindhead meeting, however, with Dr. Conan Doyle in the chair and Mr. Bernard Shaw on the platform, and Mr. Grant Allen sending a sympathetic letter, we get something like a collective literary opinion in favour of the Tsar's Rescript. We cannot, of course, discuss the value of that opinion here ; but it may be remarked that observers with a keen sense of irony will be particularly pleased to hear that the author of "Songs of Action" presided over such a gathering. It is natural, indeed, that the poet who wrote "The Song of the Bow" should share the Tsar's objection to submarine torpedo-boats ; but he might have remembered, if he had paused to reflect, that the bow is, on the whole, the more deadly weapon of the two. Dr. Doyle's own novels, indeed, are works of reference from which this statement can be verified.

The attitude of Mr. Bernard Shaw is perhaps more consistent and intelligible. Before the Tsar spoke he had himself written to the papers to advocate a military system under which soldiers should be free at any moment (even on the eve of a general engagement) to strike for higher wages, or an eight-hours' fighting day, or any other advantage which they thought themselves likely to get by bringing opportune pressure to bear upon their employers. The general adoption of this system in Continental armies (where soldiers are paid about a penny a day) would no doubt bring about disarmament quite as quickly as any resolutions that are likely to be adopted by the coming conference ; and Mr. Shaw, who has a singularly logical mind, no doubt perceived as much at the time when his own rescript was issued.

Another more or less political question which is exercising authors at the present moment relates to the bookstall monopoly of Messrs. W. H. Smith and Son. Certain books, as is well known, have been boycotted by the firm from time to time, and the latest of the aggrieved authors, Mr. H. Mullett Ellis, proposes to strike a blow for the rights of literature by contesting Mr. W. F. D. Smith's seat in Parliament. Up to the present, the best literary opinion seems to be opposed to the adoption of this drastic measure, both Dr. Conan Doyle and Mr. Rudyard Kipling having written letters in depreciation of it. Their opinion carries weight ; but that of more serious sufferers from the action of the firm would carry more. If Mr. George Moore, for example, would write to say that the fortunes of "Esther Waters" and "Evelyn Innes" were nothing to him in comparison with the fortunes of the Conservative party, the position of the member for the Strand Division would indeed be founded on a rock. As the son, however, of one of the earliest of the Home Rulers, Mr. Moore may fail to see his way—for other than literary reasons—to such a declaration.

A bookseller's opinion of a book may be as instructive as a critic's, though the point of view is different ; and a letter which we have received from a correspondent throws a certain amount of light upon this branch of the subject :—

For reasons which concern no one but myself [writes our correspondent] I recently decided to get rid of a certain number of modern books, and a bookseller duly arrived to look at them and make an offer.

"What I particularly want," he said, as he turned them over, "is red books."

"What sort of books?" I asked.

"Red books—that is to say, books in red covers," was his reply.

And he proceeded to explain :—"Of course, there are a few people who know about books, and insist on having the book they want without reference to the colour of the binding ; but the great mass of our customers judge by appearances. Drab books and grey books and brown books they won't have anything to do with ; green books will pass ; blue books sell a shade better ; but red books always find a market.

You can have no idea, unless you're in the trade, what a difference it makes to a book to be bound in red."

We will admit that this is a trade secret of which we were not cognizant. It seems just, however, to give it full publicity, in order that, for the future, all authors may start fair ; though we are not quite sure that the effect of their doing so will be to enhance the beauty of our libraries.

In addition to the memorial tablet, recently unveiled, at the house in Liverpool where Mrs. Hemans was born, there is to be another at the house in Dublin where the poetess died. Mrs. Hemans went to live in Dublin in 1831, in order to be near her brother, who was Chief Commissioner of Police there. Among her friends there were Sir William Rowan Hamilton, Archbishop Whately, and Blanco White ; and it was at Dublin that she published her last four volumes of verse. She died in May, 1835, and was buried in St. Anne's Churchyard.

The New Era : An International Record is the title of a new Roman Catholic weekly newspaper. It aims at a good literary tone, and it is to treat of literary and will also deal with social and labour questions from the standpoint of Pope Leo XIII.

Plays of English origin have been rather popular in France of late. From Hamlet to Charles's Aunt, quite a number of them have been recognized as masterpieces of their kind. Miss Betham Edwards, however, is to be congratulated on having achieved what is almost a unique distinction in this line. Her latest novel, "A Storm-Rent Sky," has been prepared for the French stage, without any preliminary appearance on the English stage, and will be produced at Reims in the month of March.

Assyriologists have done a great deal for Biblical science, history, and archæology : but many names and phrases occurring in the Babylonian and Assyrian inscriptions have not yet been made out with any degree of certainty. As an instance the following may be quoted. An Assyrian sentence contained in an inscription belonging to about 2,200 B.C. has received the following diverse renderings by well-known specialists :—(1) "On the day of the defeat of Kudurlagamar, I give to thee"; (2) "On the day in which Kudurlaggamar shall allow thee to return scatheless"; and (3) "The troops under the command of Inuhsamar will bring to thee in safety." From this it will be seen that it is much more easy to translate Greek, Latin, or Hebrew, than Assyrian. Persons who are eager for information on ancient texts should surely be warned that the doctors are not all unanimous and indeed may sometimes themselves need the warning—"less haste and more caution."

On February 8 Mr. Ruskin will attain his eightieth birthday, and will be presented with an address by his admirers. It is also hoped that his portrait may be painted by Mr. Holman Hunt.

Apropos of Sudermann's new play, which we discuss in another column, a correspondent sends us the following note :—

Oscar Blumenthal, in some satirical verses on Sudermann's new play, entitled Die drei Reiherfedern, Ein Märchen, criticizes the whole thus :—

"Kein lebendiger Stoff ! Kein schwüles Problem !
Kein Vorder—kein Hinterhaus—Poem !
Kein Echo von gestern ! Kein Ton von Heut !
Ein Spuk aus der alten romantischen Zeit—
Mit Fulda-Reimen ein Wildenbruch—Spiel
In Gerhard Hauptmann's Märchenstil."

Since the success of Sudermann's series of one-act plays entitled "Morituri," the form seems to have found favour with the German public. Similarity of motive, however, gave to Sudermann's work a unity wholly lacking in that of the latest adopters of the new style. The four one-act comedies, two by Ludwig Fulda, and two by Max Dreyer, just produced at the Berlin Lessing Theater, have no connexion except that they are all lightly touched and propose no problem. Two of them, Fulda's "Die Zeche," and Dreyer's "Liebesträume," are extremely well written and worked out. The first abounds in the kindly satire we are accustomed to look for in Fulda's writing. Dreyer's composition is of a more solid kind. The characterization is admirable, and the events arise naturally one out of another. It will long hold its place as the best one-act comedy in the dramatic literature of the younger school of German realists.

For the first time the Academy of Sciences of Vienna has distinguished itself by holding out a hand to literature. It entertained Gerhard Hauptmann, the dramatist, at a banquet, and invited the most distinguished talent in the city to meet him. The president, Professor Suess, was in the chair, and in his speech made a most happy allusion to the supernatural side of Hauptmann's "Versunkene Glocke" as a contribution to research in the direction of the primitive forests of the country. Among the guests was Paul Schlenker, the director of the Hofburg Theatre, and author of one of the best critical studies of Hauptmann's work.

The Indian Government has decided to continue the excavations at Kapilavastu, the birthplace of Buddha. Mr. Purno Chunder Mukerji has been appointed to carry on the researches so successfully commenced by Major Waddell and Dr. Führer.

Illustrated books of the eighteenth century, whether English or French, have, for the most part, greatly increased in value during the last ten years. An important collection of illustrated French books of the last century is to be found in Messrs. J. Pearson and Co.'s new Catalogue (No. 80). The whole of these appear to be in the finest condition with best impressions of the plates. One extraordinary entry refers to "The Prymer in Englyshe for Children after the use of Salisbury," printed at London, in 12mo., 1556. This book is said to be unique, and is certainly extremely rare. The price asked is £150.

The books in Messrs. Williams and Norgate's catalogue, which has also just come to hand, are not of the same importance, though we notice some very desirable volumes in the collection—notably several of Elliot's ornithological monographs and a fine copy of the "Contes et Nouvelles en Vers," the famous Fermiers-Généraux edition, two vols., 8vo., 1762, for which £17 17s. is asked.

Both these catalogues are got up in the most recent style, well printed, and profusely illustrated. They are among the many booksellers' catalogues which have now become works of considerable bibliographical importance.

Canon Rawnsley asks us to correct an error made by his copyist in his sonnet "To Maya," which appeared in last week's Literature. The line—

The magnate still of literary force should be

The magnet still of literary force.

Dr. Samuel Kinns writes from 182, Haverstock-hill, Hampstead, and, after thanking us for our review of the second edition of his new work, "After Six Hundred Years," goes on to say :—

It is true that I have repeated some well-known and familiar historical stories ; but it will be found that in every case I have added information derived from old and rare manuscripts not generally known. This has been especially the case in reference to Lady Jane Grey, for I do not think that a photograph has ever been published of the manuscript Prayer-book she used on the scaffold, and which she presented to Sir John Brydges, the Lieutenant of the Tower.

Professor Lallemand has already begun his ninth annual course of free public evening lectures on French literature at University College, London, delivered in the French language. On January 27 he discussed Edmond About. On February 10, at 8.30 p.m., he will lecture on Juliette Lamber (Mme. Adam), and on the three succeeding Fridays on Le Roman dans l'Histoire (Imbert de St. Amand), Alphonse Karr, and Le Bibliophile Jacob (Paul Lacroix).

SUDERMANN'S "THREE HERON FEATHERS."

In 1896 there appeared in Cosmopolis three short plays by Hermann Sudermann which were subsequently published together under the title Morituri. They evidently mark the beginning of a new development in their author's work. While one of them, Fritzchen, brings to a close the line of brilliant comedies of contemporary life which opened in 1889 with Die Ehre, the other two, Teju, a one-act tragedy of the time of the Goths, and the fanciful verse-comedy, Das Ewig-Männliche, are attempts to get beyond the modern, every-day world into domains where the imagination has fuller scope. The contrast in Morituri of the new tendency with the old in Sudermann's work was not, it must be admitted, very favourable to the former. A year ago, however, Herr Sudermann produced his Biblical tragedy, Johannes, which, if still not so satisfying as the best of the earlier social dramas, was at least entitled to all respect ; as has been already pointed out in Literature, it was the best drama of 1898. And now in his new play, Die drei Reiherfedern, which was produced simultaneously in Berlin, Dresden, and Stuttgart on January 21, Sudermann has taken a step further in what we might call his quest of the poetic absolute. Die drei Reiherfedern has been looked forward to with eagerness in Germany, but this time, I fear, Herr Sudermann has disappointed even his warmest admirers. For the first time since he became famous he has experienced something like a rebuff.

The play is described on the title-page of the printed book, which has already run through at least a dozen editions (Stuttgart: Cotta, 3m.), as a "dramatisches Gedicht," and it belongs obviously to the same category as Hauptmann's Verunkelte Glocke. Prince Witte of Gothland, an exile from his country, the throne of which has been usurped by his half-brother, Duke Widwolf, comes, accompanied by his faithful servant, Hans Lorbass, to the amber coasts of Samland. Here a mysterious "Begräbnisfrau" or "burial-wife," half Norn, half Fate, sends him on the quest of three feathers to be plucked from a white heron which lives on an island in the northern sea. Upon these feathers his happiness depends. If he burns the first of them the ideal woman for whom he yearns will appear to him in a vision, if he burns the second he will be brought face to face with her, but if he burns the last she will die. And this ideal appears to him in the young Queen of Samland, who becomes his wife. The Prince, however, is one of those brooding, vacillating heroes, half Faust, half Hamlet, whom we meet with more frequently in German literature than any other. Like Ibsen's Peer Gynt, he fails to recognize his happiness when he has attained it. His yearning for a vague ideal drives him out into the world, away from the side of his faithful Queen, and he only realizes what he has lost when the third feather is burnt and she sinks lifeless at his feet. The Three Heron Feathers is thus a tragedy of the search for the ideal; it might bear as its moral the familiar lines of Goethe:—

Willst du immer weiter schweifen?
Sieh, das Gute liegt so nah.
Lerne nur das Glück ergreifen,
Denn das Glück ist immer da.

Or, if we go to the play itself, we find its leading idea expressed in the two lines:—

Wer seiner Sehnsucht nachläuft, muss dran sterben, Nur wer sie wegwirft, dem ergiebt sie sich.

There is material in this fairy tale, of which I have only given the baldest outline, for a noble symbolic tragedy; Grillparzer, who loved just this type of passive, weak-willed hero which Sudermann has made the central figure of his poem, might have made a masterpiece out of it. But Sudermann is no Grillparzer; neither as a stage play nor as a poem is The Three Heron Feathers a successful achievement. The idea at the bottom of the story is poetic, the play is full of suggestive ideas—in none of his works, indeed, is Sudermann ever lacking in vital ideas; there are thoughts here which speak as immediately to the conscience of our time as those which leavened John the Baptist or the earlier social plays. There is, moreover, dramatic life, there is medieval colour in The Three Heron Feathers—tournaments and battle scenes which bring as much noise and bustle on the scene as in any play of Wildenbruch's. But one essential is missing: never before, I think, has Sudermann shown himself so deficient in the qualities that go to make the real poet as here. There is nothing, for instance, of that visionary fantasy, that lyric feeling, that "fairy" atmosphere, which gave The Sunken Bell of Sudermann's rival its fascination. The verses of The Three Heron Feathers are anything rather than the verses of a poet; they are clever, rhetorical, witty, but rarely poetic. And, strangest of all, Sudermann's cunning as a master of theatrical effect has failed him here; for the first time he has written a drama with weary, ineffective pauses in the action; for the first time he has given his audience an excuse for yawning. In the whole play there is only one character, the Knecht Hans, who has real blood in his veins; the half-supernatural "Begräbnisfrau," obviously suggested by Ibsen's "rat wife" and Hauptmann's "alte Wittichen," has a touch of poetry in her; but the Prince, the hero, passes through the drama like a shadow. At one time blasé and modern, at another mediævally naïve, he remains from first to last an enigma; he is beyond the sphere of our sympathy.

In discussing in these columns a few weeks ago Hauptmann's Fuhrmann Henschel—which, by the way, has just been produced in the greatest of all the German theatres, the Vienna Burg Theater besides winning for its author the Grillparzer Prize as the best drama of the year—I had occasion to point out that German contemporary literature had by no means so completely outgrown realism as some critics would have us believe. May not the failure of The Three Heron Feathers be regarded as in some measure a corroboration of this view? Herr Sudermann has unwittingly mirrored his own literary aspiration and his own fate in the fable of his new drama; he himself is the Prince who, despising the kingdoms he had won, works like Die Ehre, Heimat, and Das Glück im Winkel, has sought to conquer new domains that are, as yet at least, beyond his reach. "Icarus! Icarus! Jammer genug!" As the dramatist of contemporary life, Sudermann need not fear comparison with the best of the French masters, and he has a wealth of ideas which none of them—not even Dumas fils—has. But in The Three Heron Feathers he challenges comparison with the great dramatic poets, and that is a very different matter.

The "Märchendrama" which at present enjoys so much popularity in Germany is not new to the literatures of the North of Europe. It came in with the Romanticists and has never been altogether absent since their time. It was Tieck's favourite vehicle for his "romantic irony"; Faust itself is a kind of "Märchendrama"; so, too, are Kleist's Küchen von Heilbronn and Hebbel's Genoveva. In Denmark, the Denmark of Andersen, the favourite national drama, Oehlenschläger's Aladdin, is a fairy drama; and in contemporary Danish literature both Lie and Drachmann have written plays of this class. In the literature of Austria, again, it has struck even deeper roots than in the North. Mozart's Magic Flute is but one of a vast literature of "Märchendramas" which occupied the Viennese stage a hundred years ago and in the early years of this century culminated in the masterpieces of Ferdinand Raimund; while another Austrian play, and one of the most perfect dramas in the German tongue, Grillparzer's Traum ein Leben is par excellence a fairy play.

It is to Ludwig Fulda's Talisman, produced in 1892, that the "Märchendrama" owes its new lease of popularity on the German stage. The verses of The Talisman—the play is still popular—were more musical than those of The Three Heron Feathers, but its ideas were incomparably more trivial; it was not great literature, but it was at least better literature than the garbled English translation represented it to be. Then came Hauptmann's Hannele, and Richard Voss's Blinde Kathrein, a play that has never received its due in Germany, and yet Die Blinde Kathrein is one of the best specimens of its class. Ernst Rosmer's Königskinder, again, gives a striking illustration of a feature that is more or less common to all these modern German "Märchen"—namely, the realistic treatment of the fantastic world of the fairy tale. Ernst Rosmer, the pseudonym of a lady, is one of the most uncompromising of German realists. But all these plays were, of course, thrown into the shade by the famous Sunken Bell, which saw the light in 1897. A survey of this interesting movement in Continental literature would be incomplete without a reference to Humperdinck's music drama Hänsel und Gretel, and, if reports from Munich are to be trusted, Hänsel und Gretel has just received a not unworthy successor in Der Bärenhäuter, by young Siegfried Wagner, which was produced in that city on the evening after the première of Die drei Reiherfedern. Der Bärenhäuter, like Hänsel und Gretel, is again drawn from that inexhaustible well of "Volkspoesie," Grimm's Fairy Tales.

FICTION.

Old Chester Tales. By Margaret Deland. 7½ x 5½ in., 360 pp. London and New York, 1899. Harper. 6/-

Mrs. Deland's tales are excellent reading. In them, as in real life, tragedy and comedy are so subtly blended that it is often difficult to say where the one ends and the other begins. If they have a fault it is that each carries a moral lesson, and the knowledge of this fact is apt to interfere with complete enjoyment. The book brings out very clearly, though without any such intention on the author's part, the kinship between the American people and ourselves. The past to which "Old Chester" belongs is not so remote that many living persons on both sides of the Atlantic cannot remember something very like it. If its quaint, old-fashioned inhabitants, with their narrow, Puritanical ideas, are American, they are also thoroughly English, or perhaps we should say British, for the North Country claims more of them than the South.

Mrs. Deland is perhaps rather too fond of "negative young creatures." Though useful as contrasts with her more active characters, they are not interesting as a class. Yet they sometimes give others (including herself) an opportunity for humour.

In none of these stories is there a more curious mixture of religious and secular matters than in the one entitled "Where the Labourers are Few," which describes how a one-legged man stumped the country, giving acrobatic performances at inns and always finishing with a sermon. There is an amusing scene in a barn, to which, out of gratitude to three elderly maiden ladies who have taken care of him after an accident, he invites them to an evening's entertainment. One of them, Jane, has lost her heart to the acrobat, and is anxious that he should become a clergyman. Suddenly, in the candle-lit barn, he appears before them in tights:—

"Ladies," he began, "I shall have pleasure —"

"I really think—I really feel—" said Miss Maggy, rising.

"I—I'm afraid, perhaps—such a costume—" murmured Miss Henrietta.

Paul looked at them in astonishment. "Is anything wrong, ladies? If you'll just be seated, I'll begin at once."

"Do sit down," Miss Jane entreated faintly. "People always dress—that way."

The two elder sisters stared at her in amazement.

"But, Janie—" whispered Miss Henrietta.

"You can go," said Jane, "but I shall stay. I think it's unkind to criticize his clothes."

"If he only had some clothes," Miss Maggy answered, in despair. But they sat down.

Those who want sensation may consider Mrs. Deland's work dull, but all who like quiet stories, told with much humour and grace of style, will pronounce the book to be admirable.

Mr. Herbert Morrah knows how to construct a story, and he writes in a simple, unaffected style. THE OPTIMIST (Pearson, 6s.) is the name he has chosen for his new novel, and the excellent clergyman whose persistent hopefulness in adversity furnishes him with the title is perhaps the best drawn of several characters who stand out from Mr. Morrah's pages in a lifelike manner. The author pictures a variety of types with sufficient correctness. His men are better than his women, but his women are by no means badly done. The cynical barrister, the company-promoting millionaire, the baronet striving to hide his shame at his son's disgrace do talk and act much as might be expected from people in their respective stations. Of the women perhaps the best is the worldly Mrs. Mottram. The book, in short, is interesting; it is ably written and displays decided cleverness; but with all these merits it leaves the reader somewhat cold. Some of the characters are amiable enough, no doubt, but they do not engage our affections. The love interest is weak. For one thing, the heroine's successful suitor is a convict, and the action of the story takes place while Hugh Grantley is engaged in working out his sentence of penal servitude. The public can seldom be persuaded to sympathize with a convict, even if the crime be merely a forgery. And, again, "The Optimist" is a novel of character rather than incident; there are few strong situations or moments of dramatic intensity; the story flows quietly along without excitement and without haste. Sometimes the movement is a little ponderous. It is worth reading, but it will probably not be very widely read.

THE REPENTANCE OF A PRIVATE SECRETARY, by Stephen Gwynn (Lane, 3s. 6d.), is emphatically a clever and well-written novel. The incidents are in their proper order; the characters are sufficiently well defined. But it is doubtful whether the story is worth telling, and it leaves rather an unpleasant taste in the mouth. The private secretary fell in love with his employer's wife, and fled to Canada in order to be virtuous. Having arrived in Canada he repented of his virtue; and that is the repentance which gives its title to the book. Such repentance is by no means new to fiction. It figured in "John Inglesant" in a very striking scene. Returning to England, the private secretary found that the lady was now in love with her husband to whom she had just borne a child. This seems better as morals than as psychology, though, of course, Mr. Gwynn is entitled to his opinion, and it may be that he intended the lady to be the sort of butterfly woman who is never really in love with any one. The author shows much literary skill, but would probably do better with a more attractive theme. These sordid stories, to be effective, require a large canvas and the method of Flaubert in "l'Education Sentimentale."

MISS JEAN'S NIECE (Bemrose, 2s. 6d.) is the title of a pretty little story by the author of "L'Atelier du Lys." We are not surprised to see that it has gone into a second edition. The three sisters who lived their secluded, old-world life in the suburb around which the tide of London was already surging are admirably portrayed by a sympathetic hand. Miss Euphrosyne, at forty years of age, still considered herself the family beauty, and Miss Chrissie had her idiosyncrasies also. But neither had much chance with Miss Jean, who ruled the little household with a rod of iron, only the cockatoo which had belonged to her dead brother preserving its independence. The cockatoo, indeed, takes quite a prominent part in the story and helps things forward considerably. The author shows very cleverly and naturally how, one by one, all Miss Jean's prejudices were swept away, and before the pathetic end came the poor old lady even consented that the ground on which the old home stood should be sold for building purposes. Though the book is primarily intended for girls, many others will like it.

"The Gleaming Dawn" was a thoroughly readable and stirring book, and we are not surprised that Mr. James Baker has often been asked for a sequel to it. THE CARDINAL'S PAGE, by James Baker (Chapman and Hall, 6s.), is not intended as a sequel, but the author hopes that it will be accepted as a "companion volume." As he says in his preface, "history and religious struggles are here wholly subordinate to adventure, although some of the characters, such as the Cardinal and Lord Mikisch, are indeed men who have played prominent parts in the history of their times." The mighty Lord of Winchester is well drawn, and Mikisch in his brutality is a vivid figure. The "little maid" is perhaps not much more than an excuse for daring deeds on the part of her lover, but as her actual appearances on the scene are rare one pardons the touch of convention about her for the sake of the freshness of all the rest.

THE TURKISH AUTOMATON, by Sheila Braine (Blackie, 3s. 6d.), was a wonderfully constructed figure of a Turk, dressed in his national costume and seated behind a box-shaped like chest of drawers. A chessboard was fixed on the top of this box, which served the Turk as a table, when he played chess. For the automaton, modern though he might appear, was a formidable adversary at chess: which is not so surprising when one knows that his body, besides clockwork and other irrelevancies for distracting a too inquisitive government, contained a certain young Pole, whose life depended on his getting out of Russia. The mechanism of the thing is well thought out.

"The machinery is mostly a blind" said the Baron, unlocking the various doors; "some of it is hung on frames and can easily be pushed aside; in reality, there is far less of it than the casual observer imagines. I open the different doors in fixed rotation; while I exhibit the chess-board, Worowski is in the body of the figure; the instant I lock them, he slips down into the box under the chess-board. I then lift up the Turk's robe to show that there is absolutely no deception. I make as much noise as possible, to drown that of his movements, which, however, is very slight."

How Worowski's most dreaded enemy, Catherine the Great herself, heard of the automaton and commanded its attendance, and whether the Pole escaped with his life, may not be told here. The book is worth reading and ingenious.

In the preface to A QUAKER MAID Mrs. J. F. B. Firth (Unwin, 6s.) says:—

It has been my aim to draw a perfectly faithful and consistent portraiture of Quakerism in both its phases; firstly, the narrow, upright, conscientious unbending Quaker of the old school, who feels himself called upon to walk in a very straight path apart from the world . . . a type which is rapidly disappearing; and, secondly, the Quaker of the modern school—philanthropic, large-minded and large-hearted, with sympathy for all good men and good movements—a true Christian gentleman to be revered and admired.

Both these types are set forth in "A Quaker Maid" with a vividness that shows how thoroughly the author knows her subject. There is a good deal of interest about the gentle quaker girl, Priscilla, and it is cleverly shown how the restraint of the life imposed by her parents went to develop her sweetness and steadfastness of character, while on her sister Naomi, whose temperament was very different from hers, it only acted as an irritant, driving her into deceit and disaster. Naomi's somewhat justifiable intrigue and unhappy marriage are very well described. The book makes more lively reading than the title and preface lead one, perhaps, to expect.

If we class PATERSON'S PARISH: A LIFETIME AMONG THE DISSENTERS, by Dr. Joseph Parker (Burleigh, 5s.), among "fiction," it is because Dr. Parker has given it more or less of an imaginary outfit. His humorous servant-maids and devoted ministers, however strong their foundation in fact, have fictitious names, and fictitious speeches are presumably put into their mouths. Otherwise we should be inclined to treat "Paterson's Parish" as pure biography, as is more than half implied in the sub-title and also in the preface. Certain it is that Dr. Parker is writing of what he knows, and knows well. There is no extravagance or virulence in the trouncings he administers to the stumbling-blocks among his own flock and the weaknesses of the orthodox. He gives many a dig at those whom fear of social degradation keeps safe in the fold, and some distinctly entertaining sketches of the Chadband type of man who is the only idea of a Dissenter held by many. "Paterson's Parish" will offend nobody (unless it be those self-conscious ones who are over-much given to the fitting-on of caps), and will amuse many as it amuses us. Apart from its liveliness, the pictures given in the book of one or two men of noble life are worth remembering.

Village chronicles like THE SCOWCROFT CRITICS, by John Ackworth (James Clarke, 3s. 6d.), are growing common. Their stock-in-trade is the humorous difference between the village outlook and the look of the village to an outsider, and this has its value, as "Thrums" has long ago shown us. The villagers, under the genial pen of one who loves them, are apt to develop a certain sentimentality and picturesqueness too often denied them in life. Dolly, in her print frock and patters, with dimpled arms bare to the elbow skimming cream in the dairy, is what we expect in a village that is built between the two boards of a book. In the village of sad reality we know that Dolly will be not in the dairy but at the cheap boarding-school, where she will learn to play "Pluie des Perles" and to consider pink print vulgar. We do not mean that Mr. Ackworth has given us stage villagers. There is a good deal of flesh and blood about them and their rivalries, and plenty of fun. "William's Idol" is perhaps the most amusing of the sketches. William is a hardened snoker, and an anti-tobacco lecturer works upon his conscience with comic results. If the Scowcrofts do not strike us as precisely the real thing, their chronicler's view of them is by no means a false one, though it may be idealized by his own sympathy and appreciation.

We notice that Mrs. Herbert Martin's novel, BRITOMART, has appeared in the "Greenback" Series (Jarrold, 3s. 6d.). Mrs. Herbert Martin is known to her admirers as the author of "Lindsay's Girl," "Bonnie Lesley," and other popular stories.

[BY SIR WALTER BESANT.]

II.

I have consulted Mr. G. Herbert Thring, secretary and solicitor of the Society, on the points dealt with in my letter of last week. He appears to be in accord with me on every one. I subjoin, with his approval, my questions and his answers. I do this in self-defence because it is a common trick to represent these facts and statements as mine only. They have been, on the contrary, published in the society's papers by a responsible committee and by a responsible editor. The following is Mr. Thring's reply to me:—

I. "Have I ever seen a profit-sharing agreement which contains a clause giving the author the choice of printer and binder and the printer's estimate?"

Answer.—I have never seen such an agreement.

II. "Is overcharging a notorious practice?"

Answer.—I have seen many accounts of the cost of production in which the amount charged was considerably higher than other estimates from well-known printers.

III.—"Are charges for advertising in a publisher's own organs common and could they be defended?"

Answer.—In the past I have known them frequently made. I am glad to say they are not so common now. Legally, of course, a publisher can only charge the cost of type-setting and paper for advertising in his own organs.

IV.—"Do deferred royalties generally mean greater profit to the publisher than to the author?"

Answer.—This is certainly the case. As a general rule the royalties are deferred until the sale has covered the cost of production and then a royalty is offered at an exceedingly low rate.

V.—"Are publisher's fees charged on commission agreements?"

Answer.—This is a very common practice.

VI.—"Are percentages charged on the items of account?"

Answer.—This is also a common practice.

VII.—"Is it the custom for the author to be consulted as to the medium for advertising?"

Answer.—No. In rare exceptions the author is consulted, but I have never seen any clause in the agreement which bound the publisher to consult the author.

VIII.—"Do publishers 'care a rap' for commission business?"

Answer.—I know a great many publishers who take up work of this kind.

IX.—"Is a charge for bad debts not uncommon?"

Answer.—It is not uncommon. I know publishers who do make this charge in their accounts.

Jan. 16, 1899.

G. HERBERT TRING.

The reader may not understand the objection to "bad debts." It is this. The accounts are made up at long intervals; annually, or twice a year; long after the books should have been paid for. The amount actually realized is set down. The "bad debts," therefore, if charged below, may be charged twice over. I say "may be," not "have been." The power of committing this fraud should be removed.

The "Publisher" speaks about possible losses. This is a red herring drawn across the scent. For the author has nothing whatever to do with the publisher's losses. This fact is not properly understood. The publisher takes up a book at his own risk—if there is any risk. He need not do it. I find that the best publishers are not the gamblers which your writer would persuade us. They are most careful about admitting doubtful books. The author, for his part, contributes his time, his work, his skill, or his learning. This is his risk—if there is any risk. The possible loss belongs to the publisher. As a fact, there are hundreds of writers, scattered over the whole field of literature, whose works do not carry any risk at all. That is to say, they are certain to cover expenses, with a margin, great or small.

The author has to consider, as the chief point in the agreement, what will happen to him in case of success, not of loss. This is a very important point, constantly confused by talk of awful risk, terrible loss, one book paying for another, and similar stuff.

The second letter, happily, can be more briefly dismissed.

The "Publisher" states:—

1. That the size of the book spoken of in the chapter on "Cost of Production" is not given.

This I cannot allow. Everybody must understand by the data, the number of words to a page, the type, and the number of sheets, what size is spoken of. Also that it is a "work-a-day" book, not a book of an édition de luxe.

2. That printers' and binders' charges vary.

Quite true. I have given, not one, but a great many estimates for this very reason.

3. That there is no allowance for corrections.

On the contrary, there is a distinct and careful explanation of what corrections mean. This passage was submitted to a printer in order to get it stated quite accurately.

4. That advertising is not included.

More than two pages (pp. 151-153) are devoted to an explanation of what advertising means as an addition to the cost. It is carefully pointed out what an expenditure of £10, £20, &c., means for each volume.

5. He objects to the statement that "cloth for binding is bought in large quantities," because, he says, publishers do not buy cloth. He says that binders do. I really do not mind; if a large order is given a reduction is made. Pray, what does it matter whether publishers or binders buy in large quantities so that the reduction is effected? I am sorry to take up your space by having to answer objections so futile and trivial.

6. But the main portion of the letter is an attack upon the figures I have given.

These figures, I have stated plainly and unmistakably, are not my figures—I do not invent printers' bills; they are more difficult to invent than plots for novels. The figures are estimates—actual estimates—which I have had given to me (see p. 154). If they are wrong it is the printers' business, not mine. But, as books are actually printed on these estimates, I am certainly justified in setting them down as working estimates. Let your readers understand clearly that the inability of anybody to procure estimates such as these has nothing whatever to do with my book or with the actual estimates given therein.

7. He attacks the "Method of the Future."

This excursus into the Future—this brief vision of the Future—needs no reply. The "method" has been followed by some writers for a good long time, quite to their own satisfaction. I shall have great pleasure, Sir, in giving you privately, should you desire it, a few names, but I am not at liberty to publish them. I would remind, or inform, your readers that the draft agreements of the Publishers' Association last July considered this form of publishing on commission—namely, receiving the book, bound and ready for distribution, as one of the methods to be provided for. It is, therefore, not the new thing which this writer would have us believe.

I must add to the preceding that, until the references asked for are forthcoming, the "Publisher" is out of court, so far as I am concerned. Your readers will, I hope, understand the position—viz., If the references are produced, I shall make haste to change the passages concerned, especially the alleged words "Never sell your work." They must come out at once. If the references are not produced, this writer must either offer a satisfactory explanation, which will include, in the first case, the suppression of the real advice given, or be charged, which would be a very painful thing for me to do, with ———. Your readers may find the word.

To sum up. I have not discovered in these letters the slightest reason for altering anything in the book. I do not pretend to have produced a work without mistakes. But I do pretend to have published in this book, besides the preaching to, and the teaching of, the literary aspirant for which long years spent in the work have given me some kind of right—that special knowledge derived from a four years' chairmanship of the Society of Authors, and from six years' editing of the only journal devoted to the maintenance, in the authors' interests, of literary property. I have no other desire in producing this book than to advance literature by promoting the independence of literary folk. With that view I endeavour to show what their property means. I want to see literary property administered in the interests of those who make it. To them it belongs. We have done so much already on the lines laid down in this book, following the action of the Society: the position of the author has been already so much improved since the Society has thrown light—a flood of light—upon the management of his property, that I look forward to the future with the greatest confidence. At one time I hoped that we should rally round us, openly, a small body of publishers ready to work with us on the plain lines of open dealing. So far, this hope has not been fulfilled. Still I do not despair. I would far rather work with the old machinery fitted with modern improvements than with new. But if the old machinery will not admit modern improvements, we must find what will. Above all, I have seen the Society for which I have worked grow more and more every year in numbers and in strength and in the confidence of its members. I see its work more steady; I see its influence more felt. Let us be well content to have been pioneers. I do not mind, when I think of the past and look at the present, the obloquy and the misrepresentation that have been plentifully hurled at my head during the last ten years.

In fact, I need not mind, because these things have only annoyed for a time, like your "Publisher's" letter. I assure you, Sir, that not the slightest harm has ever been done to me. I have not lost by my work for the true owners of literary property a single friend among authors, or publishers, or readers. And if I were to give up this work to-morrow—in the nature of things I must give it up before long—I should leave this book behind me as a plain and truthful statement—as truthful as a single hand can make it—for the help, and the relief, and the independence of the younger men and women of letters who are entering upon the field in which it has been my happiness to work for more than 30 years.

FROM THE MAGAZINES.

The magazine of the month is emphatically Blackwood—swelled by the pride of a 1,000th birthday to twice the normal size. Of the history of a periodical of whose career this issue is a successful commemoration we have already spoken at some length. In a long list of contributors we find such names as Andrew Lang, Joseph Conrad, Maurice Hewlett, Bernard Capes, Charles Whibley, and Beatrice Harraden—ample proof that Maga, though elderly, means to keep abreast of the times. One of the features is "Noctes Ambrosianæ, No. LXXII," in the course of which is introduced "Maga: An Excellent New Song." The pronunciation of Maga seems settled by the following quatrain:—

Chorus.

Then fill me a bumper and push round the bowl!
For, with more than the lightness and speed of the Quagga,
She'll continue the race, set her rivals the pace,
And show them a clean pair of heels, will our Maga!

In the department of literary criticism there is some hard slogging, of which C. E. Raimond is the principal victim. For example:—

We do not envy C. E. Raimond her responsibility. It is a fascinating subject, truly! the painfully minute record of two neurotic and decadent lovers who marry for mutual gratification, and resolve to die together before their hereditary curse can be bequeathed to another generation. A brave and inspiring gospel this, which to the question whether life is worth living answers, Yes—provided that we realise clearly that the duration of life is in our own hands. A more pitiful shadow of a man than Ethan Gano never trod the stage of feminine fiction, and were it not for the insidious moral of his puling life, we should heartily applaud the closing scene where—much against his own will, be it said—he finally “steers for the Sunset.”

This is quite in the old and honoured style. A more modern bit of criticism is that of Mr. Charles Whibley who discusses Arthur Rimbaud, a French poet whose claims to distinction seem to rest mainly on the fact that Verlaine attempted to assassinate him.

An article which should help the Anglo-French question (if there is one) is contributed by M. de Pressensé to the Contemporary Review. He protests with sense and moderation against an aggressive Imperialism as a great danger to our relations with France, finding in “the provocation of a criminal conflict between these two great Liberal peoples” a special aspect of the present-day revival of militarism. In the present struggle in France—for he cannot, of course, keep l'affaire out of the article—he finds a similar spirit. “It is for us Liberals,” he says, “a question of life or death.” Formerly men took sides with the different persons of the drama—

Now it is for or against Nationalism, for or against the supremacy of military power, for or against anti-Semitism, for or against Clerical Caesarism.

And the Nationalists have a foreign policy. The revanchards who were all for a war with Germany now clamour for an alliance with her—

Just as in England it is Imperialism—that is to say, the foe of true democracy, of freedom, and of social progress—which is at the bottom of the anti-French agitation, so in France it is Nationalism—that is to say, the party of military and clerical reaction—which is flirting with a German alliance and working for a rupture with England. Consequently, on both sides of the Channel and in the whole world, the fate of Liberalism, or, in other terms, the future of civilization, is absolutely connected with the state of the relations of our two countries.

Another very notable article is General Gatacre's reply on behalf of the British Division of the Egyptian Army to Mr. Bennett's allegations of cruelty. His reply as to the treatment of the wounded is convincing, especially as to the supposed orders given by the Sirdar for any general destruction of them. With regard to the charge that the guns were turned on harmless inhabitants flying southwards, General Gatacre frankly asserts that to disorganize a beaten enemy is one of the first axioms of war; but where the fugitives were merely dwellers in outlying districts seeking their homes again in the hour of deliverance they were unmolested. “Paterfamilias” gives a good deal of advice from the educationist point of view to those who will be responsible for the building of the Sirdar's College at Khartum and for the teaching to be carried on within its walls. Another noticeable contribution is from M. Maeterlinck—an unpublished chapter from “La Sagesse et la Destinée” on Napoleon's seizure of power at the close of the Revolution—headed “Le 18 Brumaire.”

In the midst of a good deal of interesting matter, Macmillan's has three articles which touch journalism. One is an amusing criticism of the welcome given by the Press to “Aylwin,” written by “A Country Cousin”; another is a reply to Mr. Frederick Greenwood's advocacy of Journalism as against Diplomacy which appeared in the January number; and a third is a very bright article on the Press of Paris. The writer seems to divide Paris journals into three classes, the solid, the light, and the scurrilous. The second class, represented by the Figaro, the Journal, and the Echo de Paris, are perhaps the most characteristic. The English will have news at any price, even if it sinks to the purest gossip. The French expect from their daily journals, not information, but entertainment:—

In no sense are they newspapers; a handful of paragraphs records the progress of the world; and each employs a gentleman to misunderstand foreign politics.

But they do understand style and arrangement better than we do. A sadder spectacle is the power obtained by the prints which exist to damage some particular party. “Their unscrupulous virulence has never been surpassed in the world's history,” and “it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that for the last four years these two gentlemen (Drumont and Rochefort) have intimidated France.” The Petit Journal, which can charge £4 a line for advertisements, is narrow and bitterly Chauvinistic, but not quite so scurrilous. In the same magazine Mr. A. F. Davidson gives opportunely an interesting account of Alexandre Dumas.

Longman's has an article, well worth reading, by Miss Jennett Humphreys on Sir Thomas Bodley. She seems, we think, in her regret that the scraps of evidence as to Bodley's life have not been pieced together, to forget the Rev. W. D. Macray's capital biography of him in the Dictionary of National Biography. Oxonians do not, we are afraid, know much of Bodley, or realize quantum molis erat to found “the Bodleian.” It was far from being simply the munificent bequest of a great collector. It is the embodiment of half a century's unremitting endeavour. In 1560, Thomas Bodley, whose father, a man of means and position, had been leader in the undertaking which presented England with the Geneva Bible, stood on the site of what had once been Duke Humphrey of Gloucester's library at Oxford, and determined that the University should have a library once more. Throughout his diplomatic career he never lost sight of the main purpose of his life, and to it he sacrificed high political office. He bought books, and he begged for them or for the money to buy them with; he employed others to buy and to beg, and he lived to see his life's design realized and to rear a worthy monument of his intelligent, unselfish, and persevering labour. In the series of Great Letter Writers in the same magazine Mr. S. G. Tallentyre gives a vivid and picturesque account of Lady Mary Wortley Montague. In his “Farmer's Year” Mr. Rider Haggard gives some personal experiences of an election meeting. He tells us of—

The ecstatic gentleman who, on these occasions, is generally to be found standing outside the door and murmuring at intervals, his red face turned to the heavens as though he were addressing the stars, “’olmes for ever! ’olmes for ever! A Norfolk man for Norfolk.” Then with a sudden welling-up of enthusiasm, and fixing his eye upon the planet Jupiter, “Vote for ’olmes, old fellar, and you won't do wrong! I say vote for ’olmes!”

For true and earnest political enthusiasm, however, I think he is surpassed by the intelligent voter who becomes so moved by your eloquence that he punctuates your impassioned periods with “Ah, that's true. You've got it this time, Sir”: or “Let 'em have it, the varmin'ts”; or “Don't you be afraid, we'll see to that.”

But we can hardly agree with him that a future chronicler of the age will have any difficulty in reproducing local manners merely because the daily Press which records them is too vast to handle successfully.

The Pall Mall has its usual full complement of capital reading matter. An article on the progress made in military ballooning is very instructive. The Italians have been ahead in this, as they have in the work of experimenting in naval machinery: the Germans, as a rule, wait to borrow the inventions of other nations. Ballooning has often been of real value to us in military operations—especially in the Bechuanaland Expedition, after the death of Sir George Colley (here called, by the way, “Sir George Collier”), and in the Sudan. Under the heading “Suppressed Plates” lovers of Dickens will be interested to see a reproduction of a very rare portrait of the novelist etched in 1837 and signed Phiz, though it was immediately repudiated by Hablot Browne, and many will read with interest of the mistake John Leech made in illustrating the Battle of Life through not having read on to the end of the story. A tragic sequel to the story of the Merchant of Venice is gracefully told by Mr. W. W. Astor. Mr. Marriott-Watson, in continuing the adventures of Lord Francis Charmian in “The Skirts of Chance,” is not quite so happy as usual. Lord Francis in the country on his way home finds himself, through a pure accident, driving on a snowy night in the same carriage, and left at a village inn, with a married lady to whom he is a stranger. The sequel is a little tame, though Mr. Marriott-Watson always writes pleasantly. He is surely a little inclined to exaggerate the importance of Lord Francis :—

He set her in the brougham, and himself hung in the shadows.

Her laughter tinkled pleasantly. "Have you a long drive?" she asked.

"As far as Castle de Lys," said Lord Francis.

She started. "Then you are. . . ." she began.

"My name is Charmian," he explained.

"Oh!" cried the lady; "and what must you think of me?"

Surely no one but the wife of the local grocer would have asked this question!

The Puritan (Bowden), a sixpenny monthly which makes its first appearance this month, is a magazine of a good class. It is a relief to find that it is thought worth while to start on its career a popular illustrated magazine with some other object in view than that of tickling the palate with gossip or with curiosities and which does not propose to busy itself with such matters as the weighty question who are the six most popular living ladies of title. It is intelligent, readable, well edited, and well got up—save that the editor does not seem to have made up his mind what kind of paper he shall use, and while apparently inclining towards a rough, yellow surface, prints sixteen of his pages on a shiny, white one. It is described as "for Free Churchmen," and its contents—current comments, fiction, reviews, and articles, mostly on philanthropic subjects—are such as appeal to Nonconformists. We hope that the title does not imply too severe a restriction as to range of subject, and that the editor will act in the spirit of the remarks he makes in the preface. Every one knows, of course, that many of the historical figures of Puritanism were not "gloomy killjoys," any more than "Little Englanders," but that does not alter the fact that, rightly or wrongly, a definite set of social opinions—some would call them prejudices—is associated with the term Puritanism. It has become, as the editor says, "a label for a supposed state of opposition to all pleasure and recreation." If it is worth while to resist the "norma loquendi" and give to Puritanism a more liberal signification we hope the editor will recognize that the Puritan public are not averse to "pleasure and recreation." Indeed if, as he reminds us, the Puritans in the North played billiards and hunted, if Colonel Hutchinson was "passionately fond of hawking," and John Owen had "a weakness for unclerical dress of rather a showy sort," we might perhaps fairly ask him so far to concede to the failings of his Puritan readers as to give them a fashion column, with notes on current billiards, hunting, and hawking.

The Educational Review has started on a new life as "a Pedagogic Monthly," designed to give "stimulus" rather than exhaustive treatment of educational topics. It is an attractive and scholarly periodical with a good list of contributors.

Obituary.

ADOLPHE D'ENNERY.

Adolphe Philippe d'Ennery, the most popular playwright in France during the present century, has just died at the age of eighty-eight. For more than sixty years his name, on the Paris bill-boards, has been for thousands and thousands of theatre-goers to whom the classical atmosphere of the Théâtre Français was not congenial a sure guarantee of a pleasure in store for them. Since Lope de Vega, as M. Lepelletier has just pointed out, "no such dramatic fecundity" has ever been seen.

The French by drame mean rather what the English mean by melodrama. D'Ennery was the great master of the drame, and what matter that his plays were wanting in distinction of style. They touched to tears, and interested popular audiences as no other work has interested them during the last two generations. M. Francisque Sarcey said "he was one of the most ingenious inventors of situations that have ever appeared."

La Prise de Pékin contained a curious example of this sort of coup de théâtre. The correspondent of The Times discovers the secret of an ambush arranged by the Chinese for the extermination of an English regiment, but he cannot warn either the regiment or his journal, being himself under the influence of the opium with which English commerce is poisoning the country. The misfortune of such pieces is that when printed they have no literary value. D'Ennery's ingenious situations do not make him a great writer for the stage. From 1850, however, to 1870 he was almost the sole writer for the "people." The list of his works is so portentous that they hardly seem the work of one man, and one can fancy the ingenious philologist of the future proving that d'Ennery, like "Ounpos," meant "welded together" or "collection." Even if none of his plays survive, the name of d'Ennery will remain as the living incarnation of melodrama in France, and there is no one to take his place.

His father was a Jew, Philippe Jacob, and the name he bore was that of his mother, originally adopted as a nom du théâtre. His father had a small clothing shop—he was not even a tailor—in the rue du Temple. Adolphe began life as a clerk in a bazaar, but before he was twenty he had written, in company with Charles Desnoyers, the play Emile, or Le Fils d'un Pair de France, and obtained a success. Then began his sixty years of labour. It is certainly an astonishing career. As a novelist, too, he has had his readers and still has them, for the Echo de Paris is even now publishing daily a feuilleton from his pen. D'Ennery, says a well-known writer in that paper—

Will remain for the drame what Beranger has remained for the chanson: the popular author to whom men of culture cannot refuse their cautious homage. He was one of the forces of France, and he will remain one of the glories of the French theatre.

A further incident in M. d'Ennery's career is worth remembering. In conjunction with de Villemessant, the founder of the Figaro, he discovered the charms of Cap d'Antibes as a winter residence; and the two writers were so struck with the peaceful air of this sunny retreat that they formed the project of building there a hospice to which impoverished men of letters, painters, and musicians might retire to end their days. Land was bought for the purpose, and the structure was begun; but de Villemessant tired of the scheme, finding that the rival attractions of the Monte Carlo Casino had a more permanent interest for him, and d'Ennery did not care to go on with it alone. Consequently the grounds and unfinished buildings were sold to a speculator, who transformed them into what is now the Grand Hotel. This spring, it is reported, the hotel will shelter an illustrious author—the author of the rescript in favour of universal peace; but the Tsar is hardly to be counted among the authors for whose benefit de Villemessant and d'Ennery began to build. Their project remained dormant, after their abandonment of it, until a very similar idea was carried into execution, through the altruistic enterprise of Lady Murray, about a year ago.

The Italian papers announce the death of CAV. GIUSEPPE TURVINI, who, originally a doctor of medicine, had been for many years Professor of Indo-European Philology in the University of Bologna. He belonged to the old school of Comparative Philology, and in Sanskrit had been the pupil of Gorresio, the editor of the Rāmāyana. Though he was not a Sanskrit scholar as that word is now understood, and had never published a Sanskrit text that had not been published or translated before, he was for years a devoted teacher in his University, so far as his very precarious health allowed. Only a few weeks before his death he published two splendid volumes, beautifully printed, the one containing a well-known extract from Kālidāsa's Raghuvarṇa, with Mallinātha's commentary, translation, and notes, the other a specimen of his translation of the hymns of the Rig-veda, to which he had devoted many years of his life, and of which we shall probably never see more than this specimen. Both volumes are printed in one hundred copies only and dedicated, in words which it would be difficult to match in any language but Italian, to Gorresio and Max Müller.

Correspondence.

SIR WALTER BESANT'S "THE PEN AND THE BOOK."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Unable or unwilling to follow "A Publisher" through business details, some of your readers may be glad to have a test by which to judge his statements. I can furnish them with a simple one. He quotes from Sir Walter Besant's book the following passage describing the "method of the future":—

He [the author] will appoint an agent or distributor, to whom he will pay a commission. He will take upon himself the printing and production and advertising. He will himself incur the risk, if any, of a loss on the first run of the book.

"A Publisher" thereupon proceeds to ridicule the proposal, and, drawing sensational pictures of the poor author and the rich author, makes it, as he supposes, manifest that it will not do for either. The reply is simple. The method is that which I have pursued for the last fifty years, and with the most satisfactory results. This may be judged from evidence I gave before the Copyright Commission which sat in 1877. Here is the relevant passage:—

Then the Commission understand that your books are now remunerative?—They are now remunerative, and for this reason: As I have explained, I had to publish on commission. Commission is a system which, throwing all the cost upon the author, is very disastrous for him if his books do not pay, and, as you see in this case, has been very disastrous to me; but, when they do pay, it is extremely advantageous, inasmuch as in that case the publisher who does the business takes only 10 per cent., and the whole of the difference between cost and proceeds, minus that 10 per cent. [and the trade-allowances] comes to the author. I have calculated what are my actual returns, on two suppositions. I have ascertained the percentage I get upon 1,000 copies, supposing that I set up the type solely for that 1,000 copies—supposing, that is, that the cost of composition comes into the cost. In that case I reap 30½ per cent. [on the advertised price]. But I reap much more. I was sanguine enough, when I began this series of books, to stereotype. The result is that now I simply have to print additional thousands as they are demanded. If I suppose the cost of composition and stereotyping to have been paid for the first edition, and only estimate the cost of paper and printing in the successive editions, then I am reaping 41½ per cent. The actual percentage, of course, is one which lies between those two; but, year by year, with each additional thousand, I approach more nearly to the limit of 41½ per cent. I should point out that the result of this is that I receive, as may be supposed, a considerable return upon the moderate numbers sold.

My publishers, Messrs. Williams and Norgate, answer completely to Sir Walter Besant's description of distributing agents. I do my own business with printers and paper-makers and binders. The printers keep my stock and are accountable to me for every copy. When more copies of any work are wanted for sale, the publishers intimate the fact to me, and I send a requisition to the printers to furnish a hundred more copies to the binder, who hands them to the publishers. The advertising, too, is directed by me; alike in respect of the numbers of advertisements, the times at which they shall be issued, and the periodicals to which they shall go. So that my publishers are simply agents for distribution, receiving a commission for their work. As to the trouble entailed on me, I have not found it worth mentioning when compared with the benefits gained.

It is doubtless true that the entirely impecunious author cannot avail himself of this system. It is doubtless true, also, that the unknown author or the author of an unattractive book, whose resources enable him to adopt the system, is liable to suffer loss. The losses I suffered myself were great and continued for many years. But in such cases the choice is not between publication on commission and some other mode of publication. The choice is between publication on commission and no publication. In early days no book of mine was accepted by any publisher. He would risk neither purchase, nor half-profits, nor royalty: judging, rightly enough, that he would be a loser under any arrangement. It is not, therefore, that the commission system is in such cases disastrous, but that publication in any way is disastrous. But for an author who has made a position and can count on a public, the system is, as the above facts show, far better than any other.

"A Publisher" says that "publishers care not a rap for undertaking books on commission." The confession is significant. They "care not a rap" for moderate and fixed profits. There are exceptions, however. The late Mr. Williams carried out loyally for many years the arrangement I have described, without demur or any sign of dissatisfaction. He was content with his ten per cent. commission and such small extra profits as trade customs give. The arrangement continues with no sign of dissatisfaction from his son, who is, I believe, far from wishing to end it.

I am, &c.,

HERBERT SPENCER.

TO THE EDITOR.

*Sic vos non vobis nificatis aves,
Sic vos non vobis mellificatis apes.*

Sir,—You are rendering to the cause of literature a great service by ventilating this most important subject of the relations between publisher and author.

Having no personal experience of the figures given by Sir Walter, I shall not venture upon this side of the question. Suffice it to say that several authors who have used the figures quoted in the publications of the Society of Authors and compared them with those of their printers have found them fairly correct. There are so many variable quantities in the turning out of a book that enormous discrepancies are sure to occur, especially if the statistician is biased in either direction.

But there is one thing I do know, and that is that authors, present and future, owe to Sir Walter Besant a debt of gratitude that they can never repay. He founded the Society of Authors, and opened authors' eyes; he revealed their strength to them. That he should have gone too far, as some publishers say—that he should not have done enough, as I have heard some authors say—is not to be wondered at: he is a strong man and he is a busy man. What could a poor little author do by himself? Sir Walter gives to the cause of his weaker brothers in arms a publicity that few other names could command; he brings to the fight an energy and talent that could not easily be surpassed, and in this fight he is largely disinterested. Therefore, whatever fault may be found with occasional figures or with occasionally too strong hits, by his undoubted sincerity and his altruistic devotion to the cause, he commands the admiration of all, and, I repeat, the deepest gratitude of authors.

If all I could do was to lay a mere tribute of gratitude at the feet of Sir Walter Besant, I should not ask you for the hospitality of your columns, though, in a paper bearing the title of Literature, it would not be out of place. But Sir Walter is attacked upon a point for which I am indebted to him; so, upon his request, I shall gladly give my personal experience.

The pith of "The Pen and the Book," the cardo rerum, really is "The Method of the Future."

THE METHOD OF THE FUTURE:—

Briefly the method will be this. The author will sever himself altogether from the publisher, and will connect himself directly with the bookseller and the libraries. He will appoint an agent or distributor, to whom he will pay a commission. He will take upon himself the printing and production and advertising. He will himself incur the risk, if any, of a loss on the first run of the book.

I quote it as it was quoted last week, et pour cause. Like Valère's motto for Harpagon, it should be printed in letters of gold in every author's little home.

In your issue of January 21 it was held up to ridicule by "A Publisher." "A Publisher" takes three instances:—Author number one has his poverty delicately thrown in his face:—

We will imagine an author has written a work and that he has, say, £100 to spend on its production—not always an easy task for the imagination.

After having to pay cash to the printer, he has to pay cash for advertisements:—

I should imagine this would be the last straw on the poor author's back. 'A fido for your methods of the future!' he would roar. 'Am I a millionaire?' Still, the matter cannot stop here, and so our author spends his last shilling.

The book does not sell. Then follows a graphic picture that might find its place among the portraits of Theophrastus or La Bruyère; it betrays the superior smile of a satisfied Giton as he looks down upon a lean Phédon, and also a somewhat cruel personal knowledge of the straits to which is but too often reduced the man upon whose talents he thrives:—

Weeks pass, months go by, still nothing comes in. He goes again to the agent—this time for some of the profits. His coat is worn; he has had no square meal for a month; his landlord is clamouring for the rent; generally speaking, he is physically and socially a wreck.

And we think with envy of the glossey hat and well-filled frock-coat of the publisher. The publisher or agent of author number one does not thrive, but exclaims:—

. . . If this is what your method of the future means to me, you'd better look out for another agent. I'm going to break stones.

"A Publisher" now supposes the book to be a success (it is still the same author number one; it is not another story—an innovation in the art of composition which will be a revelation no doubt to many authors):—

But supposing the book is a success. The author has had to pay cash for all his expenses, but now he finds that he must wait six months before he gets a farthing of his share of profits. What is he to do in the meantime? I see nothing else for him but either to raise loans on what may be coming to him or wait quietly in a workhouse.

So the moral of this true story (I will not say "fable," for "A Publisher" is certainly not trying to write against his own cause) is that the case of author number 1a and author number 1b is hopeless: flotsam or jetsam for the one, the workhouse for the other.

Now for author number two. This is a gentleman whose reputation has been made in days when 'the method of the future' was not. He is making £5,000 a year by his pen.

Such an author is, of course, familiar to us all. However this may be, he does not go to the workhouse, but (it is difficult to see the drift of the story) he seems to be disgusted at having to pay an extra five per cent. and therefore throws up "The Method of the Future." Why, one cannot tell, but he does. So ends the second instance brought up to show the impossibility of Sir Walter's plan. It is interesting, however, to note here entre parenthèses an admission, the most damning one seen since the publication of the "model agreement" suggested by the Publishers' Society and rightly shown up by Sir Walter:—

The agent is now the publisher, and he is but human. Time passes, and he is charged with secreting profits, keeping discounts, adding percentages. Wicked agent! He must be inquired into.

Now, why should humanity be naturally connected with dishonesty? Why should a publisher be charged with secret profits? Here, "A Publisher" shows "un petit bout d'oreille"—which is unfortunate.

"Lastly, there is author number three." Like authors 1a, and 1b, he is without capital; he goes to "the agent":—

And how will the agent treat him? Why, just as a publisher would now. . . . So he goes home, and perhaps another "mute inglorious Milton" passes away.

The moral of this instance is—not the utility of the publisher as he is now. But there may be another.

I was compelled to quote fully, that your many readers may be in a position to judge for themselves in this question, which is most important not only for all writers but for all lovers of literature and all lovers of fair play. However, the upshot of all these four pen-portraits is, it is seen, to show that the "Method of the Future" is an impossible if not a foolish dream.

"Plain Figures" has in his able and witty letter shown (21 Jan.) that "A Publisher" in his article of 14 Jan. slightly overstated his case; when intending to show that the publisher's profits were small, he juggled so with his figures that he proved that—he lost £47! This and another discrepancy in the accounts are further clearly pointed out by Mr. Hugh D. Macdonald. For a business man on his best behaviour, this again is unfortunate.

Here, now, I would bring in my own experience. In case some minds were still unconverted to the feasibility of Sir Walter's "method" by "A Publisher's" dexterity at handling figures and the jocose but empty character of "A Publisher's" literary effort against it, I should like to add a plain fact; it clenches the argument altogether. The "Method of the Future" is absurd, tries to say "A Publisher." Well, though it looks like a "bull" to say such a thing, I have tried "the Method of the Future," and I like it; I find I cannot get on the Stock Exchange safe investments at 60 per cent. per ann.! Others have tried it too; if any wish to know who they are let them apply to the Society of Authors and read the back numbers of the Author; it is to them I owe the idea, and to them as well as to Sir Walter I owe a deep debt of gratitude.

The "Method of the Future" is a success. I am glad to proclaim the fact through your columns for the sake of all who are striving, that they should be encouraged as I was, and also for the sake of the publishers who have struck out on a new line.

Publishers do an infinite amount of good to authors at their début; for his reward, an author gets κῦδος, I am told. Yes, but he gets κῦδος and very little else; κῦδος will not keep him long in clothes, and after a time he will require something more substantial. What Sir Walter Besant has shown is that—save with a few rare exceptions—an author does not get in the division of profits a remuneration that is proportionate to his share in the production of what is the child of his brain.

A learned weekly contemporary, in a criticism of "The Pen and the Book," suggests that Sir Walter Besant should name publishers against whom he levels charges of dishonesty. Such a course is not possible; it would entail endless law suits and painful revelations. If publishers are honest—as undoubtedly many are—let them not act as if they wished to be dishonest; let them give to the author or his representative full access to their books; if an agreement is made on the royalty system, which is the best because it is the fairest to both parties, let a clause be added to the effect that "the printer be informed that no copy of the book is to be printed without the joint signature of both author and publisher." No such clause has yet been accepted by a publisher in England. Why? In Paris I know that one firm has adopted it. As things go, the result will undoubtedly be that publishers of the old school will soon get only young and untried authors—or adopt the businesslike attitude of placing themselves above suspicion.

The matter cannot be too thoroughly sifted for the sake of all parties. By opening your columns to a free and impartial discussion you will be conferring upon all writers and, I may say, upon the honest publishers, too, an inestimable benefit. I trust that, if at times, errors have crept into Sir W. Besant's book, everybody will see that the gratitude of all fair-minded men and women is due to him for drawing public attention to what certainly is an unsatisfactory state of affairs, and thereby contributing with disinterested and truly British pluck to right a wrong.

I am, Sir,
Yours obediently,
VICTOR SPIERS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Though I have not yet read Sir Walter Besant's book, I have closely followed the correspondence in your columns relating to it. Presuming that you are willing to give a fair hearing to both sides of the question, I venture to lay before you my own experiences as an author.

I am a writer on more serious subjects than fiction, but am not a member of any society, clique, or literary coterie, indeed, though my books have been well reviewed in the press, I have never sought to influence an editor or reviewer in my life. My first manuscripts were submitted to likely publishers, and as a rule, rejected with scant ceremony; from one and one only, have I ever received a word of encouragement, and were I to mention the name it would be admitted that the opinion was worth something. At last I produced what I thought to be a work of real and practical value, whatever the previous attempts might have been. It was offered to every likely publisher, and by each in turn rejected, and about the only consolation offered me was that it was a book nobody wanted, nobody would buy, and if perchance anybody did, would not read. Still, I persevered, and brought it out through a country firm of high standing, but unconnected with the publishing trade. In fact, I neither asked nor expected them to push the sale, that I intended to look after myself.

The book which nobody wanted and nobody would read, and which is, by the way, not a cheap one, has, in little more than twelve months, been sold to the extent of a good many hundred copies, and is circulating in every continent of the world; and even if you granted me space, I should not feel justified in reporting all the complimentary things said and written to me about it. The most important point is, that the cost of production, advertising, and my own travelling expenses has been covered, and as there are a fair number of copies left, and it continues to have a steady sale, I shall eventually make a profit. Of course I have not yet been remunerated for my time and labour, but what unknown author ever is in twelve months after his first serious effort? The work of distribution has proved harder than that of production, harder in fact than I expected, as I have had to encounter hostility as well as indifference.

Some months later an event occurred which suddenly gave what I supposed to be value to another of my manuscripts. Not to lose any time, I brought it out through a large publishing house with extensive connexions, which I had always supposed to enjoy the highest reputation, and practically on their own terms; they were never out of pocket a single penny except for postage stamps. The book was issued at a popular price, it was put on the firm's shelves, and there it remained. It was amazingly reviewed for so small a publication—leading articles even were written on it—but still no sales worth mentioning. In disgust I went round to a few of the London booksellers myself, and sold more in two days than the publishers admitted to in two months. They claimed a week or two ago that since then they had not received an order for a single copy, though I know better. I have called on a good many country booksellers as well, and they tell me a sample copy may have been shown them from a traveller's box, but they were never pressed to purchase. The account to 31st December shows a debit balance of a few shillings; it has, in fact, been made up so that it should, as the number of sold copies credited falls a good deal short of what I have myself had orders sent for. And, finally, the request that I, or my representatives, should be allowed to inspect and count the stock has been curiously refused.

Up to a certain point I exonerate the principals of the firm from blame. In a recent interview with their manager, he was foolish enough to boast that he had predicted the work would be a failure, and I have no longer the slightest doubt he has done everything possible to make it one. With a free hand I would have sold the book in hundreds. I have other books to publish in the future. Will "A Publisher" or either of your other correspondents honestly tell me which of the two systems I have already adopted they think I should continue to follow?

Yours, &c.,
AUTHOR.

"THE PEN AND THE BOOK"—A VOICE FROM THE PAST.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—As the matter I touch on now is purely personal, and as I have been grossly libelled, I must demand from you publication of this letter.

In the intervals of strenuous duties I have read a book called "The Pen and the Book." It is therein deliberately stated that should I return to the earth I should learn shorthand, make myself generally useful as a hack in a newspaper office, write drivels for magazines, rise (heaven or h— save the mark!) to be editor of a magazine, adviser to a great publishing house or literary editor to some bloated morning paper!!

Living, I despised the humdrum toil of humdrum human beasts, living, I dared poverty, man's despite for work of genius that should live on the foul earth after I had spurned it. Should I come back I would again be a slave of genius, not the sleek master of material success. Have you no man of genius left on earth to rage, face to face below, against this tipping the balance of heavenly achievement with a full-lined stomach and society's grimaces?

Shame on you all! Gold-rotted, brainless homunculi!

THOMAS CHATTERTON.

MR. SPENCER AND MR. CROZIER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In answer to Mr. Herbert Spencer's letter in your issue of January 21, I should be obliged if you would give me space to say:—

1. That the charge of "pure and unadulterated materialism" brought by me against his system of philosophy was made in full cognizance of the quotations from his writings which he has adduced to disprove it; but was made only after a long and careful study of his writings and of the inner principles which give to his system its logical coherence and consistency.

2. That the reasons for this judgment of mine have already been presented from various angles and points of view in my different works, beginning with the full-length description which I gave of his philosophy nearly twenty years ago in a little book, now out of print, entitled "The Religion of the Future," continued in my next work, "Civilization and Progress," and then again in my "History of Intellectual Development," and now, in yet another form (and one corresponding to the special object I had in view), in "My Inner Life," the volume referred to by Mr. Spencer.

3. That the ground of all my arguments is found in the general fact, that in his system of philosophy all the phenomena of the world, whether of matter, of life, or of mind, are explained by him by those purely physical laws which flow as corollaries from the great fact of what he calls the Persistence of Force—the fact, viz., that the world is made up of a fixed quantity of force existing in the antagonistic forms of attraction and repulsion—so that even when, as in his studies of sociology, he is obliged to refer phenomena proximately to mental laws, these laws have in turn to get all their validity from the general laws of matter and motion on which they ultimately rest; the whole system in this way being unified and knit together in an iron network of purely physical and mechanical laws; and this is why I have called it a system of "pure and undiluted materialism."

At the same time I much regret that, as Mr. Spencer has not read my book, he should have come across detached phrases or passages which, in the absence of their context or of the chain of demonstration which accompanies them, should have given him pain. But I feel confident that, had he read the book, he would have felt that my demonstrations, if inadequate, were at least fairly and honestly argued; that, at the time of which I am writing, I was too much interested in finding the truth to wilfully misrepresent any one, and least of all the man to whom I owed so much; and, further, that he would have found neither lack of warmth in my appreciation of his great work nor stintedness in my acknowledgment of my deep obligations to it.

THE SECRET HISTORY OF WHITEHALL. TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—While to-day's list of new books contains the timely announcement of "Imago Regia; The Churchman's religious remembrance of the 250th anniversary of the decollation of King Charles I.," one's attention naturally reverts to the older literature of that event, a literature not deficient in quantity, but lacking that highest historical authenticity that we should have found in Herbert's careful record, if his heart had not failed him at the last "to endure the sight of that violence they upon the scaffold would offer to the King."

Among the books in which some mention of the subject is made, particular notice was drawn to one on the occasion of the sale last November in King-street, Covent-garden, of a relic of Charles I. hitherto unknown at auctions or exhibitions. The relic was described as "the beautiful pale blue silk vest worn by Charles I. on the scaffold," was said to have been given to Dr. Hobbs, the King's physician, and had a fairly-attested pedigree. Some historical confirmation of its origin was, however, desirable; and such confirmation was forthcoming. The auctioneer said that, by the courtesy of Colonel Hammond of the Royal United Service Institution, he had recently seen a copy of "The Secret History of Whitehall," which stated on page 302 (second edition) that "Bishop Juxon unclothed the King at the execution to his sky-coloured vest." This carried conviction with it. Where could one find a more authentic history of the great Whitehall tragedy than in "The Secret History of Whitehall"? How could one avoid attaching some additional weight to the facts that the book came from the very building outside of the window of which the tragedy was enacted and that the agent in the matter was Colonel Hammond, name and title recalling the King's custodianship? The relic was sold for 200 guineas.

When we examine "The Secret History of Whitehall" we find its contents to have little more bearing on the subject than the source from which the book was borrowed. It has no local character. It contains an account of Court intrigues, principally French. So far from giving particulars of the decollation of Charles I., its earliest pages treat of French opposition to the restoration of Charles II. How then did the error arise?

"The Secret History of Whitehall," published in 1696, consists of letters from one David Jones, holding the appointment of Secretary-Interpreter to the Marquis of Louvois in Paris, purporting to be written to a nobleman in England and to give from documents at the writer's disposal intimate accounts of Court intrigues from 1660. "A Continuation of the Secret History of Whitehall," with the same date of publication, consists of letters from 1689 to 1695. The author found these letters take up less room than he had anticipated. This is not to be accounted for by any infrequency of correspondence occasioned by his absence on the Irish campaign; for, though he is said to have commanded a troop of the Royals at the battle of the Boyne, his letters from Paris bear dates in June and August, 1690. But somehow he found himself under the necessity of supplying padding to make up a respectable volume, and did so by appending material he had by him consisting of "The Tragical History of the Stuarts" from the first rise of that family. "'Tis true," the author writes, "the connection here does not so exactly quadrate, nor does it look so natural to myself as I could wish." But it served its purpose; and, when the whole work ran into a second edition in 1717, a feeble attempt to make it quadrate appeared in the omission of the date from the title-page of the Tragical History and in paging it with the continuation, or, as it was now called, Part II. of The Secret History. And it is at page 302 of this volume that mention is made of Bishop Juxon, in his ministration to the King, having "unclothed him to his Sky-colour'd Sattin wastcoat."

Captain Jones does not claim for his Tragical History the possession of such exclusive sources of information as he claims for his former work, and he may have had no more personal knowledge of the tragedy of 1649 than of that of 1587. Yet his statements are entitled to the consideration accorded to those of others similarly situated.

A COINCIDENCE EXPLAINED.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I perceive that in the notice of my new romance, "The Forest of Bourg-Marie," your reviewer states that the French-Canadian adventurer Magloire is guilty of "masquerading under the name of a well-known dramatist."

Nothing could be further from the truth. As a matter of fact, the book was completed a very long while before I was aware of the existence of the playwright referred to, and if the creator of Magloire were ignorant of the coincidence, surely in the nature of things, Magloire himself would be the last to discover it! Nobody would expect his reading and knowledge of the world to carry him so far, except, perhaps, a reviewer.

As another matter of fact, the evolution of the name, Murray Carson, from Magloire Caron, is an everyday one. French-Canadians frequently translate their names into English equivalents when they go to "the States."

Thus—Lapierre becomes Mr. Stone; Dubois, Mr. Wood; Leblanc, Mr. White; and so on. I have even known a cabman, in the city of Ottawa, who managed to retain both forms of his name, so that in Upper Town he was called King, while in Lower Town he answered to Leroy. By imitation, therefore, Caron easily became Carson, while Magloire seemed to suggest Murray in much the same way.

Thanking you for publishing this explanation,

I have the honour to remain,

Faithfully yours,

SERANUS (S. Frances Harrison),

"A LYKE-WAKE DIRGE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am glad to find that in Mr. E. Speight's admirable "Temple Reader," a new edition of which has just appeared, "A Lyke-Wake Dirge" is included. But Mr. Speight allows a curious misprint to creep in. This magnificent Dirge is printed in Brand's "Popular Antiquities" (ed. 1813) II. 180, in the chapter "Following the Corpse to the Grave," and describes the Progress of the Soul, by various stages, from the death-chamber to the Vision of Christ. The poem, as printed by Brand's editor, begins thus:—

This ean night, this ean night,
Every night and awle,
Fire and Fleet and Candle-light,
And Christ receive thy Sawle!

This verse brings vividly before us the starting-point of the journey—namely, the death-chamber in which the dead person enjoys "this one night" the light and warmth and shelter of the old home—"fire and fleet and candle-light," fire and house-room and the corpse-candle. The obsolete word "fleet" (misprinted "sleet" by Mr. Speight) means "the interior of a house" as may be clearly seen from the New English Dictionary, ed. H. Bradley (s.v. "Fleet"), and from Jamieson; I would refer also to Icelandic flet, in legal phrases, the term for "a house"; see also Ducange (s.v.). The reading "sleet" is most unfortunate, as it utterly obscures the picture brought before us in the introductory verse, and is quite out of harmony with the words between which it occurs. "Fire and sleet and candle-light"—it is impossible to make any good sense of such a sequence!

THE LITERATURE OF LOVE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Is this comparison worth noting? :—

Silenium.—Eho! an amare occipere amarum est obsecro.Gymnasium.—Namque ecaster amor et melle et felle est fecundissimus.

Plautus, B.C. 199.

Liza.—Wot's it feel like, bein in love, Kytie?Katie.—Ow it's prime Liza. It's like avin ot treacle runnin daown yer back.

Punch, A.D. 1899.

And has it come to this? Note the expression of the feeling of young womanhood as it has struck the keen observers of two different days, and mark the result. Twenty-one centuries have flown and with them has flown the bitterness of love. Its sweetness alone remains. Who now shall accuse this lingering century of pessimism?

Authors and Publishers.

Last winter Mr. F. H. Skrine, late of the Bengal Civil Service, and Professor E. Denison-Ross visited the Russian possessions in Central Asia. They were given exceptional facilities for studying the country and the administrative system which has succeeded in turning hordes of hitherto untamed Turkomans and the fanatical populations of the Khanates into peaceable subjects of the Tsar. The impressions which their visit left upon them will be before the public early in April, when Messrs. Methuen will publish their joint record under the title of "The Heart of Asia." The first part of this will sketch the history of Central Asia from the earliest times. A large collection of Arabic, Chinese, and Persian annals, hitherto inaccessible to Western students, has been drawn upon for this portion of the work, and fresh light may be expected on many points. The second part will describe what the authors saw last year—the present aspect of the cities and the entire system of civil and military government. Special attention is given to Central Asian trade, which has been revolutionized by the Transcaspian railway, and the railway system itself is dealt with in detail. The book will thus give both an insight into the past of this hitherto mysterious region and an idea of the effect which the beginning of contact with Western civilization has had upon the races which people it.

It was, perhaps, one of De Quincey's paradoxes that Greek philosophy lost something from the personal way in which it was often imparted, either in the shape of a lecture or of a dialogue. The picture of the philosopher sitting beneath the sunny porch surrounded by his pupils, or wandering across his country estate like Landor's Epicurus, with his chosen listeners, adds an additional charm to his philosophy. On such a plan is composed the treatise of Longinus upon the sublime, of which Professor Rhys Roberts, of Bangor, is bringing out a new edition. The Professor finds a similarity between the critical standpoints of Longinus and Matthew Arnold :—

They have both arrived at the conclusion that the best of really great literature is its ψυχο (or in Matthew Arnold's words) the high seriousness which comes from absolute sincerity.

But Matthew Arnold, we would remind the Professor, himself borrows the idea from Aristotle. There have, of course, been many previous editors of Longinus, and Professor Roberts refers to an interesting edition published in 1724 by Zachary Pearce, once Bishop of Bangor. More recent research has enlarged the task of the editor, who has now to discuss the question whether the author of the treatise was the historical Longinus or not, and to point out that the subject is not "the sublime" in the modern acceptance of the term. The book is published by the Cambridge University Press, and is likely to prove an important contribution to classical literature.

Mr. J. Low Warren, a journalist of varied experience on the metropolitan Press, has been appointed editor of the New Quarterly, a Church review, which starts in March under the auspices of Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall, and Co. The New Quarterly will chiefly deal with the new social, political, and intellectual forces arising in the Church; and among articles in the first number will be one by Canon Scott Holland on "Gladstone's Religion," and another by Earl Grey on "Co-operation and the Church." The price of the new review will be 6d., and it will consist of 128 pages.

We understand that Mr. John Beattie Crozier, whose letter on Mr. Herbert Spencer's philosophy we publish in another column, meditates a book on Emerson. His object is to elucidate the essays by stating their guiding principles.

Messrs. Jarrold and Sons, of Norwich and London, are preparing a "History of the Norwich School of Painting" by William Frederick Dickes, to be published by subscription. Messrs. Jarrold express a hope that owners of pictures by artists of the Norwich School will kindly forward particulars to W. Fred. Dickes, care of Messrs. Jarrold and Sons, 10 and 11, Warwick-lane, E.C.

Messrs. Constable have ready for publication the first volume of a History of the Second Afghan War, by Colonel H. B. Hanna. Colonel Hanna's views on the Forward Policy are well known, having found expression in many fugitive controversial writings; and his new book will, with more pomp and circumstance, repeat his indictment of that policy.

Mr. Stephen Gwynn has made a critical study of Lord Tennyson's poetry which will appear shortly as a volume of the "Victorian Era" Series. Messrs. Blackie will also add to this, among other monographs on forces of the period, "British Foreign Missions," by the Rev. Wardlaw Thompson and the Rev. A. N. Johnson, and "Indian Life and Thought since the Mutiny," by a native of India, Mr. R. P. Karkaria, Principal of the new Collegiate Institution, Bombay.

Further volumes of Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Builders of Greater Britain" Series (in which "Clive" has just appeared) are to be "Rajah Brooke: the Englishman as Ruler of an Eastern State," by Sir Spenser St. John; "Sir Stamford Raffles: England in the Far East," by Mr. H. F. Wilson, editor of the series; and "Admiral Philip: the founding of New South Wales," by Louis Becke and Walter Jeffery. Mr. Unwin's other series, "Masters of Medicine," is to include Claude Bernard, by Professor Michael Foster; Thomas Sydenham, by J. F. Paine; Helmholtz, by J. G. McKendrick; and Andreas Vesalius, by C. Louis Taylor.

The new volume about to be published in Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Story of the Nations" Series deals with Austria, and is by Mr. Sidney Whitman, who has been assisted in the work by Mr. J. R. McIlraith.

That most unkind of arts, photography, may certainly brighten the page of history, and it is to be put to this good use in a work which the Grosvenor Press is bringing out in parts, called The Imperial Gallery of Portraiture. Mr. W. L. Wilson is the editor. Several hundred contemporary portraits of leading men and women in every walk of life have been collected. The work claims to be more comprehensive than previous efforts of the same kind. The Grosvenor Press speaks of the want of such a work for our full appreciation of the writers of the eighteenth century. But the "personal bias" of which Matthew Arnold speaks may sometimes be greater when we know what an author looks like, and if the portraits are not carefully selected we may experience a shock like that which Shenstone felt when he first saw Pope. Still, the undertaking is a praiseworthy one, and judging from the sample pages will be sumptuously got up.

Mr. Horace Wyndham, whose name is well known to readers of service papers, has written, in the form of a connected narrative, a series of sketches of Army life, in all climates and under all conditions, from the point of view of a private of the line. The book will be published shortly.

Mr. W. Davenport Adams' "Dictionary of the Drama" is still announced by Messrs. Chatto and Windus as "preparing." It has been so long in this stage that most of those who welcomed the announcement when it was first made have almost given up hope of living to see the dictionary published. Mr. Davenport Adams' store of theatrical knowledge is so vast that perhaps he finds a difficulty in getting it within manageable limits.

Three books of interest are announced by Messrs. Blackwood—the Autobiography and Letters of Mrs. M. O. W. Oliphant, edited by Mrs. Coghill; a Life of Sir Joseph Prestwich, by Lady Prestwich; and a book on Robert Louis Stevenson, by Mr. Cope Cornford—the first in a new series of monographs on modern English writers.

A new novel by Mr. Arlo Bates, entitled "The Puritans," will be out in a few days. The interest centres round some members of a ritualistic episcopalian order, who develop an interest in spiritualism and faith healing. The publishers are Messrs. Constable.

A new "annual" is announced, "Morison's Chronicle of the Year's News," compiled by Mr. Oliphant Earl, and published by Messrs. Morison of Glasgow at the price of 3s. 6d.

Messrs. Methuen are publishing the fifth volume of the History of Egypt, edited by Professor Flinders Petrie. In it Mr. J. G. Milne deals with Egypt under Roman rule.

It has been suggested that Sir Spencer Walpole, the retiring Secretary to the Post Office, may take advantage of his freedom from official duties to continue his "History of England from the conclusion of the Great War in 1815." So far the record is only brought down to the year 1858.

In 1890 two volumes were published under the title of "Three Centuries of Derbyshire Annals"; these are to be supplemented by the issue of a catalogue of the records of the county of Derby upon which the Rev. Dr. Cox, F.S.A., has long been engaged. There will be an exhaustive index and the work will accomplish for Derbyshire what has not as yet been attempted for any other shire. It is mainly intended as a work of reference, and as an aid to ensure the safety of the documents; but it will certainly be of value to the historical student and to the local inquirer into county economics. Messrs.

Bemrose, the publishers of the "Annals," will issue this catalogue early in March.

"The Adventures of Captain Kettle," which are continued in Pearson's Magazine until June, have just been finished by Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne, who is about to start for a journey in North Africa where he intends to complete a new serial for the same magazine.

Cyrano de Bergerac is being translated for Mr. Wyndham (who now has the right to play the piece in England) by Mr. G. Stuart Ogilvie. Mr. Ogilvie's own plays—Hypatia was the first to attract any attention—have not been very successful, but perhaps he will do better with some one else's ideas than with his own. No date is yet mentioned as even likely for the production of this version of M. Rostand's fine play.

Another volume of M. Hanotiaux's "Histoire de Richelieu" will probably appear in March.

Messrs. Sands are publishing a novel entitled "The Libretto," by Rudolf Dircks, author of "Verisimilitudes."

Mr. W. H. Wilkins, the editor of the Burton MSS., will read a paper on the late Sir Richard Burton's Pilgrimage to Mecca at the meeting of the Royal Society of Literature on Wednesday next, Lord Halsbury in the chair. An unpublished MS. of Burton's will also be read.

Mr. Fisher Unwin is publishing an édition de luxe of Signor Guido Biagi's "The Last Days of Percy Bysshe Shelley," which we reviewed last December. Professor Alfred J. Church's "Carthage," written in collaboration with Mr. Arthur Gilman for Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Story of the Nations" Series, has just entered the seventh edition.

Messrs. Methuen are issuing a revised cheaper edition of Sir George Robertson's "Chitral," with all the maps and illustrations of the first edition.

"THE TRAIN OF SAPPHO."

It is a perilous thing to write about contemporary poetry without having taken the precaution of keeping abreast of its movement and of taking account of its products not only year by year, but almost month by month. The task, as those know best whose professional business it is to perform it, is no light one, and involves an amount of reading which often, and sometimes for long periods together, possesses no other charm than that of variety. Still it cannot be dispensed with. Nothing ages, nothing perishes quicker than poetry in all but its few immortal masterpieces; and for a writer to have a fairly correct judgment of what constitutes poetic merit does not necessarily qualify him to descend upon the subject whenever it suits him, and to take an easy and airy, yet at the same time critically accurate, retrospect of the poetry even of the last quarter of a century, to go no further back. Such an one is apt to mix up ancient preferences with hasty modern appreciations in a somewhat comical fashion, and to discuss "poets" of the past with an amusing unconsciousness that some of them are hopelessly dead and done with, if they can be said to have ever lived at all. When a few years ago Mr. Gladstone was moved—by what inquisitive correspondent, or other of his innumerable motives to writing, we forget now—to express his critical opinion on the performances of what with old-fashioned courtliness he called "the train of Sappho," his enumeration of the modern followers of that famous but scantily represented songstress—consisting largely, as it did, of a catalogue of forgotten feminine mediocrities—revealed the limitations in question in a truly diverting way. It showed that the illustrious statesman had little or no acquaintance with the songs of the latest and most conspicuous additions to the Sapphic train, and was to a great extent drawing upon his recollections of those members of the tuneful procession whose figures had altogether vanished from, if, indeed, they had ever been really visible in, its ranks.

The writer who discourses upon "Some Women Poets" in the current number of the Quarterly is apparently much in the same case as Mr. Gladstone. He is better advised, it is true, than to repeat a certain memorable performance of our highly respected critical contemporary, and has dealt with his women poets in strictly chronological sequence, instead of arranging them on what, in the case of their brother bards, appeared to be—or at any rate was mistaken for—a highly invidious "order of merit." He treats of them in the main, as we have said, according to their succession in time, and, seeing that his purpose is historical as well as critical, no fault can be found with him for the space which he has devoted, or even for the importance which he seems to give, to the works of the elder female singers, from the once over-praised Joanna Baillie, to the now perhaps underrated Felicia Hemans and L. E. L. They are interesting, at any rate, as links and landmarks in our poetic history, and on that account alone deserve to be criticized with sufficient fulness to bring out the contrast between the poetic taste and performance of their day and of our own. Nor is it any very startling proof of the reviewer's critical intelligence to have given their due prominence to the great names of Mrs. Browning and Miss Rossetti; for the most superficial familiarity with the subject might at least have been trusted to insure that. It is in dealing with the women poets of lesser mark, but still of genuine gift and of approved achievement, that his plentiful lack of discrimination betrays itself in the extraordinary jumble of names with which we are bewildered in his later pages, where women poets, remarkable either for the power and passion or for the exquisite artistic finish of their poetic work, are found cheek by jowl—if a metaphor so disrespectful in this connexion may be pardoned—with mere rhymestresses who have never proved their possession either of the inward and spiritual grace of poetry or of its outward and visible signs. To mention names of the living would be invidious, but surely, though the late Eliza Cook was a worthy and well-meaning dealer in metrical common-places, who did not perhaps deserve more than another to be selected by Mr. Matthew Arnold as the typical poetic idol of the Philistines, yet the collocation of her respectable name with those of women poets like Jean Ingelow, Mary Robinson, Mrs. Woods, and Mrs. Meynell, to name no others, is calculated to provoke a smile. It is true that the reviewer guards himself by adding after the word "poets" the words "or writers of rhymes and verse"; but, if contemporary specimens of the latter class were to be included at all, the list might have been indefinitely lengthened, and there seems no reason why the net should not have been thrown wide enough to sweep all the "poets' corners" of the provincial Press.

In the reviewer's critical comments on women's poetry in its later developments we have failed to find anything of a particularly illuminating kind. To say that it is the awakened "self-consciousness" of the sex which stimulates them to poetry and finds its chief expression therein is to sail dangerously near the wind of platitude. Nor is it an observation which is specially applicable to poetry as distinct from prose. The impulse to original utterance, whether operating in man or woman, is primarily the consciousness of having something to say; and, since the Time Spirit, working such changes as it has in the attitude of the sexes towards each other in these closing years of the century, has given women a great deal that is new, or new to them, to say, they have naturally taken to saying it. It does not need a Daniel come to judgment to tell us no more than that. Women wrote only conventional poetry, as they wrote only conventional fiction, in days when the hand of convention lay heavy upon them. Now that they are free, or more nearly free than they were, to look out upon the world and inward into the recesses of their own nature with something of the independence of vision which men have enjoyed for centuries, the result makes itself naturally and of course felt in the set of their thoughts, in the flight of their imaginations, and—when the gift of expression has been bestowed upon them—in the power of their utterances. All this is so obvious that it need not, one would have supposed, have taken quite so many of the Quarterly's valuable pages to explain it.

The really interesting feature in the poetry of women, or so it appears to us, is one which has escaped the reviewer. What is most remarkable about this poetry is not, to our thinking, its matter so much as its form. The ideas and the emotions which women select for expression in verse are largely common to them with men. At most they only differ as one side of the shield differs from the other; they are the same, regarded—and, of course, necessarily so, when the question of sex is in any degree involved—from opposite points of view. But the chief and most striking point for remark is, first, that in sincerity and intensity the expression of the woman poet frequently leaves that of the man far behind; and, secondly, that it much more often sounds an individual note. In this respect it stands in singular contrast to women's prose, which, as a rule, is either undistinguished altogether, or manifestly fashioned after that of some admired masculine model. This imitative knack, it is true, is nowadays pretty widely diffused, in all conscience, among the younger writers of both sexes; but in the female sex it is so dominant that there are singularly few women prose writers who can boast any originality of style. In poetry, on the other hand, the case is curiously reversed. Our women poets never imitate each other, and hardly ever their fellow-singers of the opposite sex. Among the latter we have, and have always had, poets with some of the stuff of poetry in them, but of whose work we cannot but feel that it would never have come into existence in its present form had not the immortal Mr. A. or the illustrious Mr. B. written poetry in that style before them. Of scarcely any of the women poets who have established their reputation as such is it possible to say this. In nearly all of them there is a genuine attempt to utter their own thought in their own way. And if even the greatest of them have less certainty of touch and less sense of formal beauty than the greater male poets—as we see even at the height of material excellence to which Elizabeth Browning and Christina Rossetti attained—they more than compensate for that deficiency by being almost always themselves, and seldom or never the echo of somebody else. And, after all, that is the main thing—that the voice in which they sing should be their natural voice, and no falsetto. The full power of vocalization may be one day added unto them.

On Wednesday last Mr. Ruskin celebrated his eightieth birthday, and received a complimentary address from the faculty of the new Hall which has been named after him at Oxford, and is to be formally opened on the 22nd inst. This short but impassioned document recited that it was "not alone to Ruskin the eloquent art critic" that the College had been dedicated, "but to Ruskin the Prophet, Ruskin the Road-builder. You found the labourer," it continues, "branded by the literature of the world as a mere commodity, a contemptible mechanism; you lifted him up before all mankind, declaring him to be 'the noblest, perfectest, and purest person the earth can at present show.'" Much allowance should be made for the enthusiasm of a body of followers who are at the same time commemorating an interesting anniversary in the life of their master and preparing to inaugurate the foundation of a college in his honour. But, really, the reference to "Ruskin the Road-builder," with its suggested recollections of certain futile gangs of undergraduate navvies in the seventies, is a little too provocative of a smile.

The signatories of the address would have united more suffrages if they had approached the illustrious octogenarian rather in his capacity of "eloquent art critic" than even in that of "prophet," leaving "road-builder" out of the question. And they would have done better still to have paid their tribute to him as a man of letters, who though he devoted his matchless gifts of imagination and eloquence to art criticism in the first instance, has done much more with them than develop an always debatable, and not always entirely self-consistent, theory of æsthetics; who has used them to add enduring riches to the great treasury of English prose. It is fifty-six years since Mr. Ruskin published the first volume of "Modern Painters," and throughout the succeeding half century he has steadily maintained, if he has not added to, the fame into which he sprang at a bound. It would be hardly an exaggeration to say that he has done as much to reveal the larger compass and more varied powers of his own chosen instrument of literary expression as Mr. Swinburne has with his. That is a greater work than "prophecy"; which, as we see in the case of Carlyle, has a tendency to wear out. It is in the formal only and not in the material sense that the "word" of the prophet endureth for ever.

The recent unearthing of poems by Shelley, Rossetti, and others raises again the question of the necessity there is for thoroughly cataloguing the private libraries of this country. Even now we are by no means sure that we have an exhaustive list of all that Shelley wrote and published. It is possible that he printed at Horsham other poems, or even pamphlets, which up to the present have been entirely lost sight of, though they may still be in existence. And what is said of Shelley may also be said of Landor and Tennyson and other famous authors, for there is a strong probability that many desirable as well as rare books are in the hands of owners who, if not entirely ignorant of their existence, are often unaware of their value. The recent discovery of a rare tract on Byron, found in the pages of an old quarto in a library in the South of Ireland, and the chance finding in London of one of the only known copies of Boswell's "Dorando" are cases in point.

There is also the bibliographical side of the question which is worth considering. One of the most frequent inducements held out to book-collectors to purchase books said to be rare is that they are "unknown to Lowndes" or that they are "not mentioned by Brunet." That Lowndes and Brunet are, as they stand, necessarily incomplete reflects no discredit on the works themselves. It is an inevitable consequence of the continuous and daily additions to our bibliographical knowledge. The only means of bringing those works approximately up to date is by cataloguing all books which can be regarded as valuable and sending copies of such catalogues to the British Museum. As the case now stands, the British Museum cannot claim a copy of any catalogue unless it is published for sale, but some auctioneers are careful to send copies of their catalogues to the national collection. This, however, does not quite meet the case, for there are many libraries whose chief treasures have never been near an auction room, or, if they have, it was so long ago as to be outside any record. If the owners of such libraries were to send lists to the British Museum it would then be possible to settle definitely many knotty points in bibliography, and especially questions of comparative rarity, upon which the prices of so many books depend.

The second series of Dr. Edward Moore's "Studies in Dante" is shortly to be issued by the Clarendon Press. Its publication is awaited with special interest by Dante scholars, as it is understood that Dr. Moore has at length redeemed his promise to discuss a subject which has given rise to a great diversity of opinion—viz., the question as to the authenticity of the treatise "De Aqua et Terra." Continental opinion, as a whole, is decisively against its genuineness. Many English Dantists, on the other hand, in spite of certain suspicious circumstances attending its publication, incline to regard it as an authentic work of Dante. Dr. Moore thinks that a careful examination of internal evidence ought to go far towards settling the question; and if, as is expected, his conclusions are in favour of Dante's authorship, it will be incumbent upon the sceptics—among whom Dr. Scartazzini and Professor Renier may be mentioned as the foremost champions, though from somewhat different points of view—to reconsider their position.

The enterprise of the Clarendon Press in the matter of Dante has been much appreciated by Dante students, not only in England and America, but also in Italy. The "Oxford Dante" is almost universally recognized in that country as the standard edition. The "Dante Dictionary," too, recently published by the Delegates, bids fair to become naturalized there, and several demands have already been made for its translation into Italian. Professor Michele Scherillo has an appreciative article on it in the last number but one of the Nuova Antologia. Its sobriety and business-like brevity appeal to Italian critics—characteristics which have not generally marked Italian books upon Dante. As further evidence of the interest taken by Italians in the writings of the "Oxford school of Dante," we understand that Italian translations are being prepared of articles by four Oxford Dantists—the Principal of St. Edmund Hall, the Master of Balliol, Mr. Paget Toynbee, and Professor John Earle. A first series of Mr. Toynbee's essays has just been issued by Signor Zanichelli, of Bologna, under the title of "Ricerche e Note Dantesche."

Reviews.

Sir Robert Peel. From his Private Papers. Edited for his Trustees by Charles Stuart Parker. With a Chapter on his Life and Character by his Grandson, the Hon. George Peel. Vols. II. and III. 9×5½ in., 25+602+663 pp. London, 1899. Murray. 32/-

The first volume of this interesting and important biography was published in 1891, and the two now before us complete the work. They cover the period lying between the death of Canning and the death of Peel himself, the twenty-three years which embrace all the most important passages in Sir Robert's public life, to which Mr. Parker has strictly confined himself. The public are already in possession of Sir Robert's own version of three out of the four most important transactions with which his name is connected. Three "Memoirs"—one on the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, one on his brief administration of 1834-35, and one on the Corn Law question—were published in two volumes by Lord Stanhope in 1857, and contain the substance of all that the historian requires. Some unpublished Letters to and from the Queen on the events of 1845-46, which were withheld forty years ago, are now given to the world, and are of great personal interest, though adding nothing to our knowledge. Some other memoranda left behind him by Sir Robert Peel, and hitherto unpublished, have also been drawn upon, and a great mass of private letters, of which all are important, many interesting, and some even amusing, enrich Mr. Parker's pages with various and lively colours.

This biography of the great Conservative statesman differs from most other biographies of the same class in this, that the writer of it makes no serious attempt either to explain what is obscure or to vindicate what is equivocal in the subject of his narrative. The career of Sir Robert

Peel is perhaps more full of doubtful passages than that of any other statesman of this century, not even excepting his famous pupil, Mr. Gladstone. But we are not sure that Mr. Parker has not exercised a wise discretion in leaving them as they are. He states all necessary facts with scrupulous impartiality, and leaves the public to judge for themselves. These volumes are now, therefore, a work of reference to which we can all resort with a certainty of getting the plain unvarnished truth without being distracted by controversial disquisitions or irritated by conceited dogmatism. The author keeps himself and his own opinions very much in the background, and we mean no disrespect to a man of his abilities and accomplishments when we say that we are glad of it. He makes no secret of his own sympathies and convictions, but he does not regard the utterance of them as part of his allotted work, which is far more useful as it is.

We do not mean to say that he passes over altogether without comment the well-known ambiguities in Peel's political career. But he has one defence for all of them which consists in the simple repetition of a well-worn formula—namely, that Peel preferred public interests to party interests. That was sufficient for his purpose; and he judiciously, as we think, leaves the reader to examine the statement for himself. But the matter, as he must be conscious, cannot rest there. If the party system is necessary to Parliamentary government, and if Parliamentary government is for the public good, the public good and the party system cannot usually be opposed to each other. It is a question how far the people can ever profit in the long run (whatever the immediate gain) by the fracture of an instrument essential to their political welfare. The late Lord Derby, son of the Prime Minister, and not by any means a pronounced Conservative, said of Peel's conduct in 1829 and 1846: "A man, you know, can't do that kind of thing twice." And Peel himself, at one time of his life, seemed to be of the same opinion. When pressed to take office in May, 1832, to carry some measure of reform, in spite of his previous resistance to all reform, he, in one of the memoranda here printed, says that his conduct on the Catholic question was cited as a precedent. "But," he adds, "in my opinion the fact of our having taken that course was in itself a great objection to the recurrence to it by us"—that is, a man cannot do that kind of thing twice. It is quite obvious that, if parties can place no reliance on the pledged word of their leaders, if loyalty to one's party is treason to one's country, the party system is at an end, and with it the only method that has yet been found out of conducting Parliamentary government without personal government. Peel, however, with that facility which distinguished his school, persuaded himself, as we learn from the memoranda, that he had inflicted no injury on the party system by his sudden change of front, and he would, therefore, have repudiated his biographer's defence of him. We hardly think it likely that posterity will agree with either.

Mr. Parker does say, à propos of free trade, that Peel deserted his party "to avert starvation." He throws down this assertion as an incontrovertible proposition, and leaves it there. It is incumbent, therefore, on his critics to point out that the danger of an Irish famine in 1845, from the failure of the potato crop, was questioned by competent authorities; and that the contrary view was so strongly impressed upon Sir Robert by a member of the Cabinet that the project was for the time abandoned, and not revived till after the publication of Lord John Russell's famous Edinburgh letter, which appeared about a fortnight later. Sir Robert's own reference to what he calls this "very dexterous letter" clearly shows the effect which it produced upon him, and justifies a doubt whether, if it had never been written, the total repeal of the corn laws would have occurred so soon. We cannot pursue the subject any further. We have only given a specimen of the class of arguments which Mr. Parker makes no attempt to meet in his biography, intrenching himself safely behind the formula already mentioned.

It seems, from a letter written to Sir Herbert Taylor in January, 1835, just before the general election, that there was a time when Sir Robert Peel believed that the experiment of that year would succeed. Elsewhere it is stated that he "had confidence in his measures" to secure the forbearance of a hostile and exasperated majority. If it is true that he really did think so—and he says so himself—it is only another instance of that fatal self-deception to which he was more than once a victim. He did not expect to succeed when he first received the King's summons, and what had occurred between November and January to make him more sanguine we cannot conjecture. Mr. Disraeli says in "Sybil," "We believe we may venture to assume that at no period during the movements of 1834-5 did Sir Robert Peel ever believe in the success of his Administration." Mr. Disraeli was wrong. There was certainly one day when he believed in it, and that was the 12th of January, 1835. And what is more is that, eight years afterwards, Mr. Disraeli himself had changed his opinion, and quotes Sir Robert's belief in the permanence of his Government, even after the general election had left him in a minority, as a proof of his deficiency "in a fine appreciation of the circumstances of the hour."

The next event of general interest with which Mr. Parker has to deal is the Bedchamber Plot; and he quotes a curious letter written by Lady de Grey to Sir Robert Peel, pointing out to him how he should conduct himself at his first interview with the Queen. "The Queen has always expressed herself much impressed with Lord Melbourne's open manner and his truth. The latter quality you possess. The former not." Peel took the advice in good part, but it is doubtful whether he profited by it, for when at last he did acquire the full esteem and confidence of her Majesty, it was to his character, rather than to his manner, that he owed the change. During the early days of his premiership the town was full of stories regarding the effect of those deficiencies to which Lady de Grey refers. Peel was evidently not at this time the man to overcome the young Lady's determination to have her own way. She was evidently not easily daunted. The Duchess of Gloucester asked her whether she did not feel nervous the day before she was to notify her coming marriage to the Privy Council. "Not at all," was the reply—adding, however, that it had been a nervous thing to propose to Prince Albert. "What! did you propose to him?" said the Duchess. "To be sure I did," said the Queen. "He would never have presumed to take such a liberty as to propose to the Queen of England."

Her Majesty's letters to Sir Robert during the struggle of 1846, and from that time to his death, exhibit genuine affection: and, in spite of the attitude of detachment which he adopted after his resignation, there is reason to believe that, had he been alive at the breakdown of Lord Russell's Government, he would again have been Prime Minister. In 1850 he denied to Mr. Cardwell that he had ever said he would never take office again. Perhaps when he did say it he did not think that the opportunity would so soon come round. The general correspondence of this period is full of interest, as it relates to the possible reunion of the Conservative Party under its former leaders, or some of them. It was thought that Gladstone, Goulburn, and Lord Aberdeen would be quite willing to unite with Lord Stanley. Sir Robert Peel would have done nothing to prevent it, though he would not have been one of the party. He expresses this very plainly in a letter to Lord Aberdeen of April, 1850. Yet only a month afterwards we find him making the remark to Mr. Cardwell which we have already quoted. His last speech was in the great Pacifico debate of the following June, in which occurs his famous description of diplomacy, which we wish we had space to quote and which we commend very strongly to certain critics of the present Government.

Other letters of interest relate to Peel's exercise of patronage and his literary sympathies. In 1845 Tennyson received a pension of £200 a year, since, in Mr. Gladstone's opinion, "though a great poet, he was likely always to be a starving one"; Wordsworth was indebted to Peel for £300 a year; Mr. Somerville for two hundred; and many other struggling men of letters received sums of money from him at different times. Disraeli was less fortunate. He asked for office—not naming anything definite—in 1841, and was civilly refused. He asked Sir James Graham for a place for his brother in 1843, after his attack on the Government had begun, and was refused flatly. The summary appended by Mr. George Peel calls for no particular notice; but we are perhaps indebted to him for a copy of Alcaics, written by E. K. Karslake on hearing of Peel's death in 1850. He sent them to Mr. Frederick Peel, his old schoolfellow, and they will be read with pleasure by many besides old Harrovians.

Studies in International Law. By Thomas Erskine Holland, D.C.L., &c. 9×5½in., viii+314 pp. Oxford, 1898. Clarendon Press. 10/6.

In this volume Professor Holland has collected a number of occasional papers on various topics of International Law—by-studies, he calls them, on special points such as are incidental to the continuous exploration and exposition of any great department of knowledge. Some of the papers fully come up to this description, but others appear to have been inserted merely to make up a volume—such, for instance, as the paper on the literature of International Law for 1884, by no means an exceptional year, and the bald biographies of English worthies read to the Institut de Droit International, which only serve to show that the Professor can express himself in French. On the other hand, the three studies on the treaty relations of Russia and Turkey and the Treaty of Berlin will be found of the greatest use in dealing with any phase of the Eastern Question that may arise. If, as has been said, treaties are oftener spoken of than read, this very clear exposition and analysis will, at least, enable them to be discussed intelligently. It is, however, a pity that the treaty modifications consequent on the recent Græco-Turkish War are not referred to. Another paper of permanent value deals with the international position of the Suez Canal, and the abortive convention for its neutralization.

Pacific blockade is also discussed, but without any very conclusive results—which, indeed, the subject scarcely admits of as yet. The crucial question is as to the right to enforce a blockade of this kind against all nations in time of peace. The recent blockade of Crete was of a very singular character. As against one flag—that of Greece—the blockade was general—that is, all access to the Cretan coast was denied; but vessels of other flags were allowed to discharge their cargoes at the ports occupied by the Powers, provided they were not destined for the Greek troops in the island or "directed to the interior" (dirigées vers l'intérieur), whatever that phrase may have meant. An interesting question would have arisen if the owners of a British vessel had questioned the enforcement of these regulations in an English Court. In such case Professor Holland is inclined to think the legality of the proceeding would have been upheld, but the point is an open one.

Another very important subject dealt with is the right to bombard open coast towns, such as Brighton or Folkestone or Dieppe, for the purpose of extorting ransom. International lawyers appear to be unanimous that such a proceeding would not be in accordance with the modern rules of civilized warfare. On the other hand, the Admirals appear to be of an opposite way of thinking, and would not be without means of giving effect to their conclusion.

The international results of the war between China and Japan are also discussed; those of the Spanish-American War were perhaps not readily accessible. Professor Holland notes the sinking of the Kowshing, and the arrest by the Japanese of two American subjects on their way to take part in hostilities on the Chinese side, as the two most interesting precedents arising out of the war. In both cases he considers the action of Japan was justified. On the whole, and apart from the regrettable incidents at Port Arthur, he regards Japan as entitled to the credit of having conformed to the laws of war, both as regards belligerents and neutrals; while Chinese notions of International Law are still limited to the ceremonial of embassy and the conduct of diplomacy.

A CONGREGATIONALIST ON THE OXFORD MOVEMENT.

Catholicism: Roman and Anglican. By A. M. Fairbairn, M.A., D.D., LL.D., Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford. 8½×5½in. xxiii.+481 pp. London, 1899. Hodder & Stoughton. 7/6

Nothing is more necessary in the present ecclesiastical controversy than to keep a steady eye on the principles involved. Englishmen, indeed, are not, as a rule, widely or deeply moved without a pretty clear realization of some principle at stake; and the present agitation offers no exception to this rule. Sacerdotalism represents a set of ideas the meaning of which is clearly grasped both by its opponents and its advocates; but sacerdotalism is not so much a doctrine in itself, as a particular phase of one, forced into an excessive prominence. There is a much broader question behind it, and hence Dr. Fairbairn's book, which represents an honest intention to revert to first principles and to remind the combatants on either side what are the real issues at stake, is very opportune. True, Catholicism—we do not, of course, according to the present slipshod phrase, mean Romanism—is not openly thrown into the arena in what is called, rather unnecessarily, perhaps, the "crisis in the Church." But it is very likely to be compromised by unwise champions, and if one portion of the building has grown to be disproportionate and unsightly, those who attack and those who defend it may both forget that their quarrels endanger the entire structure of which it is a part. As a matter of fact, the representatives of Catholicism have done little to warn the nation against the prejudices which its mistaken exponents are likely to bring on it, and in default of any timely utterance from their side, we are not sorry to see the wider aspect of the question raised by a prominent representative of the other.

The book is a collection of papers which have all of them, we think, appeared separately before; and some of them, such articles on Mr. Balfour's "Foundations of Belief," and on "Oxford and Jowett," touch only indirectly on the main subject indicated in the title. The interest of the book centres round the Anglo-Catholic revival and its results, and there is an introduction, to a great extent autobiographical, describing the enthusiasm the author felt on reading Newman's "Apologia," and his disappointment when, with the increase of knowledge, Newman and his fellows appeared as victims of sectarian spites, ill-informed, prejudiced and violent, darkened by qualities which neither literary genius, nor spiritual passion, nor religious emotion and aims could dispossess of their intrinsic meanness.

We must in fairness say that this is very strong language for Dr. Fairbairn, whose wide learning and philosophic spirit preserve him, as a rule, from the taint of any crude partisanship or intolerance. As he well says:—

It belongs to the madness of the sectary, whether Catholic or anti-Catholic, to believe that his own system grows more sane as others are made to seem less rational. But the Protestant ought to be as pleased to discover the reason in Catholicism as the Catholic to find the truth in Protestantism; what makes either ridiculous makes the other less credible. . . . If Christ lives within Catholicism, He ought to seem the more wonderful, and it the less odious to the Protestant; if within Protestantism He ought to appear the more gracious, and it the less void of grace and truth to the Catholic.

The first seven chapters are devoted to a very illuminative and subtle analysis of the Catholic idea, of the Romanist Counter Revolution on the Continent, and of the genesis of the Anglo-Catholic Revival in England. They are full of new points of view; and many familiar phenomena are explained in an acute and original way. A very forcible picture is drawn of the Church of Rome as the generator of doubt and disbelief—a position illustrated by its failure to command the educated intellect from the Renaissance onwards, but more particularly by the triumph of Deism on the Continent in the eighteenth century. In England Hume and Gibbon almost exhaust the names of illustrious Deists, and Christian apologetic may be said to have finally held the field. In France it was far otherwise, and one reason was, as Dr. Fairbairn points out, that in England the religious had ceased to be a civil question; the reign of toleration had begun, and the champions of liberty were not necessarily the champions of infidelity. As an historian of thought Dr. Fairbairn is more successful than as an analyst of it. A good instance of his analytical manner—exhibiting both its strength and its weakness—is his discussion of the supernaturalism of the Catholic doctrine, which he asserts "is, indeed, marvellous, but it is not mysterious":—

The true mystery is a thing of nature; history neither made it nor can show how it was made; reason finds it and cannot elude it, for it is bound up with the being of the reason and the system that holds and unfolds it. But a false mystery is only a marvel, a belief with a remarkable history: without ground in nature or reason in thought: but bound up with the being of an institution, explicable through it yet helping to explain it. . . . The mystery exercises reason, but the marvel taxes faith; and so while authority may be based on the mysteries of reason the marvels of faith must be based on authority.

The distinction is traced in a passage of far greater length than we have space for. It is one which presents an attractive field for the operations of a writer who moves easily among philosophic subtleties, but the reader will not fail to note that it ignores the correspondence insisted on by Butler between the mysteries and methods of natural and revealed religion, or to remember that the religious belief of the writer himself is confessedly founded on a marvel that had its origin in history. It illustrates, in fact, as we have said, both the strength and weakness of Dr. Fairbairn. To adopt the philosophic phraseology which comes so easily from his pen, he is strong in analysis but weak in synthesis. He is stimulating rather than convincing; and just as, in the matter of style, he has an unflinching facility of expression unilluminated by eloquence or wit, so in the sphere of thought he handles, and turns over, and contrasts abstract ideas with extraordinary and sometimes tiresome rapidity, but seldom succeeds in presenting with force and solidity a concrete substantive doctrine.

Dr. Fairbairn gives a very instructive account of the origin of the Anglo-Catholic revival—of its connexion with Evangelicalism and with Romanticism; and no impartial student of it will fail to sympathize with much of his criticism of its deficiencies, in both its earlier and later developments. But the picture he draws is not a wholly complete one, and his grasp of the essential spirit of the movement is still more inadequate. He ignores far too much the practical as distinguished from the doctrinal side of it. If it was a protest against Liberalism, it was also a call to a revival of piety among the laity, and of active service among the clergy. It was not, as he says, less, but more, "the child of a great love than a great hate." Nor does he remember its vitality and its power of progressive development. He recognizes the character of the Anglo-Catholicism of to-day, and, indeed, states it with some truth as resting now far more than at first on "an underlying philosophy or theology."

The determinative principle of the older men was historical—tradition; but the determinative principle of the younger men is metaphysical—a doctrine.

The fact must be taken surely up to a certain point as a proof of the adequacy of the movement for human requirements, and the criticism is hardly consistent with the remark that Anglo-Catholicism "is a thoroughly individual movement, with less national promise now than it had at first." A still more serious misconception runs through the whole volume—viz., the presentation of Anglican theory as an arbitrary limitation of religion. The whole book is summed up in the remark that the inquiry is concerning "the form in which the Christian Faith can best be presented to our age." The Anglican will, of course, reply that the form in its main outlines was settled two thousand years ago and rests upon evidence similar to that which supports the central doctrine of Christianity. The notion of a divinely constituted society, the establishment of which is supported by historical testimony, is throughout ignored; its documentary basis is barely alluded to, and the treatment of Catholicism as merely one among other experiments in the organization of religion leads to that pitfall of all theological controversialists a continuous and unconscious petitio principii. Dr. Fairbairn's reasoning will therefore not, we are afraid, do much to convince the Anglo-Catholic of his errors, or provide the waverer with any sure basis for his religious profession, though it will provide both of them with fruitful subjects for reflection. But the book is certainly one every theologian must welcome—high-minded in tone, broad in its outlook, penetrating in its vision, and full of luminous aperçus on the history of thought and of events.

LEONARDO.

Leonardo da Vinci, Artist, Thinker, and Man of Science. From the French of Eugène Müntz, Member of the Institut de France. Two vols. 12½ × 8½ in., xxii. + 256 + xi. + 287 pp. London, 1898. Heinemann. £2 2s. n.

Leonard de Vinci, L'Artiste, Le Penseur, Le Savant. By Eugène Müntz. Illustré. 12½ × 8½ in., 533 pp. Paris, 1899. Hachette. Fr. 40.0

Mr. Heinemann is to be congratulated on the art books which he has published this winter. Both the Leonardo and Gainsborough are far above the average of English illustrated books and may safely challenge comparison with the finest works of the kind which appear in Paris. Not only are they excellently printed and illustrated with admirable plates, but in both instances the text is of real value to the student.

The new life of Leonardo da Vinci is from the pen of M. Eugène Müntz, the distinguished French art critic, whose works on the Italian Renaissance have attained a world-wide celebrity. He has devoted many years to the study of the great Florentine's art, and in the present monograph has given us a careful and accurate account of the discoveries which have been made in this field by the latest generation of students. Many problems still remain to be solved. The last word can never be said until the disjointed fragments of Leonardo's manuscripts have been brought together and published in a complete form. But if M.

Eugène Müntz does not claim to pronounce a final judgment upon the great Florentine, this book is none the less a valuable contribution to the study of the most complex and many-sided among all the artists of the Italian Renaissance.

During the last thirty years a whole mass of literature has grown up round the name of Leonardo, and new impetus has been given to the study of his works by the publication of his manuscripts which has been effected by such able and industrious students as Dr. Richter, M. Charles Ravaisson-Mollien, Signor Beltrami, M. Sabachnikoff, and others. At the same time new light has been thrown upon many incidents in the painter's life by the patient and laborious researches of Professor Uzielli, whose important work on Leonardo is still in course of publication.

In the main M. Müntz follows Uzielli, and agrees with him in most of the points which are still under discussion. For instance, he rejects Dr. Richter's hypothesis as to Leonardo's supposed travels in Armenia, and thinks that the famous letter to the Governor of Syria and the map and drawings of Mount Taurus were transcribed, after the artist's wont, from the records of other travellers. Leonardo, we know, was an indefatigable compiler. According to M. Müntz, about a third of his manuscripts consists of extracts from ancient and modern authors, while an index which is attached to the fragments relating to the East seems to show that, as M. Piot and Signor Govi have suggested, he intended to use these facts as material for a book which he never finished. M. Müntz is also at one with Signor Uzielli in accepting the year 1483 as the probable date of Leonardo's arrival in Milan. This date agrees at once with the anonymous biographer's statement that Leonardo, who was born in 1452, was thirty years old when he settled at Milan, and with Sabba da Castiglione's remark that when Leonardo finally left Milan in 1499 he had spent sixteen years upon the equestrian statue of Francesco Sforza.

The chapters which M. Müntz devotes to these sixteen years are of especial interest. In his "Histoire de la Renaissance à l'époque de Charles VIII." (1885) he gave us a brilliant picture of the literary and artistic revival that took place at Milan in the last twenty years of the fifteenth century, and claimed for Lodovico Sforza a place by the side of Lorenzo de' Medici among the most distinguished patrons of art and learning in the Renaissance. Since then new documents have come to light which justify Il Moro's claim to this exalted position and go far to vindicate his character from the worst charges which have been brought against him. We can only regret that M. Müntz, who was one of the first to recognize the great qualities of this remarkable man, should still speak of him as the poisoner of his nephew, or repeat the vulgar calumny that on one occasion he struck his wife, a statement which, in point of fact, was made, not of him, but of Gian Galeazzo, the reigning Duke of Milan. For the sake of historical accuracy, a few other slips ought to be corrected. The birth of Lodovico's eldest son, Maximilian, took place in February, 1493, and not, as stated (vol. II., p. 191), in 1491; and the grant of lands to the Duke's mistress, Lucrezia Crivelli, was made in July, 1497, several months after, and not before, the death of his wife, Beatrice d'Este. Again, the Court physician, Gabriele Pirovano, and the Duke's favourite astrologer, Ambrogio Varese da Rosate, whom he raised to the dignity of Count, were two distinct individuals, and not, as M. Müntz tells us, one and the same personage. A more serious blunder is the accusation of treachery which our author brings against Lodovico's son-in-law, Galeazzo di San Severino. Far from betraying his father-in-law to Louis XII., this gallant soldier and accomplished gentleman shared Lodovico's good and evil fortunes alike, and, after following him into his German exile and returning with him to Milan during his brief hour of triumph, was carried into captivity by the Swiss after the fatal day of Novara. But, in spite of these mistakes, all that M. Müntz has to tell us of the relations between Leonardo and his Milanese patron is of deep interest. Il Moro's splendid liberality and refined taste, the ease and freedom which Leonardo enjoyed at his Court, the marvellous variety of works upon which he was engaged as ducal painter, sculptor, and engineer, are all eloquently described. Well might the great artist lament the succession of disasters which overwhelmed his illustrious patron, together with the whole Sforza race, in irretrievable ruin, and brought this brilliant episode of his own life to an abrupt close. It is the note of profound sadness and despair, not of bitter reproach, that breathes in the mournful lines which he wrote after he had taken refuge at Florence, ending with the words, "The Duke has lost his realm, his fortune, and his liberty. Not one of his undertakings has been finished." Leonardo's own hopes were blighted, his plans suddenly interrupted; he had lost home and friends, and seen the great equestrian statue on which he had spent so many years of continual labour destroyed by the French invaders. Now at fifty years of age he had to begin his career afresh. He found new and liberal patrons in Cæsar Borgia and the French King, and lived to execute other great works and end his days in peace and honour at the Court of Francis I., but he never found again a master as congenial or a friend whose sympathy was as stimulating as Lodovico Sforza.

Another portion of M. Müntz's work which merits attention is that which he devotes to Leonardo's studies in anatomy, geology, and physics. In all of these different departments we feel not only how vast was the knowledge which this singularly versatile master had acquired, but how far he was in advance of his age, and in how many different directions he anticipated the discoveries of modern science. Again, M. Müntz brings out better perhaps than any former biographer the influence of the antique upon the painter's artistic development, his intimate acquaintance with classical models, and the manner in which he had assimilated the spirit of Greek art. The point has been strongly disputed by modern critics, but in this case the present biographer is, we are convinced, wholly in the right.

When we come to M. Müntz's own opinions respecting the genuineness of the various works attributed to Leonardo, we must confess that we are on less solid ground. He is no doubt perfectly justified in maintaining the superiority of the Louvre "Virgin of the Rocks" over the National Gallery replica, and all that he says on this fiercely-contested subject is well worthy of attention, but when he goes on to class the Bacchus and St. John of the Louvre, and even the fresco in the convent of S. Onofrio on the Janiculan in Rome, among the master's indisputably genuine works, our faith in his critical powers receives a rude shock. After that, we are scarcely surprised to find that he dismisses the lovely profile portrait of a young girl which has lately passed from Mme. Minghetti's collection in Rome into that of Mr. Theodore Davis at Newport, U.S., as a modern forgery. But when he says that this opinion is shared by those connoisseurs who have seen the picture, we should like to remind him that Morelli, Dr. Richter, Signor Frizzoni, and Mr. Berenson have all pronounced the portrait to be an early work by Leonardo. It is not, in fact, for his criticism of the great Florentine's actual pictures that M. Eugène Müntz's work deserves to be studied, but for the useful summary of recent researches into Leonardo's history and for the elaborate and thoughtful analysis of his literary and artistic genius which it contains. Above all, in these handsome volumes we have a series of lovely pictures in which choice examples of Leonardo's drawings meet us on every page and help us to realize at once the exquisite grace and purity of the great master's line and the surpassing beauty of his dreams.

THE "HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE."

The Mediæval Empire. By Herbert Fisher, New College, Oxford. Two Vols. 9½ x 5½ in., viii. + 350 + 308 pp. London, 1898. Macmillan, 21/- n.

We welcome with pleasure the appearance of an English book of solid merit dealing with the history of mediæval Germany, a subject neglected more than any other section of the Middle Ages by writers on this side of the Channel. It seems strange that our historians should always be attracted by France and Italy, and never touch on the annals of our Teutonic kinsmen ; but we know of no work of real importance written in English and dealing with Germany in pre-Reformation days, with the single exception of Mr. Bryce's "Holy Roman Empire." Even that admirable book may be described rather as a brilliant and suggestive sketch than a detailed narrative : the Middle Ages cannot be crammed into three hundred small octavo pages without some sacrifice of essentials.

Mr. Fisher's new book is not a history, but a series of historical studies. We shall still have to wait—probably for years—before an English writer expounds to us the real political meaning of the reigns of Arnulf, or Lewis the Bavarian, or Frederic III., by dint of detailing their annals. But meanwhile we are grateful to have detached portions and aspects of German history made clear to us in the lucid and businesslike style of Mr. Fisher. The general student of history may gather from his pages facts concerning the differences between German and English feudalism, the development and progress of German law, the machinery of the Imperial Administration in Italy, which were never before accessible to him in an English form. He may study the influence of racial divisions on the internal economy of the empire, and follow out the rise of the chief princely families of the later Middle Ages. We especially commend for study the account of the great Babenberg house in Austria, which has never before met with proper attention. It was this race which built up the power that the Hapsburgs were to turn to such effect, yet their name is hardly known to us. How often have we seen the Austrian Leopold of the Third Crusade—Cœur de Lion's enemy—treated as a Hapsburg by writers who ought to have known better ? How invariably does the misty "Austria-Limoges" of King John strut across the stage with the Hapsburg arms upon his surcoat ? The section, however, of Mr. Fisher's book which the student will find most unfamiliar and most suggestive is undoubtedly the admirable chapters dealing with German law. The subject is extraordinarily difficult to the English reader, who comes to it fresh from the comparatively simple and well-compacted law of our own medieval courts. By the reign of William the Conqueror the English system had advanced as far as the German got in the eighteenth century ; by the reign of Henry of Anjou we had obtained a hierarchy of courts and a system of procedure such as Germany was never to know. The greatest misfortune of the empire was that the strong Emperors of the early Middle Ages never succeeded in establishing a single law for their whole realm. It is hard to imagine what would have happened in England if Mercian law or the "North Peoples' Law" had persisted alongside with Wessex law down to the fourteenth century. Yet the corresponding state of things went on in Germany, all through the Middle Ages, with the most chaotic results. What could be more absurd than to find a Brunswick duke of the thirteenth century "living Swabian law" among Low German subjects who "live Saxon law," merely because his Welf ancestors had an original Swabian domicile ? Again, how strange to English ears is the legal maxim that the Emperor, wherever he may be born and whatever his ancestry, must "live Frankish (Franconian) law." What with national law, feudal law, town law, and exotic Roman law superimposed upon the rest, the German legal practice (system there was none) is almost incomprehensible. The only way out of the chaos would have been the crushing of local usage by a powerful Imperial Court ; but such an institution never came into existence.

A comparison between the history of the medieval Imperial Court and the Curia Regis of England [says Mr. Fisher] reveals the secret of the long political disunion of Germany. . . . The task of seeing that every man got his rights was, as Conrad II. observed, a work of enormous difficulty. It could clearly only be performed by a large exercise of delegation. It required a strong, central, permanent Court, with a professional band of royal Judges, fixed and itinerant. But such a Court was never formed in Germany. The King's Court exercised little influence in shaping German law. Its composition was arbitrary and fluctuating. Like the chameleon, it changed colour with the surface over which it travelled. When the King came into Saxony, Saxon litigants flocked to his Court, and his Court would be mainly composed of Saxon nobles and Princes. The law administered would be Saxon law, the principles would be the traditional Saxon principles. But in Swabia the Court would be mainly Swabian, in Bavaria mainly Bavarian.

Hence case-made Imperial law could not come into existence ; an admirable Swabian precedent would have no power or meaning in Bavaria ; a decision made at Goslar would have no quotable force at Vienna. We reach the height of administrative absurdity when it is seriously urged that the Emperor and his Court cannot give a valid decision except on the very soil of the region where the decision is to take effect. With such theories in existence, it is obvious that no central fixed Court could be readily accepted by the whole of the German duchies. Yet we cannot doubt that a strong man might have stamped down local resistance and united his realm by the best of all ties. But, unfortunately, the phantom of the Roman Empire and the dream of the domination of the whole world always intervened. The German Kings—even the strongest and wisest of them—turned aside to snatch at the shadow, and the tangible benefit of national unity on the Rhine and Elbe and Danube slipped from their grasp.

SCHOOL HISTORIES.

Annals of Westminster School. By John Sargeaunt. 9 x 6 in., x. + 303 pp. London, 1898. Methuen. 7/6

This book is one of the latest of a series dealing with the history of our great public schools, and the subject is worthy of the book. For no school has a more interesting past than Westminster. Her close connexion with the foundations of Christ Church, Oxford, and Trinity, Cambridge, the old institution of the Play, the peculiar customs of Maundy money and the throwing of the Pancake, her ancient right to hear Debates in the House of Commons, her privileges in the Abbey at State ceremonies, and especially at coronations, when Westminster scholars are held to represent the people of England in being the first to acclaim the new Sovereign—all those things mark her out from other schools, and give her a position all her own.

And the book is not unworthy of its subject. It practically starts with the reconstruction of the college by Queen Elizabeth, and the daily school life of those days is, by the writer's research, made as clear to us as that of the modern boy. Two good chapters are devoted to the reign of Dr. Busby, whose name will be remembered until schoolmasters are forgotten. The whole of his long life was passed in close connexion with the school, of which he was headmaster for no less than fifty-seven years. As Mr. Sargeaunt says :—

The unrivalled length and the unsurpassed success of his mastership, the tenacity with which through great political changes he clung to his post, the dominance of his intellect, and the terror of his rod have raised his name above all of his profession.

The education he gave was a purely classical one, and he turned out many famous men, including Dryden and Christopher Wren ; but when we read that Hebrew and Arabic formed part of his regular school curriculum, we cannot deny that South had some ground for his charge that Westminster under Busby was inconfusa Babel.

Passing over the chapters on Knipe, Freind, and John Nicoll, who is chiefly known to fame as the master of Warren Hastings, we begin to arrive at modern times. The author touches with a tender hand the miserable financial disputes which arose in the early half of this century between school and Chapter, and which nearly resulted in the school's extinction. It was a more pleasing task to write of its revival under Liddell, and its renewed growth under Scott and Dr. Rutherford.

The book justifies its title by its fulness in dates and facts, and will be a valuable work of reference to those interested in the school's history. The general reader, however, may not find enough life and variety for his purpose. The writer often prefers to hint at some interesting character, or humorous tale, or picturesque description, rather than to draw them out in detail.

To take a single instance, Rowing at Westminster is dismissed in two or three pages, though its association with Eton in this pastime in the early part of this century is among Westminster's proudest memories. The coxswain of the famous boat of 1837 was fond of relating in after years how lavishly the Westminster crew were entertained at Windsor Castle before the race, and how abundantly their glasses—and especially the coxswain's—were kept filled from the Royal cellars, but all to no purpose. What followed may be described in the words of William Rogers, who rowed number five in the Eton boat :—

“ On the day of the race the King said to Lord Howe :— ‘ What carriage shall I have to-day ? ’ The answer was :— ‘ Your Majesty ought not to go out ; you are too unwell. ’ But he meant, he said, to see the race. I remember well his figure, seated in a closed carriage, wrapped in a white great-coat, about 150 yards from the bridge. As soon as he saw that the Westminsters were ahead, he pulled down the blinds and drove back to the Castle, which I do not think he afterwards left.”

The palmy days of Westminster are in the past, and, though it continues to do good, solid work, it has not the importance it had of old. Doubtless one chief cause of this condition is that London's gigantic growth has wrapped it round. Within the memory of men yet living, Westminster might still be called a country school. Its situation remains the same, but Busby or even Vincent would not recognize its surroundings. The brook running under its south wall, with the marshes beyond, the pleasant country road to Chelsea, the open fields to the north, stretching up from St. James's Park to Hampstead and Highgate, have all been sacrificed, and the schoolboys no longer breathe the scent of hay and clover, but the exhausted “ reekie ” air of the heart of London. The building of the Thames Embankment has rendered boating impossible, while the cricket fields are only approached through squalid streets. Changes in institutions are seldom made quickly, but those who best regard the welfare of the school may, perhaps, hold the opinion that, while London requires all her day schools, she has no further need of resident scholars and boarding-houses at Westminster.

It was proper that THE HISTORY OF TONBRIDGE SCHOOL (Rivingtons, 12s. 6d.) should be written. Old Tonbridgians had both the right and the desire to be fully informed upon the subject ; and Mr. Septimus Rivington has (in the enlarged second edition of a book which first appeared in 1869) adequately performed the task of bringing together all that is knowable concerning that ancient academy. His failure to produce a book that is likely to interest the community at large is due to the fact that Tonbridge School shares the happiness attributed by the philosopher to the peoples that have no history. There have been no memorable rebellions there, as at Eton and Rugby, and no famous headmasters, like Busby, and Udall, and Arnold, and Keate. The school is old enough. Its foundation was practically contemporaneous with that of Harrow, Rugby, Merchant Taylors', and Repton ; but it was only under the rule of Dr. Wood, now promoted to succeed Dr. Welldon, that it achieved a really extensive celebrity. For the rest, it has merely kept the even tenor of its way, turning out a fair proportion of sound scholars and useful citizens, but doing little to impress its individuality upon the world.

The list of distinguished alumni of the various headmasters is, perhaps, the most interesting feature of Mr. Rivington's book. The part which Tonbridge has played in English education can be best set forth by reciting the names of the more eminent of them. They include Thomas Herbert, eighth Earl of Pembroke, Admiral Peter Rainier, Admiral Sir Sidney Smith, General Dumoustier (of Napoleon's Young Guard), Julius Hare, Judge Homersham Cox, William Alexander Bishop of Derry, Albany Fonblanque, Professor Charles H. Pearson, General Brackenbury, Sir Reginald Hanson, E. W. B. Nicholson (Bodley's Librarian), W. R. Morfill, and A. J. Mounteney Jephson. It is a list that, obviously, is something more than respectable ; but it also is a list that reflects more credit on the later headmasters than on the earlier ones, and shows how recently Tonbridge School has begun to rank among notable seats of learning. The book is excellently illustrated from old prints, modern photographs, and cadastral surveys ; and various old Tonbridgians have contributed notes on the school sports. Among others the Rev. W. Rashleigh, the well-known cricketer, writes of the pastime in which he excels.

CONTINENTAL DRAMATIC CRITICISM

Drame Ancien, Drame Moderne. By Emile Faguet. 7x4jin., 274 pp. Paris, 1898. Colin. Fr.3.50

M. Faguet's book is only new in the sense that even the oldest subjects acquire a fresh interest when treated by an able writer. In fact, it is rather a collection of disconnected articles on some principles of dramatic art than an elaborate discussion of any particular theme, or exclusively a comparison of the ancient and modern drama, as the title would suggest. In an avant propos on “ la Nature de l'émotion dramatique ” is an interesting recapitulation of the various definitions of the dramatic emotion.

The definition of Saint-Marc-Girardin, “ The source of dramatic emotion is the sympathy of man for man,” the author rejects. His own theory is that “ we go to see a tragedy at the theatre in pursuit of that pleasure which man's sufferings afford to his fellow-man,” and he attributes the popularity of the drama to man's innate ferocity, an assertion which, however, he tempers by another, “ it is because men love truth in art that they love sadness in art.” And sadness he holds is the motive of comedy as of tragedy, for while tragedy represents human misfortune in its terrible, comedy represents it in its ridiculous, aspects. When, he asks, was happiness ever the subject of a play, or did a dramatic writer ever paint a honeymoon but at the moment when it “ commence de s'aggraver ” ? If men loved the spectacle of human happiness, they would have created a drama illustrating it, and no such drama has ever existed. M. Faguet adds to these sources of the dramatic emotion—viz., human malignity and love of truth—a love of reflection ; these are the sentiments awakened in the spectator by the pictures presented by the drama. The fundamental difference between the Greek, English, and French conceptions of tragedy, which should constitute particularly the subject of the book, according to its title, M. Faguet discusses, to our mind, with too much brevity. His view may be summed up as follows :—

The Greeks were essentially lovers of beauty in its calm purity of line and “ nobility of attitude ” ; as in their sculpture, so on their stage. Their system was to take a simple story and surround it with the marvels of all the arts, thus composing a complete æsthetic whole. The English are lovers of reality, and like “ the complex in character because life is complicated.” They seek to embrace life in all its variety, and they draw into the main story the side issues which are inseparable from reality, so as to form a rich picture of life as life is. The French, lovers of reason, seek the “ abstract in character because an abstract character is an idea.” They take a simple action and so dispose cause and effect as to develop from given premises a logical though unforeseen conclusion :—

Il y a un sculpteur, un musicien, un lyrique, un épique dans tout dramatisse grec ; dans tout dramatisse anglais il y a un historien, un moraliste, un philosophe ; dans tout dramatisse français il y a un dialecticien, un orateur, et un professeur de morale.

The author illustrates his comparison by three typical national tragedies, Antigone, Romeo and Juliet, and Le Cid. The same subject is common to them all—lovers separated by a family feud. Antigone and Hæmon do not struggle against the obstacles opposed to their love ; Antigone goes straight to duty and to death, and her lover follows her. There is no painting of character, no moral conflict, all is subordinated to the laws of harmony and beauty ; the play is a succession of grand tableaux, accompanied by the strains of the chorus, echoing the spirit of each scene as it passes. Romeo and Juliet hear only the voice of love, and, sweeping aside law, duty, family honour, and traditions, they too go to death. Life, in its varied incidents and character, in all its complexity and changes, is painted with startling reality. As in the Greek drama, there is no study of moral conflict. The story of Chimène and Rodrigue is the conflict of opposing moral forces, in the passion that unites the lovers, and the duty which separates them. Of the beauty sought for by the Greeks, of the vivid realism of the English tragedy, there is nothing. All is subordinated to the laws of reason and logic. In the representation of such luttres morales, says the author, French tragedy excels, and hence, he maintains, it is the most moral of the three, the most healthy, and the most elevating.

To the readers of M. Faguet's admirable weekly articles in the Débats these views are more or less familiar, but they will be welcome to everybody in the handier collected form.

Le Théâtre au Portugal. By Henri Lyonnet. 7 x 4 1/2 in., 298 pp. Paris, 1898. Ollendorf. Fr. 3.50

This book is the second of a series called "Le Théâtre Hors de France," the first of which, "Le Théâtre en Espagne," was reviewed in Literature last May. If the present volume is not so interesting as that on the Spanish stage, it is less the fault of the author than that of the state of the drama in Portugal. This country, so close to Spain and so akin to it in race and history, is, says M. Lyonnet, its very "moral antipodes," and its theatre is entirely different. Neither "Zarzuela," which is the most popular of all Spanish theatrical entertainments, nor the system of "sections"—i.e., representations lasting one hour, and succeeding each other through the evening—exists in Portugal. In Spain there is a new programme every night; in Portugal, as in Paris, pieces are played while they continue to "draw." "Too many" theatres and not enough public is a criticism which explains why many of the theatres are only open three days out of four, and why managers so frequently fail to cover their expenses. The Théâtre D. Maria II., opened at Lisbon in 1846, was intended to be exclusively reserved for producing Portuguese plays, but the plan failed from lack of national authors, and recourse is now had to French, German, and English translations, Portuguese audiences having a strong dislike to Spanish plays, as indeed to all other things Spanish. Le Marquis de Villemér, L'Ami Fritz, Hamlet, Othello, Le Bibliothécaire (from the German), Ibsen's Borkmann have all been translated and are frequently played.

The favourite Portuguese entertainment, however, is the "Revue," which, according to M. Lyonnet, "invades everywhere, takes possession of everything, and is the only thing that pays." Portuguese authors excel in the writing of these "Revue," which, like those of Paris, seem to be a succession of comic scenes, skits on the latest inventions, scandals, and social and political events, with songs which are often witty, and dialogue which is sometimes "brutally" indecent. Of the artistic powers of the Portuguese actors the author speaks with warm admiration, especially of Brazão, João Rosa, Augusto Rosa (co-managers of the Théâtre D. Maria II.), and the old Taborda, whose portraits bear some likeness to those of the famous Samson. Here is a description of him:—

Imagine a last year's apple, wrinkled in every direction, up and down and across. Look close, and you will find a little of everything in Taborda's face: mountains, valleys, canals, precipices!

It is inconceivable that such a man—and the portraits in the book bear out this description—should have appeared, as M. Lyonnet assures us, with wonderful effect in the elegant part of "Marquis de la Seiglière"! M. Lyonnet remarks that with such excellent actors there is not one good actress.

COPYRIGHT.

Seven Lectures on the Law and History of Copyright in Books. By Augustine Birrell, M.P. 7 1/2 x 5 in., 228 pp. London, 1890. Cassell. 3/6 n.

Mr. Augustine Birrell's little tract on the History of Copyright is a reprint of "the more popular" of a series of "Eighteen Lectures on the general subject of Copyright," lately delivered at University College, London; and the presumption is that it is intended for the general, rather than for the professional, reader. There is not enough in it to fortify the lawyer who is called upon to advise a client on a delicate and difficult point; the vexed question of Canadian Copyright, in particular, is passed over with scant ceremony, and without even a mention of the leading case of "Smiles v. Bedford," the decision which, at the present hour, protects the British author from the piratical propensities of the Canadian printer. On the other hand, for the man of letters who desires to acquire a gentlemanly knowledge of his rights and vested interests, Mr. Birrell will be found an admirable guide. He begins in the days before printing was invented, and shows how large was the industry of "multiplying copies," even in those early times. "At the date of the invention of printing there were in Paris and Orleans alone ten thousand copyists." He describes the privileges of the Worshipful Company of Stationers, for whose benefit it was decreed, in the time of Charles II., that "no haberdasher, ironmonger, chandler, shopkeeper, or any other person not having been seven years' apprentice to a bookseller, printer, or bookbinder," should be permitted to sell books. He narrates the struggle of the booksellers, in the reign of Queen Anne, to get copyright declared to be perpetual under the Common Law, and quotes the eloquent judgment (afterwards overruled) of Lord Mansfield in their favour. Finally, he discusses the extent to which authors are justified in pilfering from each other, and expounds the Law of Copyright as it stands at the present time. It is all done in a light and entertaining style, and though rather superficial, is, perhaps, thorough enough for the particular audience addressed.

Where a certain number of authors are likely to be dissatisfied with Mr. Birrell is in his treatment of the subject of perpetual copyright. As an author himself, he might be expected to be in favour of it. But he dismisses the idea curtly, and almost contemptuously, thus:—

Perpetual copyright is dead. Nobody cares about it any longer. The average life of a book! What is it? Did Glover's "Leonidas" belong to me, would I republish it in the age of Rudyard Kipling? On the other hand, would we tolerate the ownership of "Paradise Lost" by Mr. Symond's assignee? . . . We would not tolerate it, and there is an end of it. The world is governed by ideas, and one of its ideas is that authors and artists are entitled to reasonable protection for their books and pictures, and nothing more.

It is a hard saying, and scarcely one to be let pass as a self-evident proposition. The world may be governed by ideas, but the one thing that is absolutely certain about popular ideas is that they change as time goes on. Otherwise no reforms of any kind could ever be carried. And the argument suggested by the reference to Symond's assignee is easily disposed of by the use of an analogy. A fairly parallel case would be that of a moneylender entering into possession of the ancestral estate of a great family as a sequel to the foreclosure of a mortgage. Public sentiment shows no disposition to invalidate such a moneylender's title—even though he proves himself a worse landlord than the nobleman whom he has displaced; and there is no reason to suppose that public sentiment would be any more hostile to literary property, if literary property were raised from the dignity of leasehold to that of freehold. It might be necessary, of course, to impose certain limitations on the rights of the holders of copyrights, so as to prevent eccentric assignees from deliberately suppressing masterpieces; but here again our analogy is helpful. No owner of any kind of property has an absolute right to do what he likes with his own to the annoyance or inconvenience of his neighbours; and the case of Symond's assignee publishing "Paradise Lost," against his will, by order of the Court, is parallel with that of the landlord compelled, against his will, to sell his ground because it is wanted for a railway. Such are a few of the considerations that present themselves; and there are others. Perpetual Copyright existed, for a few years, in the reign of Queen Anne, and nothing terrible happened. The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge enjoy perpetual copyright in certain books at the present day, and their privilege does not seem likely to be terminated by a revolution. On behalf of a client Mr. Birrell would point out all this—and more besides—with admirable eloquence. It seems a pity that he shrinks from arguing the case on behalf of that great company of authors of which he is so distinguished an ornament.

CLASSICAL.

Cæsar De Bello Gallico. Books I.—VII. According to the Text of Emmanuel Hoffman (Vienna, 1890.) Edited with Introduction and Notes by St. George Stock. 9×6 in., 224+334 pp. Oxford, 1898. Clarendon Press. 10/6

"Truly a wonderful man was Caius Julius Cæsar," exclaimed Miles Standish, as he read the "Commentaries," "out of the Latin translated by Arthur Golding of London," a book which, with the Bible and Bariffe's "Artillery Guide," formed the pièces de resistance of his library. The Puritan Captain's study of the original Latin, had he ventured on it, would not have been much assisted by such an edition as this, in which the notes are few and far between. It is a book for scholars, not for passmen or schoolboys. But, even the plain and luminous brevity, as Cicero calls it, of Cæsar's style sometimes needs explanation; and it is a little surprising, on turning to so well known a crux as the description of the bridge over the Rhine, to find hardly a word of explanation in the notes; though at the end of the volume there is given in compensation a literal translation of the passage "for the benefit of those who may require it"—a concession to human weakness of which we have not been ashamed to avail ourselves. The real end or final cause, as we take it, of Mr. Stock's edition is the introduction of over 200 pages, which embraces, in addition to a short étude on Cæsar himself as "writer and fighter," a long chapter on the history of Roman wars with the Gauls, accounts of ancient Gaul, Britain, and Germany, and an exhaustive treatise on the constitution of the Roman army. The treatment of Cæsar as a historian, which we are told is the main object of the book, is thus considerably overlaid with incidental, though perhaps not altogether extraneous, matter; and the impression given is that the author has tried to bring in all that he knows in connexion with his subject—an impression which somewhat detracts from the effect of his work. A great deal of valuable information is put at our disposal. But for effectiveness—we say nothing about accuracy—this sketch cannot compare with Froude's "Cæsar," a work of which, curiously enough, Mr. Stock makes no mention, though he highly extols the labours of Napoleon III. as an elucidator of Cæsar.

"A wonderful man was this Cæsar!" We echo Miles Standish as we read about him. With regard to his history, Mr. Stock truly points out that, although it is no longer the text book of every soldier, its historical value does not diminish. "The Gallic War may be regarded as the first chapter of modern history; and it is difficult to overrate the importance of a work in which France, Germany, Switzerland, Belgium, and Britain all make their début on the world's stage." In Cæsar, more perhaps than in any other historical work, we have history at first hand, from the man who made it. And though Cæsar is his own sole authority for much of the narrative, the directness and simplicity and modest truthfulness with which it is told have commanded universal confidence. Criticism of his statements is difficult in the absence of independent evidence; but such collateral testimony as is furnished by writers like Dio Cassius, Plutarch, Suetonius, Velleius Paterculus, and others does not in any way tend to impugn Cæsar's veracity. Mr. Stock's estimate of Cæsar's personal character does not materially differ from that of other writers, nor has he any new light to throw upon one of the greatest figures in all history. Only 33 pages out of 224 of the introduction deal directly with Cæsar himself. Of the rest we can only repeat that it is learned and long, with much interesting information upon the early stages of European civilization, our own included.

Vellei Paterculi ad M. Vinicium libri duo. Ex Amerbachii præcipue apographo edidit et emendavit R. Ellis, Litt. Latt. Professor Publicus apud Oxonienses. xxiii.+194 pp. Oxonii, MDCCCXCVIII. E typographeo Clarendoniano. 6/-

It seems almost disrespectful to the learned editor of a work in which, so far as we can see, the only English words occur in citations from Bentley and E. A. Freeman, to use plain English in calling attention to its merits. The mundane question of price, however, must, in the heading to this notice, be expressed in terms of English coinage. And even, could we hope to handle the Latin language with anything like the Professor's scholarly grace, we should hardly do him justice in our readers' eyes. Whether Velleius Paterculus is worthy of the pains here bestowed upon his text may perhaps be questioned. He was one of the numerous writers holding official positions under the early Empire, dependent on Court favour, and, though fairly trustworthy with respect to early Roman history, looking on contemporary affairs through Court spectacles. He had served under Tiberius, and afterwards, by his influence, rose through the minor offices to the prætorship. His work is an abridgment of Roman history in two books (Book I. incomplete), giving a rapid survey of the early period, and becoming more diffuse as he nears his own time and extols the glories of Cæsarism. Brutus and Cassius are in his view parricides, Cæsar is the divine founder of an era culminating in the divine Tiberius. He is well-intentioned, but loquacious and pretentious in style: and his value as an exemplar of Latin style is about on a par with his merits as a historian—second-rate, if not third-rate, throughout.

Such as he is, however, Velleius here serves as a peg upon which to hang a piece of first-class scholarly work. The materials for the text, Professor Ellis shows, are but scanty, being practically confined to a single copy of a MS. discovered in 1515, but afterwards lost, and the editio princeps of Beatus Rhenanus in 1520. This MS. (Cod. Murbacensis) came from the Benedictine monastery at Murbach on the borders of Alsace and Switzerland, and is described by Rhenanus as corrupt and mutilated. It was collated by one Burer, an amanuensis of Rhenanus, and then disappeared; and with it disappeared the textual criticism of Velleius until 1834, when Orelli discovered at Basle, and edited, a copy made by Bonifacius Amerbach in 1516. In taking this as the basis of his edition, Professor Ellis is at some pains to show that it cannot be the copy mentioned by Rhenanus as "properanter ac infelicitè ab amico quodam descriptum"; and as no one can prove that it is, the Professor is entitled to his opinion.

One of the most interesting features of Professor Robinson Ellis' edition is to be found in the experiments which he makes in the matter of conjectural emendation. Conjectural emendation is the delight and the temptation of scholars; but, considering the unsatisfactory nature of the evidence for the text of Velleius, Professor Ellis has used this weapon with moderation. The following, among others, are ingenious emendations. In II., 25, 4, the Amerbachian copy reads "posuit victoriam qua demendes montem ti fata cum C. Norbano concurrerat Sylla"—an apparently hopeless corruption; but Professor Ellis reads "post victoriam, quia de meridie sub montem Tifata," &c. In II., 68, 1 ("cum in modica quidem servari posset,") rejecting Madwig's emendation "cum ne in modica quidem fide," he suggests two others, the second of which, "ne modica quidem eiurare posset," is tempting; eiurare being used in the technical sense of disclaiming upon oath the ability to pay debts, which fits in with the sense of the passage. Still happier is the suggestion on II., 111, 4 (of Tiberius) "quanto cum temperamento simul utilitatis res auctoritate imperatoris agi vidimus," that simul is the remains of a fuller word, simulata. "Simulare utilitatem," as Professor Ellis points out, would be characteristic of Tiberius, who often (in anticipation of some modern Frenchmen) urged that delay in carrying out his schemes would be injurious to the army. There is force, too, in his argument against various proposed emendations of the word utilitatis, that this particular word is a favourite with Velleius. Other emendations, equally ingenious, are less convincing: e.g., conamine for "carmine" in II. 36, 2 "neque alio in suscepti operis sui carmine minorem Catullum," where the change seems unnecessary; or incolumes for "in omnes," II. 52, 4, "neque antiquius quicquam habuit (Cæsar) quam ut in omnes partes, ut militari verbo et consuetudine utar, dimitteret." As the text stands, it makes sense, the technical expression (militare verbum) being in omnes partes dimittere, of disbanding a beaten army. Professor Ellis makes it to be partes—a party or "side." But is partes specially a "militare verbum," and does not the expression "verbo et consuetudine" apply better to "in omnes partes dimittere"? "Hæremus in hac interpretatione, ut scholastico verbo utamur."

The book is small and unpretending in appearance, and the text, as we have said, is of no great value as literature. But the "apparatus criticus" and the notes are work that do credit to the editor and to the university which he worthily represents in the field of Latin scholarship.

P. Ovidi Nasonis Heroides. With the Greek Translation of Planudes. Edited by the late Arthur Palmer, Litt.D., Hon. D.C.L. (Oxon.), &c. 9x6in., ix.+542 pp. Oxford, 1898. Clarendon Press. 21/-

This posthumous work of one of the best Latin scholars of his time, edited and completed by his colleague, Mr. Louis C. Purser, is, like Munro's "Lucretius," valuable as much for its general lights on Latin scholarship as for the elucidation of the particular writings which have occasioned it. The "Heroides" of Ovid—or, as they were originally and more correctly called, "Heroidum Epistolæ"—are neither very difficult nor supremely interesting. They exhibit many of the merits and defects of Ovid's poetry—its apparently endless command of graceful language and flowing versification, with a lack of serious purpose or "moral fibre," and very little depth of thought. They are, as Mr. Purser explains in the well-written introduction which, at his friend's parting request, he has contributed to the work, of the nature of "suasoriæ," or declamations, upon the subject of deserted or unprosperous love, cast into the form of letters from heroines of legend and drama—Penelope, Cænone, Dido, Ariadne, Sappho, Laodamia, &c. The "suasoriæ" of the rhetorical schools were soliloquies or monologues of celebrated characters in given situations—e.g., Agamemnon deliberating whether he shall sacrifice Iphigenia, or Sulla on resigning his dictatorship, or, as Persius tells us (iii. 45), Cato contemplating suicide; and Mr. Purser reminds us that Tennyson's "Lucretius" is an example of the same thing in modern poetry. Ovid's claim to originality in the "Heroides" made by himself (ignotum hoc aliis ille novavit opus, A. A., iii., 346), and admitted by his contemporaries, seems to have been that he transferred these "suasoriæ" from prose to poetry, and from the deliberative to the epistolary form. On the merits of his work as a vehicle for the description of emotion and the delineation of character, Mr. Purser has some discriminating remarks, the conclusion of which is that, on the whole, Ovid has made a great deal of his subject, and that the Heroides have won not a great, but a moderate and well-deserved, success. They were known and referred to by Dante and Chaucer; imitated by Pope (in "Eloisa to Abelard") and by Michael Drayton (in "England's Heroical Epistles"); and frequently translated or imitated in Germany, France, and Italy during the Middle Ages and the Renaissance.

A new feature of the present edition is the full text of a translation of the "Heroides" into Greek prose, by Maximus Planudes, a Byzantine monk of Constantinople in the thirteenth century. Planudes' knowledge of Latin was imperfect, as, e.g., when he translates regia tota by ἡ χώρα πᾶσα (regio), silices by ὄπρις (ilices), or quascunque aspicias, lacrimæ fecere lituras (Her., iii., 3) by πάντα ὅσαπερ ὄπρις σπαιχίτα (i.e., literals) τοῖς ἑσὶν ἐγέμερο δάκρυον. But he used a MS. often as good as, and sometimes better than Codex Parisinus (P) of the eleventh century, the best existing MS. of the "Heroides"; and his version is often of use to confirm or correct its readings. Mr. Purser has also printed, by Professor Palmer's special desire, a copy of the

MS. corrections and conjectures by Bentley, which were given in the Oxford edition of 1825, but not always accurately. The present volume thus contains, besides a commentary full of valuable matter on points of Latin scholarship and literature, very complete materials for the textual criticism of the "Heroides." Professor Palmer, it appears, had completed the commentary on Epp. i.—xiv., written the larger part of his notes on xv.—xvii., and jotted down rough notes on the remainder. Mr. Purser's work has been to write the general introduction and complete the commentary—a work which, so far as we can judge, he has performed not unworthily of his friend's reputation. Professor Palmer's notes—from which we need not dissociate those of his literary executor—are admirably clear and appreciative, and full of varied information, without being overloaded or pedantic; and students of other Latin authors than Ovid may often refer to them with advantage. We may instance as good specimens the notes on vi. 47, in which the reading Dodonide pinu (Planudes) is upheld against that of most MSS. and editors—Tritonide pinu; or that on ix. 109, 110, explaining a metaphor derived (as many in Ovid) from legal phraseology. But any one who uses the book will find others equally instructive.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

IN EDWARD MEYRICK GOULBURN (Murray, 5s.), Mr. Berdmore Compton gives us a memoir of quite exemplary brevity, but sufficient, we think, to commemorate and depict the career of the author of "Thoughts on Personal Religion." That book is the best known among many works of Goulburn's, and is in itself perhaps the best memorial of him. Mr. Berdmore Compton, who worked with him at Rugby, in taking us through Goulburn's life as Headmaster, as London clergyman, and as Dean of Norwich, shows a keen appreciation of his personal holiness, and sympathizes with his uncompromising hostility to later developments of Biblical criticism. The first quality was that which distinguished him among Headmasters, though he cannot be regarded as so successful as his predecessor at Rugby, Tait, or as Tait's predecessor, Arnold. Yet there may be truth, if there is some exaggeration, in Mr. Berdmore Compton's remark that "his deeply-ingrained humility was exactly the antidote required to counteract the self-asserting, anti-reverential spirit which was the bane of the Arnold system." The second quality—the hatred of Liberalism in religion—has to some extent tended to lessen the great popularity his writings at the time gained. Originally an Evangelical, he became more and more in sympathy with the Anglicanism which was "reviving" when he was at Oxford, but he nevertheless sympathized with the following remarks, which, as now published by his biographer, have, considering the source from which they come, an interest at the present moment:—

The Ritualists, as a body, are wanting in humility. They think every one wrong but themselves, and themselves gifted with inerrancy, though not in the abstract with infallibility. It must be very comforting to be a Ritualist, to think oneself incapable of a mistake, if it were but true.

This was written about 1874, in a private letter to Mr. Berdmore Compton by Dr. Pusey. We have in this volume tersely and effectively set before us a character of great beauty, which reveals itself not only in Mr. Berdmore Compton's pages, but in the delightful portrait prefixed to them.

Mr. M. S. Monier-Williams, the author of the latest volume in the Isthmian Library, FIGURE SKATING (Innes, 5s.), says in his preface:—

The latter-day writer on the art of skating has no easy task before him. . . . It is necessary to avoid needless repetition of the old and excellent teaching of earlier writers, but, at the same time, to throw as much light as possible on the old paths.

Certainly nowadays skating literature has assumed considerable dimensions, but the perfect book, which shall be of use to both expert and beginner, yet remains to be written. If this volume is meant to be popular, and for the beginner only, the author has succeeded admirably. The historical part of the subject is interesting, and the advice on the simple turns and edges is excellent, but we had hoped for something more, for those more particular points and finesses of skating which make the expert as compared with the average skater. Mr. Monier-Williams tells us that combined figure skating has not made any great advance in late years; and he has not on this subject added to what he, with Messrs. Pidgeon and Dryden, gave us some time back in "Figure Skating Simple and Combined." What we read there, and again in this volume, is very lucid and good, but there are very many points of combined skating which would have been of great use had they been included, and which, as it is, have to be learned by bitter experience. "Continuous skating" is, as far as the Englishman is concerned, a thing of recent years, and there is still, as is excellently explained, great diversity of opinion as to the right and the wrong way of performing these fascinating figures, in that the Englishman, accustomed to bold, sweeping curves, is at a loss at first in performing small curly picture figures. It is, we suppose, for this reason that we are only given meagre instructions as to the performance of such figures as loops, cross cuts, and pigs' ears. This part of the subject was untouched by Vandervell and Witham, and barely touched in "Figure Skating Simple and Combined," and we are sadly in want of some full and explicit teaching. The diagrams throughout the volume are excellent, and it contains some capital skating photographs.

Mr. Cornwall-Jones' BRITISH MERCHANT SERVICE (Sampson Low, 14s.) is not what it professes to be on the title-page—namely, "A History of the British Mercantile Marine from the earliest times to the present day." The historical part is superficial to the last degree, and much even of the little the author does say has no connexion with the mercantile marine. He gives, for instance, more or less full accounts of such events as the fight with Eustace the Monk and the crusades to Portugal, which have no more place in a history of the mercantile marine than an account of the battle of Stirling would have in a history of the agricultural interest. Neither does it tend to make us overlook other deficiencies to find that this volume is freely illustrated by reproductions of Mr. E. W. Cooke's etchings without acknowledgment. If the rather pretentious historical chapters had been cut off and the author had confined himself to what is the real subject of his work, he would have written a fairly useful handbook, which would deserve to be found on the cabin tables of every passenger steamer. This "real subject" is the mercantile marine as it exists to-day—its laws, ranks, duties, pay, and allowances, the lighthouses, insurance offices, and other useful information. On all these subjects Mr. Cornwall-Jones seems to be amply informed, and can be consulted with satisfaction. The author's ill-regulated desire to be historical runs away with him even here. Thus, for example, he begins his chapter on sailing ships by plunging into the story of the American clippers and of their rivalry with the British ships, but he omits the necessary preliminaries. He does not tell what constituted "a clipper" nor why it had the advantage over the bluff English ship. The dramatic interest and the instruction of the story lie in the fact that the American proved that it paid to sacrifice cargo-carrying capacity in order to attain speed. He made three voyages to the two of the squat British ship, which adhered to a model adopted when a roomy hold was of very great importance and time was of very little. Therefore he could afford to carry a little less on each voyage. If Mr. Cornwall-Jones has the opportunity to do it he will be well advised to cut his book down by a third, by leaving out the historical matter and whatever in fact does not apply to steamers, lighthouses, &c. Reduced to its solid parts, his "British Merchant Service" would be a useful book to have at hand.

ASTRONOMY.

A HISTORY OF ASTRONOMY, by A. Berry (Murray, 6s.), is a book quite out of the common run of scientific histories. The author writes neither as a historian nor as an astronomer in the severely exact sense of those two words. The result is that he has produced an exceedingly novel and interesting volume, which is readable and conveys a vast amount of information. There is some lack of proportion in the arrangement of the contents, for 200 pages are devoted to pre-telescopic days and only 216 to post-telescopic days, the ratio of discoveries made and work done in the two epochs being (to put it very mildly) as one is to ten. Apparently Mr. Berry started writing his book on too ambitious a scale as regards pages, and had to pull in and wind up more curtly than he had intended. By the way, why does he persist in spelling Copernicus as Coppernicus?—though we are glad to see that Kepler, who has some claim to two "p's," is by Mr. Berry cut down to one "p." Some other names are curiously treated. Every astronomical student has heard of Hevelius of Danzig, but what percentage of readers would recognize him under the very British name of John Hevel? If "Hevelius" is to be treated as the Latin of a German "Hevel," at least Mr. Berry should have designated him as Johann Hevel. Similarly, Riccioli is the Latin form of a well-known seventeenth-century astronomer whom we decline to recognize in "John Baptist Riccioli." However, we are ready to commend Mr. Berry's history as a very acceptable addition to our historical Summaries of Astronomical Progress and as a useful, succinct record of events and of the lives of men. His account of Sir Isaac Newton is extremely well done, and we know of no one volume in which Newton's place in history is better tested or his claims better explained. This remark also applies to the labours of Laplace and the distinguished French mathematicians of the eighteenth century.

RECENT ADVANCES IN ASTRONOMY, by A. H. Fison, D.S. (Blackie, 2s. 6d.), is rather a disappointing book, and the author's preface is so curiously worded as almost to imply that he expects his readers to be of the same opinion. The author expressly says that it was suggested to him to "develop recent progress in astronomy historically." What he has done is to deal with "a few of the more interesting problems of modern astronomy in a series of separate essays." As a matter of fact the essays are exceedingly disjointed. The best passage in the sidereal portions of Dr. Fison's essays is undoubtedly that which treats of the variable star Algol and its dark satellite. We have nowhere seen this mysterious matter, and the several stages of patient investigation which have led up to our present phase of enlightenment respecting this celebrated short-period variable, so neatly and clearly unfolded. The chapter on the Milky Way is interesting, but displays so much more speculation than history that it cannot be called very edifying from the standpoint of a student who desires to learn what is known as distinguished from what is mere dreamland. Modern speculations as to the planet Mars are handled by Dr. Fison in a more discriminating and judicial spirit. He weighs and tests various recent discoveries (so-called)—e.g., Schiaparelli's canals—and finds adequate proofs wanting; and we agree with him. The chapter on the "analysis of sunlight" supplies the reader with a very good and intelligible explanation of what the solar spectrum is, how it was discovered by Newton and greatly developed by Fraunhofer, and how spectrum analysis has grown up to be a science; but all this, beginning as it does in A.D. 1672, and in an important degree worked out between 1802 and 1832, seems rather far-fetched material for a book on the "Recent Progress of Astronomy." The chapter on the analysis of starlight is more modern and to the point, and so is the closing chapter on the red flames seen in total solar eclipses; yet the Corona, the grand and startling feature of every good total eclipse—as to which so much progress has been made between 1860-98—is ignored by Dr. Fison; at least, it is disposed of in 6½ lines!

Astronomy is certainly one of the scientific subjects in which the United States can best endure comparison with the Old World. We have long had to look across the Atlantic, at least for the best elementary text-books of the subject, and Dr. David P. Todd's NEW ASTRONOMY (Low, 7s. 6d. n.) is a worthy companion to the somewhat more elaborate works of Professors Young and Newcomb. The most notable features in this admirable little book are its wealth of illustration and its practical nature. The diagrams and pictures will be found invaluable to those who are trying to pick up a modest knowledge of astronomy at a distance from an observatory, and such a frontispiece as is reproduced in colours from Kranz's fine painting of a total eclipse of the sun will give many well-informed readers a new sense of the weirdness of that phenomenon. Dr. Todd has written his book purely with a pedagogic purpose, he tells us, and "insistence upon rightness of principles, no matter how simple, has everywhere been preferred to display of precision in result. To instance a single example; although the pupil's equipment be but a yardstick, a pinhole, and the rule of three, will he not reap greater benefit from measuring the sun for himself than from learning mere detail of methods employed by astronomers in accurately measuring that luminary?" The schoolmaster engaged in teaching astronomy, or the student remote from laboratory and lecture-room who wants to learn it, could not do better than take Dr. Todd for a guide. Even the less seriously minded will find his book exceedingly readable.

Among my Books.

THE CLASSIC OF FORESTRY.

In these days of scientific progress, when the tilling of the fields and the husbandry of the woodlands have been reduced to arts strictly regulated by economic laws, and when, day by day, proof after proof is brought forward to demonstrate that it is only by rigidly following natural and economic laws that the earth can be made to yield its fullest measure of crops, it is with a feeling of envy that one can look back upon the literature of long ago.

How refreshing it is, like a cool sea-breeze on a hot summer's day, to turn from the study of the modern books on scientific Forestry—a summary of vegetable physiology saturated with agricultural chemistry and based on mathematics—and to solace one's leisure hours with the great ancient classic of Forestry, John Evelyn's "Sylva, or a Discourse of Forest Trees." It is like quitting the busy streets filled with the din and bustle of modern traffic, and resting for a while in the peaceful quiet of some cloister or old-world building, surrounded by a beautiful garden filled with umbrageous trees. Other ancient books on Forestry are likewise quaint and interesting, but they lack the special charm which Evelyn's "Sylva" always exercises. It is not merely the greater age of the latter which lends the added charm; it is a subtle beauty and a grace of style which is such that, of all the books which may be written on Forestry, none other can hope to dispute the unique place in literature which Evelyn's masterpiece has held ever since it was written.

John Evelyn is one of the most lovable characters among the men of his time. Born in 1620, during the reign of King James I., he lived till 1705, when Queen Anne was on the Throne. During this time he filled many public appointments, principally as Commissioner in various departments under Government. His diary reflects the man in a wonderful manner. Mixing in the first society, and much beloved by it, he was a man full of optimism, superlative in admiration, and forcible in denouncing what failed to meet with his approbation. He was a sincere and devoted adherent to the Royal family of the Stuarts, and was a courtier most expressive of his loyalty; and in those days the expressions of devotion to Royalty were what would now be deemed somewhat sycophantic. What Evelyn liked, he loved; and what he disliked, he hated. He was a Royalist, and he was a patriot. He was a man of extremes, and seems to be most natural in depicting affairs either in rosy hues or else in dark and pessimistic colours. All through his works there runs a patriotic love of his country, a strong family feeling, and a great admiration for the family seat where he was born, and to which he was bound by the strongest ties of affection. How full of breezy optimistic exaggeration and of loving admiration is his description of his birthplace, the Surrey seat of a squire, blessed with four thousand pounds a year:—

Wotton, the mansion house of my father, left him by my grandfather (now my eldest brother's), is situated in the most Southern part of the shire, and tho' in a vally, yet really upon part of Lyth Hill, one of the most eminent in Engl'd* for the prodigious prospect to be seen from its summ't, tho' by few observed. From it may be discerned 12 or 13 Counties, with part of the Sea on the Coast of Sussex in a serene day; the house large and ancient, suitable to these hospitable times, and so sweetly environed with those delicious streams and venerable woods, as in the judgement of Strangers as well as Englishmen it may be compared to one of the most pleasant Seats in the Nation, and most tempting for a great person and a wanton purse to render it conspicuous; it has rising grounds, meadows, woods and water in abundance.

Here, within a short day's journey of London, he spent his boyhood and his early manhood; and here he became imbued with that love of forest trees which was to raise him to so eminent a position among literary men in the second half of the seventeenth century. In those days Britain was far ahead of any continental country in matters of Forestry; but the utilization of oak in meeting the dockyard demands for the maintenance of the King's navy exerted a strain on the resources of the country. Evelyn was, partly from his knowledge of rural economy, and partly through his keen powers of observation, better fitted than any other man of his time to deal with the question of the maintenance of the timber supply; and the outcome of his labours in this respect is the ever-charming classic "Sylva."

On 15th October, 1662, he records in his diary that:—

I this day deliver'd my Discourse concerning Forest Trees to the (Royal) Society, upon occasion of certain queries sent to us by the Comm^{rs} of his Ma^y's Navy, being the first booke that was printed by order of the Society, and by their Printer, since it was a Corporation.

Three weeks later he further notes that:—

The Council of ye R(oyal) S(ociety) met; afterwards meeting at Gressham College. There was a discourse suggested by me concerning planting his Ma^y's Forest of Deane with oake, now so much exhausted of y^e choicest ship-timber in the world.

History repeats itself. The anxiety now manifest regarding the maintenance of the navy as the finest and most powerful fighting machine of its kind in existence is but the repetition of the apprehension felt by the nation in 1662. In his introduction to "Sylva" Evelyn points out that:—

There is nothing which seems more fatally to threaten a Weakening, if not a Dissolution, of the strength of this famous and flourishing Nation, than the sensible and notorious decay of her Wooden Walls, when either through time, negligence, or other accident, the present Navy shall be worn out and impair'd.

Inveighing eloquently against the destruction of woods and forests, to transform them into agricultural land, he laments that

This devastation is now become as Epidemical, that unless some favourable expedient offer itself, and a way be seriously, and speedily resolved upon, for a future store, one of the most glorious, and considerable Bulwarks of this Nation, will, within a short time, be totally wanting to it.

When the difficulty of transport of heavy timber in those days is considered, it is easy to understand how thinking people were concerned at the prospects of diminishing supplies of oak for naval purposes. As Percival Lewis shows in his "Historical Enquiries concerning Forests and Forest Laws," 1811 (page 121), in the century from

1608 to 1707 the number of loads of timber in the New Forest fit for the Navy had sunk from 197,405 to 19,873. In 1764, probably as the result of Evelyn's exhortations a hundred years before, it had risen somewhat to 36,662 loads; but by 1783 it had once again decreased to 19,827 loads.

It was owing to the failure in the supply of oak for the Navy that attention was first turned to the teak timber obtainable at Bombay from the forests along the south-western coast of India. This fact, coupled with the measures ultimately necessary for the extraction and the maintenance of adequate future supplies, gradually gave rise to the Indian Forest Department, whose work in conserving the remnants of the primeval forests a high civil administrative authority claims to be one of the greatest benefits conferred by the British on India, while an equally eminent military official denounces this work, and the regulations under which it needs to be carried on, as one of the prospective possible causes of future insurrection.

Interesting it often is to note Evelyn's remarks on technical questions that have acquired greater importance in later days. Some practical mind had advocated the modern method of planting in small family groups, but Evelyn disapproves of this, saying:—

Some advise, that in planting of Oaks, dc., four, or five, be suffer'd to stand very near to one another, and then to leave the most prosperous, when they find the rest to disturb his growth; but I conceive it were better to plant them at such distances, as they may least incommode one another: For Timber-trees, I would have none nearer than forty feet where they stand closest; especially of the spreading kind.

For the production of strong crooks and curved oak timber for shipbuilding Evelyn's system of wide planting was, of course, advantageous; though one cannot but admire the acumen of the early forerunners of the modern school that advocates the planting of small groups as the best way of growing timber in mixed woods.

Evelyn has often a keen eye for the profits of timber-growing. Thus, speaking of the ash, he says:—

Fraxinus the Ash, is with us reputed Male and Female, the one affecting the higher grounds: The other the plains, of a whiter wood, and rising many times to a prodigious stature; so as in forty years from the Key, an Ash hath been sold for thirty pounds sterling: And I have been credibly informed, that one Person hath planted so much of this one sort of Timber in his lifetime as hath been valued worth fifty thousand pounds to be bought. These are pretty encouragements, for a small, and pleasant industry.

His was, however, no sordid mind. Various were the uses of the forest trees, and it was not for their timber alone that they were valuable. How delightful is the naïve quaintness in the following description of the efficacy and strength of wine made from the birch:—

The Liquor of the Birch is esteemed to have all the virtues of the Spirit of Salt, without the danger of its acrimony; most powerful for the dissolving of the Stone in the Bladder: Helmont shews how to make a Beer of the Water; but the Wine is a most rich cordial, curing (as I am told) Consumptions, and such interior Diseases as accompany the Stone in the Bladder or Reins: the juice decocted with honey and wine, Dr. Needham affirms he has often cured the Scorbut with this Wine, exquisitely made, is so strong, that the common sort of stone-bottles cannot preserve the spirits, so subtle they are and volatile; and yet it is gentle, and very harmless in operation within the body, and exceedingly sharpens the appetite, being drunk ante pastum: I will present you a Receipt, as it was sent to me by a fair Lady.

The fair Lady's receipt is forthwith given, and a quaint recipe it is; for the original liquor of the birch is about the least characteristic ingredient in the perfected cordial, save so far as mere quantity is concerned.

The study of "Sylva" and of the conditions under which it was written suggests the very serious side of the question of Forestry in these latter days. The world's demands for timber and other wood are expanding quickly, while the reproductive capital in forests and timber is diminishing. Everything points to a timber famine within fifty or sixty years hence. It were, therefore, well for the civilized world in general if another Evelyn arose who could command the attention of the Government and of the various learned societies as before, and who would be hearkened to when urging upon them the desirability of taking timely measures to husband the vast timber resources still existing (though rapidly decreasing) in the many countries forming our vast empire, of utilizing them advantageously, and of maintaining and treating them so that they shall in future years yield supplies of useful timber equal to or perhaps larger than they now produce. For the day will unfortunately too soon come when the world's demands for timber will only be met with difficulty from the existing woodlands; and Britain should look to her future supplies of this indispensable commodity.

J. NISBET.

THE CAFÉ OF THE BLIND.

Some years ago I was in the city of Constantine, in Algeria. At that time, and possibly still, the Moorish quarter remained intact; and after sundown no European could penetrate there without a very genuine risk of assault and robbery, if not worse.

I was unaware of the reality of the peril, so that my adventuring there alone and at night was due neither to daring, nor, in the first instance, to foolhardiness; but simply to curiosity.

I had not strolled from the French quarter further than by a couple of narrow streets, when a Zouave officer, emerging from a Moorish café, politely accosted me. He took the liberty to advise Monsieur not to go further into the narrow and tortuous streets (where Moorish and not French civil law prevailed), at least without an escort; and then, with a courteous salute, passed towards the boulevard I had just left. Foolishly, I daresay, I took the advice as a kindly piece of officialism; but not wishing to appear disregarding of what was well meant, I strolled slowly after the Zouave lieutenant till he had disappeared, when I retraced my steps.

One or two more winding streets, narrower and darker than those I had left, brought me to another thoroughfare, wider, brighter, and in every way quite unlike anything I have ever seen elsewhere. This was the street known vaguely by repute throughout Algeria as "The Street of the Birds of Paradise," or more crudely as "The Street of the Caged Women." On both sides of the thoroughfare were low-roofed iron-barred rooms; and close by many of the doorways hung open-woodwork cages. In all, the occupants were women. Sometimes only one woman tenanted a barred room, sometimes two, occasionally three; in the cages there was never more than one. Many of the women were partially and barbarically clad with a leopard or other skin; others with a vividly variegated rug, oftener with brilliant Tlemçen silk shawls; and a few wore resplendent robes which glittered with real or imitation gems and paste brilliants. Most, if not all, of the women were for sale. Those in cages could be bought and taken away at once.

I spoke to two of the women who were in the barred earthen rooms. The first was standing close to the bars. She was a Nubian, dressed in a long tunic of saffron silk, with a glittering belt of green and gold mosaic, studded with crystals, which passed from her waist over her left shoulder to the small of her back. She could speak nothing save what was, or what I took to be, a bastard Arabic; and as I could not understand what she said I moved on. The next two enclosures were mere dens, and the women in them were negresses of a singularly brutish type. At the fourth I stopped. A woman of remarkable figure, and with features that were not only handsome but were of a noble mould, and with eyes of a peculiar beauty, which suggested that she was a Georgian or Circassian, lay upon a huge bearskin. She was smoking a cigarette. When she saw me stop she spoke in a low voice, though it impressed me as harsh and almost dissonant. I answered in French, but she shook her head; and as the little Moorish I had picked up was useless for any conversation beyond the ordinary commonplaces, I had to content myself with unsatisfied speculation.

It was after this that I crossed to look at those who were exposed in cages for sale. The woman in the first cage I passed was obviously not of the desert. She was rather pretty, and though her hair was dark she had pale blue eyes. Her long, loose tresses were everywhere clasped with little blue brooches; and I noticed that her lips, the ends of her ears, and her finger-tips were stained a dull red. She accosted me in Moorish-French and asked me if I would not like to take her away from these jackals of Moors and Arabs. I said I was a stranger, a wayfarer; and if here to-day might be far to-morrow. She told me she was not an Arab ("Allah be praised!") and not a Moor either, but a Koulourli—that is, the child of a Moorish woman by a Turkish father. There were others more or less interesting, more or less tawdry, more or less attractive. One girl's face and manner impressed me greatly. She was not beautiful, hardly pretty, but she had a singularly winsome face, with large, fine, gazelle-like eyes. She was a European, a Spaniard from one of the Balearic Isles. Strangely, she was very fair, with blonde hair full of a dusky gold sheen. She had been taken to Oran, at the extreme western end of Algeria, by a Spanish naval officer, and there in a few weeks been deserted. For some months she was a derelict in that old Hispano-Mauresque town. After her child was born she had gone inland, to hill-set Tlemçen, the old Moorish city that stands within sight of the frontier of Morocco. There a rich Moor had taken her to his harem. On his death, a few months later, she had been purchased by a Jew from Algiers and straightway sold to a young Turk at Bona. The Turk, when tired of her, disposed of his property to an Arab Sheik, who had taken her with him as far as El Kantara, on the verge of the Sahara, and there without a word left her. She could then, she said, have settled in Biskra on her own account, but that unfortunately she met the Bona Jew who laid claim to her, took her to Constantine, and sold her to a Moorish trafficker in women. It was this merchant who now exposed her for sale in this wooden cage.

All this she confided to me in halting French, interspersed with Spanish and Moorish words. I told her that if she were a Spanish subject the Consul at Oran could help her; but she laughed, and asked if I had been in Oran, and knew Spaniards.

Poor child, she seemed to think that I would purchase her and take her to Biskra or Algiers. She even offered to come as a servant, as a slave. She mentioned what she believed was the sum her owner asked for her, though she added candidly that he would demand more from a Roumi than from a Moor or Arab.

I was trying to explain how powerless I was to help her when a man dropped some article just behind me, and, in stooping to pick it up, whispered to me in French to move away at once and return to the foreign quarter. He had passed on before

I could see his face. The next moment I descried the evil countenance of a Jewish-looking Moor, behind the cage of the Oran woman. He was her owner, and had been listening to our conversation. When he discovered that he had not a purchaser to deal with he came forward brusquely.

"Do you want her or not?" he demanded sneeringly, in guttural Algerian French. "No? Then be off with you, infidel dog, and by the way you came if you value your skin!"

The man's insolence angered me, and, thrusting him aside, I moved further down into the street. Turning a corner, I found myself in a very dark and narrow byway; but, hearing a strange chanting voice, I ventured along the ill-smelling passage, and came suddenly upon a large, open, crescent-shaped room, a kind of Moorish music-hall. There were, as I judged, from two to three hundred Moors and Arabs present.

What impressed me profoundly was the dramatic intensity of the silent, mostly cowed, cross-legged audience squatted in a semi-circle in front of a tall, fanatical Arab, a Marabet or Dervish; and his flaming eyes, as in a loud, monotonous, strident voice, extraordinarily fluent, he delivered himself of his impassioned harangue.

I stood by one of the red and yellow striped pillars in front of the café or hall. No one saw, or at any rate took any notice of me, with the exception of the Marabet.

Suddenly, without a pause or any alteration in his voice, he made some allusion to the accursed infidel, and his right arm shot like a bolt from his side, while with quivering hand and extended forefinger he pointed in my direction. In a moment the savage, hostile gaze of hundreds of dark eyes was fixed upon me. I can never forget the paralysing shock of that abrupt concentration of hate.

I suppose that in another minute or so I should have been knifed or trampled to death. I could have done nothing to save myself.

But at that moment I heard a voice behind me, bidding me run into the open doorway to my left, across the inner court, and then through the second door to the left, which I should find open.

Unreasoningly, with instinctive knowledge that the crisis was one of life or death, I did as I was told. As I ran across the ill-paved court I heard a snarling cry behind me, such as a baited tiger gives before charging from the reeds where he has been tracked. This single, dreadful, monotonous snarl came from a hundred human throats.

When, dazed and shaken, I leapt through the second door to the left, it closed behind me at once, and I heard the intrust of a heavy bolt.

A man took my hand and led me along a dark passage. We then crossed another court, and I saw that my deliverer was the man who had warned me in the Street of the Women. I recognized his figure and a peculiar shoulder-ornament, though I had not seen his face.

After traversing this second court we entered another house. Unlike most Moorish houses, it was not secured by bars. The door opened at a shove. There was not a light visible, and again my unknown friend took my hand.

After I had stumbled along a passage so narrow that my shoulders touched the wall on each side, my companion drew aside a heavy curtain. An oil lamp hung from the low roof, and I could see that we were in a kind of ante-room. Another heavy curtain blocked the way in front. Behind this I heard a monotonous chanting.

The man with me pulled the curtain aside, and we entered a low vaulted room, in which some five or six white-robed figures lay, or crouched inert. The light of a single great brazen lamp was so dazzling after the darkness from which I had emerged that at first I did not perceive that every one present was blind.

When we entered there was an abrupt silence on the part of an old white-bearded caftanned Moor, with dull, bleared eyes, who had been chanting verses from the Koran. My companion cried out some words, hoarse and wild in my ears as the cry of a heron. Then the old man resumed his monotonous wailing chant. None of the other inmates stirred.

All were smoking, or had long ornamented pipe-stems with red earthenware bowls lying beside them or fallen from inert hands. This and a strange, pungent odour convinced me that this melancholy company of the blind consisted of opium or haschisch smokers. As a matter of fact they were all smokers of haschisch.

It is difficult to explain why I was so profoundly impressed by these blind haschisch drunkards. They have haunted me ever since. Perhaps it was their sightless silence that struck me as so strangely horrible. One man lay half supine, with his back against a low bench. He was quite young, but his face seemed heavy, weighty, overborne with the intolerable burden of years. There was no film across his eyes; they stared wide and luminous, but unwinkingly, unwaveringly, though the suspended lamp thrust a crude, flaring light across the intent eyeballs. Every now and again his lips moved. At last I whispered to my unknown friend to tell me, if he could, what the man was muttering so incessantly.

He approached him stealthily, and listened. Then he returned and whispered in my ear:—

"He says. . . . 'I am grown old, Allah have pity! I am grown old. . . . I am grown old, Allah have pity! I am grown old. . . . I am old, but now with Moulai el Haschisch (my Lord Haschisch) I see; yea, by Allah, I see this, that I am old, that I am grown old, Allah have pity, that I am grown old.'"

Beyond the young man who muttered continuously this monotonous and terrible litany was an old Arab. He lay half fallen forward. His long, gaily-decorated pipe-stem was in his right hand, which was like a vulture's claw. His face was horribly illumined by the lurid sensual dreams clouding his mind under the compelling fumes of the drug.

As were these, so were the others.

After what seemed to me an interminable time, my rescuer moved cautiously towards a man who lay on his back staring upward with sightless eyes. I saw (for I heard nothing) that he whispered to the blind and haschisch-clazed Arab. Suddenly I realized what he was doing. He slipped what looked like a Spanish dollar into the man's hand, and then helped him to disengage himself from a once white but now murky woollen robe and hood.

When he returned stealthily to my side he signed to me to disguise myself in what he had brought. I did so very reluctantly, for the garment was filthy. As soon as I had done as he directed he led me back by the way we had come, and so out into the narrow, dark, tortuous thoroughfares again. All this time he never spoke.

We passed the lower end of the Street of the Women, then diverged sharply to the right, and turned abruptly into a winding ascending alley. In a few minutes I found myself standing at the corner of the Place de la Brèche, or Bab el Oued, as it is called by the Moors, one of the chief thoroughfares of the foreign quarter, though at that late hour all but deserted. The lighted windows of an hotel struck me as wildly incongruous.

My friend stopped, and exclaimed in French, in a low voice, "If you believe in Allah, give thanks to Him. Farewell." I gave him back the blind man's garment, and at the same time handed him what gold I had with me. He took it, made a low bow, and then moved rapidly and silently away.

As I walked down the Rue de France, where a couple of French officers were laughing and chatting to some ladies whom they were escorting from the Folies-Bérgère, I heard the long, wailing cry of the muezzin of the Djamaa el Kebir, like a forlorn bird wheeling through the upper darkness. Then I ascended the few steps of the Hotel d'Orient, wondering whether that pseudo-Parisian hostelry, or the Café of the Blind and that other haunt of savage fanatics, were the reality, the real "real."

WILLIAM SHARP.

Notes.

In next week's Literature "Among my Books" will be written by Mr. William Archer.

We understand that we may shortly expect particulars of the Daily Telegraph's issue of the hundred best novels—those at least which are not excluded from the list owing to copyright difficulties. Living writers will, we believe, be represented to the extent of some twenty-five volumes and the set will probably contain novels by Mr. Rudyard Kipling, Mr. J. M. Barrie, Mrs. Flora Annie Steel, and other popular authors of the day.

The Elizabethan Stage Society will perform Ben Jonson's Alchemist on the 24th and 25th inst., at Apothecaries' Hall. Mr. Poel has had a good deal of difficulty in finding a player to undertake the part of Face, which is one of the longest in the whole of Elizabethan drama—and parts then generally ran to a much greater length than they do now. The Alchemist was first acted in 1610, probably at the Blackfriars Theatre, which occupied almost exactly the same ground as that on which the Apothecaries' Hall now stands. Abel Drugger was one of Garrick's great parts, but the piece has scarcely been seen on the stage since his time. After this performance Mr. Swinburne's Loerine, Edward Fitzgerald's version of Life's a Dream, by Calderon, and Bjørnsen's modern comedy, A Gauntlet, are promised.

It has long been a matter of curiosity to students of the Elizabethan drama to know why Ben Jonson, in his eulogy of Shakespeare, spoke of the author of the Spanish Tragedy as "Sporting Kyd." One is loath to believe that Ben stooped to the pun suggested by Kyd's name; and yet the very few of modern days who have read "Jeronimo" and "The Spanish Tragedy" can perceive no other possible ground of appropriateness for the epithet. The interesting and novel facts which are published in the Fortnightly Review by Mr. F. C. Boas throw a new light on this question, and make it highly probable that Ben Jonson's choice of an epithet for Kyd was ironical. There is certainly nothing either sporting or sportive to be found in the tale of Kyd's cowardly attempt to save his own reputation at the expense of his dead friend, Marlowe, which Mr. Boas has unearthed from the records of the Privy Council. Kyd seems to have been even weaker as a man than as a poet. Marlowe, on the other hand, gains credit from the new facts, which practically dispose of those ugly accusations of atheism and blasphemy brought against him. The same man is not likely to have discussed his Unitarian creed with an Elizabethan Bishop and proffered the blasphemous scurrilities attributed to him. One can view Kyd's new ignominy with much calm for the sake of this cleansing of Marlowe's memory.

To all Scotsmen and Highlanders and admirers of Mr. William Black, as a writer of fiction, we commend Lord Archibald Campbell's suggestion for a fitting memorial to him. The proposal is that subscriptions should be invited for the purchase of a lifeboat to be named after the novelist and placed in some fitting station upon the Highland coast.

A new Thackeray discovery has been made by Mr. W. T. Spencer, of New Oxford-street—viz., a pamphlet of thirty-six pages in a yellow cover entitled "Proceedings at the Thirteenth Anniversary Festival of the Royal General Theatrical Fund, held at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, on Monday, March 29, 1868." Thackeray was in the chair, and made a speech which occupies several pages of text. Dickens was also present, and, like his brother novelist, addressed the audience at considerable length. It would seem that, until the discovery of this pamphlet, it was not known that he ever attended a festival at the Freemasons' Tavern in any public capacity. The pamphlet is post 8vo. size, and was "Printed by Frederick Ledger, Catherine-street, Strand, MDCCCLVIII." The dedication is made to John Baldwin Buckstone, of the old Haymarket company, whose impersonation of "Tony Lumpkin" will never be forgotten by those who are old enough to have witnessed it.

Hans Andersen must be sadly neglected now a days. Nearly every London paper, in noticing The Red Shoes, the new ballet at the Alhambra Theatre, said it was, "of course, founded on Hans Andersen's fairy tale." As a matter of fact, it is not the same story at all. In the ballet the shoes are in some way sacred, and the wearer commits sacrilege in daring to put them on her profane feet. In the fairy tale the magic only makes the shoes dance because of the wearer's naughtiness and vanity in thinking so much about them. The new edition of Hans Andersen, which Messrs. Newnes are issuing in fortnightly parts, with Miss Helen Stretton's delightful illustrations, seems to be wanted.

Melodrama of the type so prolifically represented by the late M. d'Ennery or of that satirized by Mr. Jerome is not likely ever to lack a public, and, on the whole, it would be a great pity that it should. But it is somewhat on the decline, and, familiar though its incidents must always be, it might do something to reinstate itself by coining a new language. This would have the charm of novelty, and could hardly be more artificial than the old phraseology, of which a distilled essence is given by a writer in the Daily News. Here is his preliminary list, from which melodramatists are to be warned off:—

Foiled! Aha! I see it all now. Monster! Leave me; I would be alone. You shall bitterly rue this day. Another step and you are lost! Must we, then, separate for ever? I could have sworn you loved me. I will defend my honour with my life. Caramella, my darling, we part no more. Child, you know not of what you speak. Baffled! and by a boy—a beardless boy! Listen, Margaret; I am not the man I was. Would you thus attack a defenceless woman? This then is the end of your boasted affection. For years I have hugged my awful secret to my breast. My time will come—and then, beware! The blood of my murdered father cries aloud for vengeance. What is this? Blood! There has been foul work here. Ha! A knock! I must hide. But where? Ah, in this recess I will be unob—, &c. Do not trifle with me, girl! You shall marry Herbert de Lancey, or leave my house for ever! I will go to him—I will fall at his feet—I will entreat him to give us time to pay the mortgage. Ere yonder sun has sunk behind the western hills. How cold it is! The wind cuts like a knife. My limbs are failing. O God! Must I die here alone? I am only a poor working girl, my lord; but oh, sir, I had rather be that than what your gold would make me.

Every actor has his own idea of Hamlet; but Signor Alisoff, in the Rivista Moderna, insists that the true Hamlet has never yet made his appearance on any stage. The real Hamlet, he argues, was fat, asthmatic, and a contemptible cad. "Oh that this too, too solid flesh would melt" proves his fatness; and the Queen's exclamation, "He's fat and scant of breath," may be taken to settle the question of the asthma. The third allegation rests, of course, on the Prince's treatment of Ophelia. An actor who would adopt this view of the part, and give us "a fat Hamlet suffering from asthma at moments of mental agitation," would not fail, Signor Alisoff contends, to "create a revolution in the theatrical world." The idea is decidedly to be recommended to Mr. Beerbohm Tree, who might play Hamlet in the "make up" of Falstaff.

We regret that in our review of Volumes IV. and V. of Dr. Murray's New English Dictionary we omitted to mention that Mr. Henry Bradley, not Dr. Murray, is responsible for Volume IV., including the articles on the words "garb," "galaxy," and "gas," to which we referred. Dr. Murray, who writes to point this out, says:—

I am sure that all interested in the Dictionary will be grieved to know that Mr. Bradley's work has for some time been done under sore pressure of ill health, and that he has been at length ordered to take an entire rest for a month at a distance from Oxford, in order to regain his strength. May he speedily be with us again!

May I also point out that the etymology of Gas is not now "for the first time unearthed"? The full history of the word has, as is stated by Mr. Bradley, been before the world for more than a quarter of a century, having been given at large by Cosijn and Verwijs in the great Dutch Dictionary in 1873, as well as recorded by Franck in his well-known Dutch Etymological Dictionary some sixteen years ago. It is only because makers of English Dictionaries are so given to the mechanical retailing of obsolete errors that it has been reserved for the N.E.D., in accordance with its historical method and fresh investigation of everything, to be apparently the first to mention the facts in English. Yet the oversight is not wholly insular; the last edition of Kluge's German Etymological Dictionary, 1894, has not got the facts, while the new French Dictionnaire Général, now in publication, repeats with a peut-être the prehistoric guesses current before 1873.

We are much obliged to Dr. Murray for his letter. But, surely, he is a little optimistic in regarding a derivation that is given in two Dutch dictionaries as "before the world." At all events, so far as English readers are concerned, Mr. Bradley may perhaps be said to have "unearthed the true derivation of 'gas.'"

According to the Daily Mail, a new game has been originated "in a certain literary circle." Everybody wears "an emblem descriptive of some well-known book," and everybody else tries to identify the book thus indicated. It is an ingenious pastime, and its possibilities do not seem to have been exhausted by the lady who wore a couple of sabots on her shoulder to indicate "Two Little Wooden Shoes." A lady who would appear in a divided skirt to suggest "The History of Rationalism," or a gentleman who would wear boxing gloves to suggest "The Mill on the Floss" would be sure of a favourable reception for their endeavours to stimulate an intelligent interest in literary affairs. Nor would such developments of the game be any less consistent with the dignity of letters than its modest and humble beginnings so sympathetically described by the Daily Mail's literary editor.

The St. James's Gazette has been canvassing the publishers on the vexed question of the sixpenny novel, and they are found to differ widely. The probability seems to be that success will attend the experiment upon which Messrs. Methuen are about to venture so long, and so long only, as a few novels have the field to themselves. The price of paper—which is the controlling factor—is low enough to allow a presentable volume to be produced for this small figure; and the case of sixpenny reprints has already demonstrated that large, if not prodigious, sales can be obtained. On the other hand, the reading power of the individual must remain where it was. With the bookstalls and shops flooded with sixpenny novels the reader will pick and choose among them just as he now picks and chooses among six shilling novels. He may buy a few more, but he will not buy twelve times as many, for the excellent reason that he will have no time to read them. Yet—as a sixpenny novel can hardly carry more than a ten per cent. royalty, if as much—authors must increase their sale twenty fold, if the new format is to be of any advantage to them. Possibly they may do this while competition is limited, but hardly if competition sets in with its usual severity.

On Wednesday, the 15th inst., Messrs. Sotheby sell what is described in the catalogue as a complete set of the Kelmscott Press publications, consisting of fifty-three separate works, from "The Story of the Glittering Plain," the first book published (1891), to Mr. S. C. Cockerell's description of the press, issued last year. Books from the Kelmscott Press are continually being sold by auction at prices which seem to increase almost daily, but this is the first occasion on which a complete series has ever been offered by auction. Although the scarce "Glittering Plain" just mentioned now brings as much as £15 and £16, it could have been got five years ago for about £4. But all the Kelmscott books, without exception, have materially advanced in price during the last few years.

The French Academy has given the Jean Reynaud prize of 10,000 francs, which is bestowed in turn by the five classes of the Institute for any work of originality, to M. Ernest Legouvé, after some discussion, in the course of which M. Legouvé himself recommended the author of "Cyrano de Bergerac," M. Rostand. The French Academy has now distributed it five times, the persons honoured before M. Legouvé being Leconte de Lisle, M. de Borneir for his "Fille de Roland," M. Duruy, the historian, and M. Deroulède, the poet. M. Legouvé owes the distinction to his recent work "Dernier Travail, Derniers Souvenirs," which is already in its third edition.

The Russians propose to honour the approaching centenary of Poushkin's birth in a variety of ways, one of which seems less practical than the rest. In this country we think we do very well when we purchase the house in which some distinguished author lived or worked, and make it a national possession. In Russia, however, a certain Oriental magnificence of ideas is still to be found. Nothing less than the whole village in which Poushkin did much of his work will satisfy his admirers, and it is to be turned, so it is stated, into an asylum for decayed men of letters. We trust that this philanthropic scheme may work better than that for which Lytton and Dickens were so vainly zealous in this country. "Some houses were built at Stevenage" Mr. Payn has told us, "for the accommodation of decayed authors, in which none of them could be induced to live, even rent free. They pointed to the local train bills, and showed that it was impossible to reach their proposed homes after the performances at the theatres. This difficulty had not been taken into account by the patrons of the scheme; and there were others also — (What are you going to pay us for being buried alive at Stevenage?) for one." Still, enthusiasm for literature is always respectable, and perhaps the Russian admirers of Poushkin will be better rewarded.

American Letter.

GARLAND'S GRANT.

The other day I said of Mr. Hamlin Garland's "Life of General Grant," which I had just been reading, "That is the way the Americans feel about Grant," and an English man of letters, who was by, asked, "How do the Americans feel about Grant?" It would have been easy to refer him to the book, but that would not have been quite fair; the book is rather long; and, besides, I felt bound by my venture to try in a few words for the impression which many pages of Mr. Garland's careful study had left with me. If my failure in this had not so discouraged me I should still like to attempt an answer to the Englishman's question, and impart some sense of the peculiar tenderness, pride, and reverence which the name of the great, modest, quiet, kindly man awakens in us, and which Mr. Garland has known how to embody and express in his book. It is something different from our feeling for Lincoln, who moves heroically in the imagination, from climax to climax, apparently without those intervals of sordid struggle, those pauses of bewilderment and dull despair, those years of public doubt, and those months of measured agony, which make Grant's life so singularly pathetic. With Lincoln all the conclusions seem swift in the retrospect; he rose rapidly and uninterruptedly, and he ceased to be in a supreme hour. Grant slowly moved from point to point, often losing ground, and winning his way back to the popular love and trust only in the Valley of the Shadow. Of course, there is an illusion in all this, but it is an illusion arising from the essential characters of the men. Grant's career, on its high plane, was more like the career of the average man than Lincoln's, and he is more appreciable to the average intelligence, if not dearer to the average affection. His life included lapses and arrests which image the lapses and arrests in the lives of lesser men; its errors were such as slighter natures commit, and its splendours were never quite without the shadows that dim the joys of the common lot. Nothing of marvel or of miracle was there, but only the work of a steadfast will pressing onward to its end, and taking its reverses as mutely as its triumphs. The beginnings of both men were lowly, but Grant's were without the mythic obscurity of Lincoln's, and his youth had the training which Lincoln could only give his own by the self-creative forces within him. Grant's fame was always without the dramatic, the poetic, the romantic glamour of Lincoln's; and I could fancy that, in virtue of their qualities and fortunes, Lincoln was destined to become less and less intimately known to his countrymen and Grant more and more; that Lincoln might finally abide with Washington in the legendary dusk from which it seems impossible to dislodge him, and that Grant would dwell with Franklin in the common daylight of fact, for which something very kindred in their make has a stronger affinity.

The parallel is by no means satisfactory, the analogy is obviously imperfect; and perhaps I am letting it stand as a sort of refuge from my failure to say how Americans feel about Grant. I am so far from thinking I have yet done this that I find myself with some question whether it is not merely the way I feel about Grant, and I should be glad if I could make out that it was the way, at least, that Mr. Garland felt, too.

His way of saying of how he feels is well fitted to the simple prose, the hard reality of the facts he has to deal with. He was used, as a naturalistic novelist, to face life of every kind, and he has apparently experienced all the æsthetic pleasure in his facts which his treatment of them gives the reader. His method is almost journalistically direct, and if it shows in some degree the defect of its qualities in the literary result, this is full of the freshness of materials studied by a conscientious interviewer at their sources. He went and talked with every one who knew Grant upon any side at any period of his life; he visited the scenes of his childhood, his youth, his early manhood, and his later years; he perused the fields of his victories and defeats, as faithfully as he read the contemporary records concerning him in the newspapers and official documents.

Those who know Mr. Garland's theory and practice in fiction, his avowed and demonstrated contempt for the literary formalities which keep the reader from a living sense of the affair in hand, will be prepared for his indifference to them here, but I should be disappointed, to the point of disabling his taste, if any one failed of the vivid and vigorous impression of situation and character which the author wishes to give. There is occasional looseness of texture, but the form and the colour of the traits and incidents are always caught and kept in the web; and the book has the essentials of a piece of literature, without affecting, perhaps without regarding, the conventional literary graces. It is all very interesting, but if I am to name one part that has interested me more than others I will mention the chapters dealing with that period of extreme discouragement in Grant's life, after the Mexican War, when he was trying in Missouri and in Illinois to find employment, for the powers of which he was conscious, in any calling that would promise him a living. This was a period which a man of common mind would have passed over as wanting in importance, but which a man of uncommon mind would feel to be of vital significance, and would explore and report in full detail, as Mr. Garland has explored and reported it. No passage of Grant's career was more American than this, and in none is the man more clearly, for good and for bad, to be seen. The chapters which treat of it, and the chapters treating of Grant's business disasters through the failure of Grant and Ward, in which he had no part but the hardship and the blame, are of a kind of epical largeness, though they have not the passion of those recording his last sickness, miraculously stayed while he completed the story of his life, and then relentlessly advancing, as it were, under the eyes of the nation.

To my thinking they surpass in interest the record of his conflicts with public and private enemies, graphic as these are with the unsought effectiveness of simple and faithful statement.

The story of Grant's battles, of his part in the reconstruction of the South, and of his two administrations, with the movement which almost carried him to a third from the political abeyance, not to say abasement, in which the second left him, is told with the same fidelity to what is matter-of-fact as well as to what is heroic in it all; and there is no finer effect from this than the impression of the man when his political partisans failed, and he had to confront, after all his triumph and glory, the every-day American problem of making a living.

I wish Mr. Garland could have given in greater detail the events of Grant's undertaking his personal memoirs, and had recorded the part taken by another great American in encouraging him to that effort, and imagining for him a recompense which left him without fear of want for the future. But perhaps some day the survivor will tell us this part of Grant's story himself. I hope so, and, in the meantime, I like to remember it to the honour of literature. The incident is sole in literary history, perhaps because authors have so rarely been publishers.

FROM THE MAGAZINES.—II.

Londoners who know their London are aware that St. Martin's-lane is entitled to rank as the "Grub Street of the Arts." Under this title Mr. Austin Dobson reviews the annals of the thoroughfare in an interesting contribution to the National Review. His notes on Slaughter's Coffee House, which had literary as well as artistic associations, are particularly interesting. We quote an extract :—

Dryden was said to have frequented it in its early days, and Pope. But its real habitués were the artist-folk of the Lane. Hither from Leicester Fields would come Hogarth, bragging of the new-old theories in the "Analysis," and scoffing at the "grand contorno" of the virtuosi; hither Hayman, and the goldchaser Moser, and Isaac Ware, the chimney-sweep turned architect, and (from his studio over the way) Roubillac, raving in broken English of the beauties of the Chevalier Bernini. Here, too, would be seen the shrewd Swiss enameller, Rouquet, taking notes of the state of the Arts in England for Monsieur Belle-Isle, and Gravelot, who held that no Englishman could draw, and "Friar" Pine, of the engraved "Horace," who had a print shop at No. 88. James M'Ardell, the mezzotinter, Luke Sullivan, who engraved the "March to Finchley," and Richard Wilson from Covent Garden, were also well-known visitors; while, when evening drew on, and the last rays of light faded from the unfinished canvas, the ungainly figure of David Wilkie would slip in quietly to a remote table and a modest and even penurious meal. And there were literary men as well as artists, for Collins of the "Odes" is reported to have used this time-honoured hostelry; and Goldsmith, in the Essays, refers to its orators as if his knowledge was experimental. Here, too (as everywhere), was to be found Johnson, studying French from its French customers, and expressing his opinions (as always) in forcible language. He was disgusted by the frivolous chatter of the "fasting monsieurs." "For anything I see," he said, confirming the observation of a friend, "foreigners are fools!"

The February Cornhill is a shade less brilliant than usual. The best paper is one in which Sir Robert Edgcumbe revives the memory of William Robert Hicks, who had a great reputation throughout Cornwall for his wit. An example of the wit's quality may be given.

His great story, which was almost a dramatic sketch, was of the acquittal of a Cornish doctor who was charged with the murder of his mother-in-law by mixing arsenic with a dish of rabbits and onions which he gave her for supper. The setting of the court, the swearing of the jury, the speeches of counsel, and the Judge's charge were all related by Hicks with marvellous humour. The climax to the fun was the confabulation of the jury as to the verdict they should give, and their individual reasons for returning a verdict of acquittal—from the juryman who 'didn't hold with old 'omen eating rabbits and onions for supper' to the juryman who declared that 'it wasn't a ha'p'oth of odds to him, and 'twas but an old 'oman.'

The best thing in Temple Bar is Miss Marion Quekett's article on "The Betrothed of Napoleon." This is, of course, Desirée Clary, whom General Bonaparte jilted in order that he might be free to take Josephine off the hands of Barras. Her letters, extracts from which are given, do not support the popular view that no woman ever really loved Napoleon. "If I no longer have your love, let me have at least your friendship. That is the only consolation which remains to me," she wrote, just after the General's triumphant return from Italy. But she did not pine away. Junot, shortly afterwards, sent Marmont to propose to her on his behalf, and it was nearly a case of "Why don't you speak for yourself, John?" For she says:—"Ah! if Marmont had spoken in his own name, who knows? I might perhaps have said yes; he was such a handsome man." In 1798 she married Bernadotte. Her relations with her husband, which were not quite of the happiest, are narrated in a light and entertaining style. In the scissors-and-paste department, Mr. Edward Manson contributes a paper on "Happy Hits in Oratory"; but most of his stories have the charm of familiarity.

The officers of the United States army continue to seek the victories of peace by writing of their heroic actions for the Century Magazine. Captain Sigbee having finished, General Shafter takes the floor, and describes the brief campaign in front of Santiago. He is merciful as he is strong, and does not criticise the Seventy-first New York Volunteers, concerning whom so many good stories are floating about. Naval Constructor Hobson continues his account of the sinking of the Merrimac, and praises the chivalrous conduct of his captors; they called upon him in his dungeon cell and smoked and drank with him. One hopes that the gallant officer will not conclude his narrative without giving an equally graphic and detailed account of the kissing campaign in which he distinguished himself on his return to his native land. "Harnessing the Nile," by Frederic Courtland Penfield, is an account of the proposed dam at Assuan.

How many of us are there—more, perhaps, than would like to confess it—who continue to be enthusiastic fishermen, although the practice of that misnamed "gentle art" is full of disappointment and tribulation. Some there are, of course, who console themselves with tales of the monster trout they hooked and lost, and omit to mention how often they tumbled in or got "hung up," or got their flies caught in the back of their coat. Mr. Eden Philpotts is not one of these; we do not even venture to say he is not a good fisherman; but, as he shows in the Badminton, he can write a most entertaining account of "a black letter day"—an experience quite refreshing after a dose of the usual angling yarn—which all who love a genial wit no less than a long day by a Dartmoor stream should by no means fail to read. In the same magazine Mr. J. Gordon, writing of a French shooting estate, hardly vindicates French chasseurs, and, we may add, chasseuses, from the unsportsmanlike charges sometimes brought against them—particularly in the matter of wounding birds. One reason for the smallness of the bag usually obtained is that the Frenchman has many reasons for not letting off his second barrel :—

In the first place, owing to the constant use of black powder already mentioned, directly the first barrel is discharged a cloud of smoke envelops him and he can see nothing. Secondly, the young Frenchman is taught that, when he shoots, even with a fowling-piece, he should tightly close the left eye; thus, after the first shot, he has not time to single out another bird, and at best can only shoot into the brown. Thirdly, he is frequently so excitable that he can think of nothing but the success of his first shot, and forgets to use his other barrel until he has seen his first bird motionless on the ground.

An English sportsman, too, would hardly tolerate an underkeeper who tried to be a wag and called attention to fictitious rabbits behind, while the real article was bolting away in front.

The most interesting article in the United Service Magazine—"The Admirals in Crete"—is contributed by "A Naval Officer." The events that led up to the dramatic close of the reign of the Turk in Candia were rather overshadowed by the splendid drama that ended another tyranny in the Sudan. In Crete, too, an English officer was helping to put an end to misrule. The events of September, 1898, have now become historical, but the careful and detailed narrative of "A Naval Officer" comes as a useful reminder, and the final action of Admiral Noel will always be an object-lesson as to how to treat the Turk :—

The key of the policy of the Admiral in all his doings at Candia from this day until the final evacuation of the island was this—to make no demand on the Turkish authorities that he was not prepared, in the event of their non-compliance, to himself exact with the forces under his command; and not to allow any shift or evasion to postpone for one instant beyond the allotted time the fulfilment of such demand. The Pasha was aghast when he heard the terms of the Admiral's memorandum, taking off his fez to wipe the perspiration from his forehead—a remarkable action for a Turk.

During the ruthless carrying out of this policy we fear that the Pasha must frequently have had occasion to take off his fez for the same purpose.

In the Gentleman's Magazine Mr. Percy Fitzgerald writes on the "First Printed Book and its Printers." A copy of this book, Gutenberg's Bible, was sold at Sotheby's last November for just under £3,000, and Mr. Fitzgerald gave some account of it in Literature of Nov. 19. The longer account of it he now gives to readers of the Gentleman's Magazine is well worth reading. The highest price any copy ever reached seems to be £3,400. Mr. T. H. B. Grahame has collected much curious information in a paper on British Fire Festivals, the ceremonial fires lighted at certain points of the sun's annual course, which he thinks were probably charms used for the purpose of producing sunshine. Many parallels from other countries are given by Mr. Frazer in his "Golden Bough." "The glare of the charm fire," says Mr. Grahame, "has at last faded from the midnight sky," but—

The ceremonies observed at the present day in celebrating the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot on November 5, that is to say, the rolling of lighted tar barrels down the hills, the carrying of lighted torches in procession, the kindling of a great bonfire, the burning of a human effigy, and the concluding dance around the fire, are manifestly nothing else than a revival of the rites of the old November fire-festival, transferred to a new date, and used to commemorate a comparatively recent historical event.

An illuminative comparison between Millais and Leighton is given in Good Words from the pen of Sir Wyke Bayliss. "Leighton," he writes, "was an artist; Millais was a painter" :—

To understand Leighton we must consider what Nature intended when she made man—and particularly, as Burns suggests, when she made woman—the beauty of form, the delicacy of colour, the softness of the texture of the skin, the capability of heroic action. To understand Millais we must consider what men and women have become, through the stress and strain of life, of love, of hope, of fear, of happiness, of pain. To Leighton it was all the same to paint an angel as to paint a man; he had seen angels, as he had seen men—in visions. To Millais an angel was an unknown quantity; he had never seen one. If one had come to him in his studio, the world would have known for the first time precisely what an angel is like.

So in colouring Millais seeks the real, Leighton the ideal. When the former paints white, it varies with every kind of texture in costume. Leighton gives white simply. The gods whom he paints do not wear all kinds of stuffs; "they are content to wear drapery, and if that drapery is white, it is white."

In the Sunday Magazine Mr. Leonard W. Lillington has an illustrated article on "Our National Collection of Bibles." Some idea of the enormous collection of Bibles collected in the British Museum may be gathered from the fact that the list of them fills twenty-three volumes of the catalogue. There are the rare manuscript translations from before the time of Wycliffe for the rich, and the "block" Bible, consisting of a series of crude woodcuts illustrating the chief events of scripture history, for the poor; two of the famous Mazarine Bible; the "Blank Stone" Bible, the first quarto issue of Tyndale's Testament, so-called because in the woodcut of St. Paul the stone upon which he rests his foot is blank, while in the "Mole" Bible (the second issue) a mole is engraved, and in the third issue the initials A. B. K. on the stone caused it to be called "The Engraver's Mark" version. There is also the "Wicked" Bible, the printers of which were fined £300 because of the many gross errors found in it; the "Rosin" Bible, from "Is there no rosin in Gilead"; the "Treacle" Bible, from the substitution of the word treacle in the same text; the "Vinegar" Bible, so-called because "vinegar" appears instead of "vineyard" in the headline of Luke XX., and others. The article is an interesting one, full of facts about our Bible, and should inspire readers with a wish to visit the British Museum.

In the New Century Mr. Cuming Walters returns to Shakespeare's Sonnets and lays stress on the view that they are not to be regarded as a continuous sequence. He thinks that they are mainly autobiographical—that, in fact, the "William Himself" (W. H.) theory is not one to be despised. The "Dark Lady" is to be discussed in a concluding paper.

Child Life has started on a new series as a quarterly shilling publication as the organ of the "Michaelis Guild and the Froebel Society." It is well printed and edited, and to counter-balance such articles as "A study on Children's Property-sense," or the very formidable paper on "How to balance the demands of Continuity and of connectedness in planning out a scheme of work for a Kindergarten," we are glad to see "Nature notes for Nature Lovers" and "Story telling." It is to be hoped that this magazine will fulfil its object of interesting not only teachers but parents—a much more difficult matter—in the education of children.

Little Folks and St. Nicholas as usual supply plenty of appropriate reading for the young. Mr. George Manville Fenn contributes to the former, and Mr. G. A. Henty to the latter.

FICTION.

THE INTRUDERS, by L. B. Walford (Longmans, 6s.). Given a quiet country neighbourhood, well endowed with marriageable maidens, and the arrival therein of a young stranger with money and credentials, it is easy to imagine the pleasant story Mrs. Walford will weave out of the familiar materials. "The Intruders" is a fair specimen of her work. There is humour in the conception of the devoted sister who keeps house for Julian Monteagle, and is assured that she also keeps the key to his every thought and action. She goes about explaining him to the other characters and placidly living with him in entire affection and utter non-comprehension till the dénouement opens her eyes. There is a more tragic note than the author often cares to strike about poor, second-rate little Molly's chilly marriage and early death.

Another book by the same prolific writer is THE ARCHDEACON (Pearson, 6s.). This story suffers somewhat from the want of a larger canvas. The psychological history of an interesting young man up to the time when he becomes a Church dignitary can hardly be successfully treated on the scale and in the manner of a slight society novel. A series of dissolving views present to us Theo Yorke first as a serious undergraduate who, when he goes fishing in a punt with a pretty girl to whom he has just been introduced, can impress upon her mind a new ideal of life; then the Archdeacon, a sleek, worldly, and pompous ecclesiastic; and, lastly, "the old Theo" as the simple, devoted parish priest. The first transformation is, to our minds, a good deal more probable than the second, which is brought about by a severe rating of the Archdeacon delivered by the pretty girl already mentioned, now transformed into a handsome widow. The whole might be made quite convincing by the serious psychological novelist, and lend itself admirably to a "profound character study." But things are, perhaps, better as they are, and we cheerfully sacrifice the analysis for a bright and readable story. It has much literary merit, and Mrs. Walford understands how people talk. The culminating scene in which the exemplary and highly respected Archdeacon is converted to the errors of his ways and frankly told that he has "gone back" presents a difficult situation admirably handled with a just distribution of the reader's sympathy between the rater and the rated. At the end of the book the widow and the Archdeacon, we need hardly say, bring to a satisfactory conclusion, on the same lake, and presumably in the same punt, the conversation which had been interrupted twenty years before. As a piece in three acts, with the intervening history taken for granted, the novel is distinctly a good one, and will entertain, if it does not convince, the reader.

INFATUATION, by B. M. Croker (Chatto and Windus, 6s.), is a much better novel than the one which came last from the same writer—"Miss Balmaine's Past"—it is better constructed, and there is less ballast that could be thrown overboard. Nor is there anything that marks any exorbitant demands on the reader's credulity. The original title of the story was "P.P.C." Miss Maria Talbot, niece and companion to a rich and tyrannical old harridan of a Mrs. Pegrim, cherished an affection for one Captain Borrodaile, who, having on his side quite "cooled off" during a residence in India, plants himself on his return in some lodgings in the same house as Maria. He is aware of the situation ; she is not ; and after three weeks sojourn he departs after sending up to her his card with P.P.C. inscribed on it. "Infatuation" is a better title because it includes not only Maria's continued devotion to the faithless Captain, but her almost servile fidelity to the graceless Pegrim. A consistent and well-drawn character, in fact, is Maria ; so is Mrs. Pegrim ; and so is the other female character of the story, the rich and brilliant American, Miss Fontaine, who, familiar as she is among the dramatis personæ of recent fiction, has an attractive freshness and individuality about her, especially in the matter of her friendship for the downtrodden Maria. The two men—Borrodale and John Harland, who makes love to Maria at the beginning and turns up again as her successful suitor for the happiness-ever-after at the end—are a little more ordinary. But there is a firm touch throughout the whole, and the narrative is always bright and sympathetic—a pleasant and wholesome book, in fact, is "Infatuation," and one of the best Mrs. Croker has given us.

Mr. Thomas Nelson Page enjoys a wide reputation in the United States, and we remember reading, some years ago, certain short stories of his concerning the nigger of the Southern States, with much enjoyment. But his novel, Red Rock (Heinemann, 6s.), is a disappointment. In the first place, it is of a most amazing prolixity, a prolixity which carries the author into 450 closely-printed pages ; and secondly, all sense of proportion, all sense of perspective are lacking, so that everything, as in a Japanese drawing, is seen on the same plane, and everything seen is of the same size.

It is on this account, no doubt, that despite the patient chronicling which Mr. Page gives to the sayings and doings of his characters, they hardly live, or appear as anything but the pleasant conventional puppets of fiction. Thus, all the young women are beautiful and good, all the young men are good and brave, the elders have a "courtly old-world air," and though the middle-aged folk may display a little eccentricity, their heart is always in the right place. Everybody carries his or her "head high," a point which Mr. Page never omits to emphasize, and the necessary villain or so finds the end of his rope with the end of the book. All things, indeed, work for the best in this singularly impossible world of "Red Rock." The story is laid in one of the Southern States, both before and after the War of Secession ; and that the author skips over the four actual war years is an act of mercy for which we thank him. A word of praise is due to the illustrations, but we looked in vain for the artist's name upon the title-page.

STORIES OF ADVENTURE.

The novel of adventure is undoubtedly the best vein to work just at present, and Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe has no doubt done wisely in transplanting to the moors of Yorkshire and Westmorland a variation of the story with which Mr. Blackmore scored his greatest success. Perhaps some people may be found to think that Ricroft of Withens (Unwin, 6s.) is built too obviously on the model of "Lorna Doone." It must be confessed that Mr. Sutcliffe makes no attempt to disguise his indebtedness to the older author. Between Christopher Ricroft and the great John Ridd there is little to choose in the matter of inches ; the Carlesses in their stronghold of the Lonely Valley offer many points of resemblance to the Doones ; and the feud between Black Carless and the hero recalls at every turn the long struggle between John Ridd and Carver Doone. In the matter of bloodshed, indeed, the pupil excels his master—a fact significant of the taste of the age. There is fighting enough in this volume to satisfy the most bloodthirsty readers—a furious encounter at the Silent Inn, the adventures of Ricroft with the army of Charles Stuart at Culloden and elsewhere, the final slaughter of the Carless clan, besides several single combats. And they are all well done, too. Mr. Sutcliffe has the art of keeping his readers' attention, and of carrying them along with him in his headlong course. It is but just to say that the story never flags ; it is spirited, well-told, and full of incident ; and several of the characters, and those not the worst drawn, are indisputably the author's own. The book gives promise of better work in the future. As it stands, it is eminently readable, and it is certainly founded on a good model. The style is brisk, and there is not too much dialect, though sufficient to give a distinctly Northumbrian flavour. Occasionally Mr. Sutcliffe's epithets are rather incongruous ; twice, if we recollect aright, he calls attention to the "rheumy legs" of Peter Marsh. But he can certainly describe a fight.

Even the most insatiable lover of adventure will be satisfied by the story told by Mr. Russell M. Garnier in THE COUNTERPART (Harper Brothers, 6s.). In it he will hear the clash of arms, the voices of fair ladies in distress, and be admitted even to the presence-chambers of kings. The hero, Oliver Drake, is cousin to John Churchill, first Duke of Marlborough, to whom he bears as extraordinary a likeness as the hero in the "Prisoner of Zenda" to the Prince of Ruritania. Drake's personal romance is connected with the beautiful Corinne de Tour, beloved also by a certain Marquis de Monteserrat who, on getting his rival into his power, proceeds to starve him to death as a means of inducing the lady to save her lover's life by consenting to marry his tormentor. A spirited rescue of Corinne is at length effected by the hero and his illustrious kinsman. Drake then takes service with Churchill under Turenne, and after some years of military life, returns to wed his "faithful maid." Despite the improbability of certain incidents it is a well told, vigorous story.

People who want adventure in their story-books have only to turn to page thirty-four of THE WHITE PRINCESS OF THE HIDDEN CITY, by David Lawson Johnstone (Chambers, 3s. 6d.). It depicts a man hanging over a gulf, clinging to a tree whose roots are tearing away by his weight, while an aggressively deadly serpent is doing its best to get at him. Mr. Johnstone's imagination is engagingly lurid, and he revels in mysterious hidden cities, hoards of priceless treasure, and colossal figures of feature more varied than soothing. Mr. Boucher's illustrations "play up" to him in fine style. We sympathize with him on the one which has been reproduced on the cover and gained grotesqueness in the move.

Another story of adventure is Mr. Kirk Munroe's THE COPPER PRINCESS (Harper, 6s.)—a tale of mining life in the Lake Superior District. Perhaps it is a little too wildly improbable in some of its incidents ; perhaps, too, Mr. Richard Feveril is rather too much the conventional hero of boys' book. But the locality is new, the story is well constructed and full of exciting adventure, and the majority of the characters are pleasantly original. Mr. Munroe's book should be popular with boys. It is well illustrated by Mr. W. A. Rogers.

MR. SPENCER AND MR. CROZIER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I supposed that the two quotations I gave would suffice. As they do not, let me add a third, which is specially relevant to the point Mr. Crozier insists upon. It will be found in First Principles, §62, in the chapter on "The Persistence of Force":—

But now what is the force of which we predicate persistence? It is not the force we are immediately conscious of in our own muscular efforts ; for this does not persist . . . we are compelled to admit that force, as it exists out of our consciousness, is not force as we know it. Hence the force of which we assert persistence is that Absolute Force of which we are indefinitely conscious as the necessary correlate of the force we know. By the Persistence of Force we really mean the persistence of some Cause which transcends our knowledge and conception. . . .

Thus, quite unexpectedly, we come down once more to that ultimate truth in which, as we saw, Religion and Science coalesce.

With this illustration of what Mr. Crozier calls "pure and unadulterated materialism" I must leave the matter; merely asking him whether he thinks that the view above expressed is like the view which his condemnatory phrase will suggest to his readers.

I am, &c.,

HERBERT SPENCER.

Brighton, February 5.

JOUBERT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am not concerned with the critical estimate of Joubert's Pensées so contemptuously expressed in last week's Literature.* Your reviewer is on one side—Chateaubriand, Sainte Beuve, almost every modern French critic of distinction, and Matthew Arnold on the other. I may perhaps be allowed to think that Joubert will not suffer in the contest.

But there is a sentence in your review which, in justice to one of the best and most blameless of men, cannot be allowed to pass unnoticed—unwelcome as the task is. Your reviewer allows himself to say, after drawing a sarcastic picture of Joubert's peculiarities:—

Then there is the account of the philosopher's marriage and amours. He married, it seems, in 1793, and in 1794 fell in love with Pauline de Beaumont, with whom he corresponded on the subject of Mme. Joubert's qualities and defects. As Mrs. Ward puts it, "He quietly says of her, 'I knew that she had merit and some charms. The charms are gone; the merit remains.' . . ." One feels a certain malicious joy in learning that the man who "quietly says" things of that sort to his mistress was afterwards jilted by his mistress in favour of the more engaging Chateaubriand; and one is also a little surprised at Mrs. Ward, who gravely records the quiet saying as the final word on the subject of Mme. Joubert's intelligence.

I hardly know whether these words awaken more wrath or more amusement in any one acquainted with Joubert, his milieu, and his correspondence. As I have said in the introduction, Joubert's "romance, profound as it came to be, was as harmless as himself." His devotion to Madame de Beaumont was shared by his whole household, first and foremost by Madame Joubert. One of the chief anxieties of his correspondence is to bring the aristocratic and fastidious Pauline to understand his homely, brusque, and silent wife, so that Madame Joubert's kindness and uprightness may prove a refuge for the storm-tossed and bereaved Pauline, who had lost her all in the Terror. Let any one read the constant entreaties that Joubert addresses in the name of all the Villeneuve family to Pauline de Beaumont, that she will allow herself to be nursed and cheered among them; let him look at the letter in which Joubert expresses to Pauline the anxiety he has gone through about his wife, who would attend on their little son, during inoculation, although—

"Ce qu'il y a de plus problématique au monde, c'est qu'elle ait eu la petite vérole. . . . J'ai vécu"—he goes on—"dans de grandes trances; mais j'en suis revenu. Pour elle, elle s'est entêtée à ne rien craindre, et actuellement elle persifle ma prudence avec une insolence que je serais bien fâché qu'elle n'eût pas. Cette insolence envers moi ne l'empêche pas d'être pénétrée pour vous du respect le plus senti et le mieux fondé. Regardez-la toute sa vie, Madame, comme une des âmes où votre mérite [—here, by the way, it is Madame de Beaumont to whom the insulting word is applied!—] est le mieux connu et le plus honoré."

Are these the terms in which a man would write, under the circumstances imagined by your reviewer? Then let who will read the passage translated in my introduction which describes how a letter from Pauline at Mont Dore delights the whole carriage-full of the Joubert family, "down to the children and the horse"; let him look at the terms in which Paul de Raynal, Joubert's nephew, speaks of his uncle's friendship with Madame de Beaumont—at the account of the abiding sorrow with which the Joubert family kept the month of October sacred to Pauline's memory; and, finally, at Joubert's whole character, and at the impression left by it, as of something ethereally stainless, on his contemporaries and his immediate posterity; and then let the inquirer ask himself, whether there is not something to regret in such a sentence as that which I have quoted at the head of this letter?

Yours faithfully,

MARY A. WARD.

* This letter arrived too late for the issue of Feb. 4.

 Concerning the merit of Joubert's aphorisms we hold our own opinion as firmly as Mrs. Ward holds that of Mr. Matthew Arnold; and our reviewer will return to the subject next week. As regards Mrs. Ward's contention that the lady to whom the philosopher wrote to complain that his wife's charms had vanished was not his mistress, we need only remark here that the effect of this plea, if admitted, is not to justify the philosopher's reference to his wife, but simply to destroy one obvious explanation of it.

MR. HERBERT SPENCER'S PHILOSOPHY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In his review of my book, "Sursum Corda," your able and courteous reviewer has, I think, misconceived the drift of my last chapter. It is not to Mr. Spencer the agnostic that I impute anthropocentricity (which, by the way, I do not regard as an "error") but to Mr. Spencer the great architectonic thinker. It seems to me that Mr. Spencer's attempt to base a philosophical system on the data of man's bodily senses only is quite as anthropocentric as Mr. Balfour's attempt to discredit that system by showing that it is repugnant to man's spiritual desires and instincts.

But be that as it may. It is not because Mr. Spencer is anthropocentric that I venture to criticize him, but because he persistently ignores the evidence of man's spiritual desires and instincts.

Your reviewer seems to agree with Mr. Spencer that Mr. Balfour's appeal to those desires and instincts is unjustifiable except on the assumption that "things have been pre-arranged by some agency for man's benefit." I cannot understand why the question-begging prefix pre has been introduced into this sentence. Nowadays we are all—idealists and materialists alike—ready to admit that "things" have not been pre-arranged by supernatural agencies, but that somehow or other they have arranged and are arranging themselves. From this point of view all our desires and instincts seem to be in the same category. If those which we call spiritual belong to our normal nature, they must have been evolved, like all other desires and instincts, by the slow but irresistible action of natural agencies, and if so it is quite certain that the "constitution of things" does "minister" to them and that they have natural functions to fulfil. Mr. Spencer himself has taught us that all man's desires have been generated, and are ever being modified, by the pressure of his environment—the relation between organism and environment being, of course, one of action and reaction—and from this we may surely infer that every normal desire has a real object in the sense of being directed towards something which man's environment really contains. Mr. Spencer, again, insists that the nature of man "has been moulded to fit the surrounding world." If this be so—if it be true that man is what he is because the "surrounding world" is what it is—it surely follows that the nature of man reflects, in its characteristic desires and instincts, the essential properties of the "surrounding world." To quote my own words:—"Just as the existence of the desire which we call thirst proves to demonstration that water enters largely into the composition both of the human body and of its normal environment, so does the existence of spiritual desires suggest to us—to say the least—that the objects of these desires are real elements both in the nature of man and in the universe which surrounds him. . . . (for) It is only by bringing its desires into the closest possible harmony with the resources of its environment that an organism is able to hold its own in the general struggle for existence." Your reviewer has not answered this argument. "Yet I cannot help thinking that it deserves an answer."

In conclusion, Mr. Spencer strongly objects to being called a materialist; but he will, I fear, continue to be classed with materialists so long as his prejudice against man's spiritual desires and instincts forbids him to regard these as significant natural phenomena, which, in virtue of their naturalness deserve to be dispassionately studied, not in order that they may be explained away, but in order that their several meanings and functions may be determined. Many years have passed since "First Principles" made its appearance, and Mr. Spencer himself has written much since then. Instead of referring us to what he wrote forty years ago, will he tell us what he now thinks about such problems as those of volition, causation, the external world, &c.? Above all, will he tell us what is his present "criterion of reality"? I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

THE AUTHOR OF "SURSUM CORDA."

SIR WALTER BESANT'S "THE PEN AND THE BOOK."

TO THE EDITOR.

Dear Sir,—I have read Sir Walter's book with interest, and also the criticisms of it which have been appearing in your columns, and I should like to draw attention to the following points:—

On page 167 Sir Walter falls foul of the S.P.C.K. for paying only £12, £20, or £30 for books "which, in some cases (the italics are mine) have brought in large sums." But supposing that Sir Walter pays a potato salesman £12 for some seed potatoes, which he plants in a field, and at the end of the season, after paying for rent, labour, seed potatoes, and manure, he makes a substantial profit on his outlay, say 50 per cent. Has the salesman any right to complain because he only got £12 for the good seed potatoes which brought Sir Walter such a fat profit? Or should the man who buys Sir Walter's crop to resell it, expect to get it at less than market value because, if he did not, he would make only 25 per cent. on his outlay, while Sir Walter makes more?

In both cases, I think, one must answer, No. But let

Sir Walter	= a publisher
Potato salesman	= an author
Seed potatoes	= a book written to order
Field	= a publishing business
Rent	= rent

And we find on page 168 that the publisher (or Sir Walter) is held up to scorn for paying only £12 for the book (or the potatoes), while on page 162 it is claimed that the man who buys the crop to resell it (or the bookseller) is being "charged too much." I have underlined "in some cases," at the beginning of this letter and on purpose, for similar qualifying sentences are at times remarkable from their frequent occurrence—e.g., p. 140 "when an author is in demand," "if they become popular," "if they are adopted," while at other times they are conspicuous by their absence—e.g., "the bookseller gets a profit of 8½d. per volume if he sells all he buys" (the italics are Sir Walter's). "But he does not sell all he buys." The publisher and the author between them get a profit of 2s. 6d." And again, on p. 162. "The bookseller continues to get his 8½d. if he sells the book he has paid for" (the italics are again Sir Walter's). "The publisher makes 2s. 10d. a copy, of which the author has to get his share." In both these cases Sir Walter omits to mention that the publisher only makes a profit if he sells sufficient copies to cover his outlay, and only makes the full profit if he sells all he produces—considerations of as great importance to the publisher as the selling of the copies bought is to the bookseller.

Then on pp. 145-146, after requesting the beginner to dismiss from his mind all preconceived ideas of publishers, and saying that they (the publishers) love to indulge in "trade talk" of being "the unselfish patrons of literature," Sir Walter goes on to remark that the majority of publishers are dishonest. ("While a few will be restrained from dishonesty by scruples of honour, the majority will not.") It would be interesting to hear the grounds on which Sir Walter bases his description of "Trade Talk." I have never yet heard a publisher represent himself as an "unselfish patron," &c., but I have heard it maintained that a publisher can do much to increase the value of an author's writings by handling them judiciously. Does Sir Walter mean this? If so, he has expressed himself very badly.

What, again, are his grounds for saying that the majority of publishers are dishonest any more than the majority of merchants or authors? There are, no doubt, black sheep among publishers as among other trades and professions (authors included), but would it be right to say that the majority of authors are thieves, because a few have not fulfilled their engagements? Such a sweeping charge of dishonesty against men of education, most of whom are of good family and have had the best of training, should either be accompanied by the reasons for the charge and the publication of the names of the delinquents, or should never be made. If Sir Walter would publish the names of the dishonest majority his proofs would soon be tested in a Court of law.

These points to which I have drawn attention are only straws, but they show which way the wind blows. Sir Walter's views on publishing are fairly notorious, and can be discounted by those who know, but this book is meant for beginners, who will probably believe that the statements in it are impartial. It is, therefore, only fair to point out that this is not always the case.

I do not quarrel with Sir Walter for urging authors to look after their interests. It is in every way desirable that they should; but I would ask him to be just, and not to imagine that every one who makes a good bargain or a successful speculation is a thief.

Yours obediently,

G. S. W.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—This discussion in your columns has so far been conducted on one side by certain publishers who speak for themselves upon matters about which they have a close and intimate knowledge, and on the other by Sir Walter Besant speaking on behalf of somebody else. Why do not one or two of Sir Walter Besant's protégés contribute a detailed statement of his or her particular grievance? Who are these protégés? What are their books? Does anybody except the author say that the publisher's payment for this or that particular book has been insufficient? In some cases it might not be altogether pleasant to give names and particulars; but if publishers' victims are so numerous and so deeply aggrieved, surely there must be a few willing to come forward and specify their grievances.

I do not know whether I and all my literary acquaintances have been exceptionally lucky, but I myself, who have had business dealings with six firms of publishers, have not come across one who has tried any of these ingeniously fraudulent tricks on me, and I have never met a writer, man or woman, who has encountered them. I have tried various methods of publication—the sale of the copyright, royalties, and profit-sharing—and have detected in none of them any attempts at fraud. I sold the copyright of my first novel for the sum of £40 and of my last for the sum of £375, dealing on nearly all occasions with men of whom I had no personal knowledge and to whom I had no introduction. Looking in the daily papers I have seen the books advertised in an ordinary and sufficient manner; the money has been paid as agreed in perfectly regular fashion; and I have never been asked to advance a penny. Further, as I have said, I find that my experiences are those of all my acquaintances without exception.

That Sir Walter Besant has got many friends with many and severe grievances is obvious, but is it impertinent curiosity to ask, Who are they? Is there among them a single person who has anything to say which is worth hearing and who has also the capacity for saying it? If not, is it a matter for much surprise, or regret that a few second-class publishing houses should demand, under more or less honest pretexts, certain sums of money for printing their writings? A country upholsterer of my acquaintance, who was engaged to remove certain delicate bits of glass and carving from one house to another, sent in a bill where each bit of work was charged for separately, and which concluded with the item: "In general: A Troublesome and Risky Job, £2." If my country friend had been a London publisher, besieged by schoolboys and schoolgirls with impossible manuscripts, he would have learned the art of distributing the extra £2 among the previous items, and would have fallen under the ban of Sir Walter Besant's displeasure. But I am afraid that he would meet with a good deal of sympathy.

Yours faithfully,

EDWARD H. COOPER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—“A Publisher” must be a bold man to attempt publicly to controvert statements of fact made by Sir Walter Besant on the relations of publishers and authors. Sir Walter's knowledge of the subject, acquired during his many years' connexion with the Society of Authors, is unique, and probably far greater than that of any publisher the source of whose information is mainly limited to his own particular business.

I can confirm much that is in “The Pen and the Book” from my personal experiences. I have had a profit-sharing agreement in which I did not get half the profits; I have sold a book outright for a substantial sum; have had a deferred royalty and royalties which were not deferred; I have published books on commission with publishers who must have made a good profit on the cost of production; and, last of all, I have published a book according to the “Method of the Future.”

As to selling outright, an adequate price for all rights is, of course, satisfactory, but it is difficult to ascertain what is an adequate price. The half-profit system is, in the words of a publisher-friend of mine, “a swindle.” It has often been exposed in the Author. To pay a publisher, who has money invested in other works, to publish a book on commission is usually to court disaster. The royalty system is probably the fairest, if publishers would only agree to increase the royalty in fair proportion to the largely increased profits on reprints.

With regard to novels, of which I have written six, two of them produced on the royalty system by firms of high standing, I am, after trying the experiment, convinced that the method advocated in “The Pen and the Book” is indeed the “Method of the Future.” I had none of the terrible fatigue and trouble so graphically described by “A Publisher.” There was some difficulty in finding men who did not, according to the traditions of the publishing trade, want to fleece the author. But I would allow of no undue preference. I was a publisher, and would be treated as one. Having found my men, it did not take ten minutes to instruct the printer to set up such a sample page of my MS. as would give a book of the right length; my corrections were few, and were charged for at 10d. the hour. A postcard to the paper makers produced samples, and, later on, a dummy copy to show thickness of book. A ten minutes' chat with a binder, whom I told the price I was willing to pay, and, later on, selecting one out of several sample covers concluded the business. As Sir Walter truly says, a schoolboy could learn how to do it in a week. I knew how many copies were printed, and could not be swindled; credit was given without demur, as soon as my men knew I was an author of some standing; I obtained discounts; and, finally, as a crowning triumph, my book sold better through the new and special kind of publisher on commission than either of my novels published through firms of really high standing. The cost of the first three thousand copies, allowing a reasonable sum for advertising, was about £150, the figures given on p. 164 in Sir Walter Besant's book.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

AN AUTHOR.

P.S.—The above was written before I had an opportunity of reading Mr. Victor Spiers' letter in your issue of February 4. I beg to associate myself with his tribute of deep gratitude to Sir Walter Besant, and add that “The Pen and the Book” is the most complete handbook to the literary life that has yet appeared. For a certain kind of fraud Mr. Victor Spiers suggests that author and publisher should sign all copies. Here is a story true and in point. A special edition for collectors, advertised as being limited to a stated number, was signed by the author up to the number stated. A day came when the author discovered an unsigned copy on the table of a friend! Yet the house was one of the highest standing in London, so high that were I to name it many would disbelieve the story, and you would very properly decline to print it without being furnished with proof.

NAMES IN FICTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—To the cases cited last week by your contributor “H. H. F.” of the use in fiction of names of personages which the owners thereof in real life have objected to have associated with the incidents of the fictitious story, perhaps you will allow me to add the very notable case furnished by Captain Marryat's “Masterman Ready.”

As readers of that delightful boys' book will remember, the old sailor Ready, in the course of the story, tells how in his boyish days he and his widowed mother had been defrauded of their due by the boy's godfather, a certain “Mr. Masterman,” a shipbuilder and shipowner of South Shields. The sequel to this choice by the author, not only of the name, but of the calling and the place of residence of the villain of the piece, is shown in the following “Note” by Captain Marryat, which was appended to the story after its first publication, and appears there still in current editions:—

The author of this little work has received a letter from one of the family of the Mastermans, stating that an unpleasant feeling has been created by his assuming that name for the godfather of Masterman Ready, inasmuch as the character of the godfather is not one that is at all enviable. What might make it appear that he had actually referred to one of the members of that family in this work of fiction is that, by the strangest coincidence, there have been Mastermans for nearly a century residing at South Shields, and as shipowners and builders, so that by a mere chance he has not only assumed the name, but the residence and the occupation of the parties. It is, therefore, his duty to state that this coincidence, strange as it is, was quite an accident, and that he never could or would have taken a step which could cause any pain or annoyance to so respectable a family.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

R. M. JOHNS.

“THE LYKE-WAKE DIRGE.”

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I be allowed to assure your correspondent, Mr. Mayhew, that Mr. Speight's reading of the line, “Fire and sleet and candle-light,” is certainly good sense, whether authoritative or not.

It was adopted by Scott (see his “Minstrelsy,” vol. II., p. 349, edition 1806), where he says, “the word sleet in the chorus seems to be corrupted from selt or salt; a quantity of which, in compliance with a popular superstition, is frequently placed on the breast of a corpse.”

I may add that in Northumberland, where the ballad probably originated, as did many other ballads that Scott, being a Scotchman, attributed to the Scottish border, the custom of placing a handful of salt on a dead body still prevails in poor Roman Catholic families, and that in the local patois salt is occasionally pronounced sleet. The association of the two purifying agencies, salt and fire, with the corpse candle, I would have thought obvious.—Yours truly,

P. ANDERSON GRAHAM.

Authors and Publishers.

Early in the summer Mr. Grant Richards will publish Mr. W. J. Stillman's "Life of Crispi." The preface will be a study of the character of Crispi and a frank statement of the relation between him and the Press, The Times included. The entire edition of 1,000 copies of "The Old Rome and the New," by the same writer, has been sold, but there will be no second edition.

A Life of Dr. Dollinger, by Professor Friedrich, is on the eve of publication. Dr. Dollinger was in correspondence with some of the most influential people of his day, both lay and clerical, in Europe and in America, took a keen interest not only in theology, but in politics, and was one of the best informed men of his day. Professor Friedrich has already made his mark in literature, and he knew Dollinger well.

It was known that Alphonse Daudet had left a certain number of unpublished MSS. The announcement is now made that his unfinished posthumous novel, "La Caravane," will be published almost immediately. Only the first hundred pages were actually completed by Daudet; but the remainder of the volume will consist of the copious notes and plans which he had drafted for use in the writing of the latter part of his story. This method of publication was adopted, it will be remembered, in the case of Flaubert's posthumous work, "Bouvard et Pécuchet," and the result was fairly satisfactory, though, of course, in that case, a good deal more than a hundred pages had attained their final form when Flaubert died. From a literary point of view the plan seems preferable to that followed in the case of Stevenson's "Prisoner of St. Ives"; though the average reader, hating an unfinished story, may wish that the master's work had been completed by M. Léon Daudet, or some other faithful disciple, just as Stevenson's was completed by Mr. Quiller Couch.

The Professor of Literature in Columbia University, Mr. Brander Matthews, has recently written a critical introduction to a new complete edition, in English, of the novels and notes of Alphonse Daudet, which is being issued in Boston by Messrs. Little, Brown, and Co. He has also recently prepared a biographical and critical introduction to a new complete library edition of the works of "Mark Twain."

Messrs. Methuen will shortly commence the publication of an edition of those novels of W. M. Thackeray which have passed out of copyright. Each book will be in two or three small volumes, and will contain an introduction by Mr. Stephen Gwynn. Each volume will have a photogravure frontispiece.

When Messrs. Constable have brought out their edition of Fielding's novels, they will begin the issue of Smollett's work in a similar form. This will run into twelve volumes. The first will appear in April, with a critical introduction by Mr. Henley.

Mr. W. H. Wilkins, M.A., literary executor to the late Lady Burton, who has revised and written a preface for the new edition of the "Life of Sir Richard F. Burton," just published by Messrs. Duckworth, is also preparing for publication the remaining posthumous MSS. of Sir Richard Burton, more especially his version of "Pilpay's Fables."

Mr. J. E. Vincent, the author of a memoir of the late Duke of Clarence and writer on the Welsh land question, is writing a "Life" of John Nixon, the Pioneer of the Welsh Steam Coal Trade. This volume will be published by Mr. Murray.

Mr. Maurice Hewlett is writing a monograph on "Verona" for Messrs. Dent's Medieval Towns Series. Other volumes in preparation are "Toledo," by Miss Hannah Lynch, "Nuremberg," by Mr. Cecil Headlam, and "Siena," by Mr. R. T. Douglas.

A marriage, on which we offer our congratulations, is announced to take place at Rome, on February 25, between Mr. William Heinemann and "Kassandra Vivaria," whose novel, "Via Lucis," achieved a considerable success a few months ago. Here is proof, of the most convincing kind, that all authors do not regard publishers as their natural enemies. The real name of "Kassandra Vivaria" is Donna Magda Stuart Sindici.

The Scottish History Society promises some more interesting publications. "Papers relating to the Scots Brigade" at the Hague, edited by Mr. James Ferguson, consist of Extracts from the Resolutions of the States General, Resolutions of the Council of State, Portfolios of Requests, of Diplomatic Correspondence, and of Military Affairs, &c. A break caused by the Revolution of 1688 when the regiments passed for about ten years into the direct service of Great Britain under William III. divides the Papers into two volumes, and the second will carry on the foreign history of the regiments from the Revolution until the merging of the Brigade in the Dutch national troops, and the departure of the British officers in 1783. The society contemplates issuing by-and-by a third volume, consisting of papers kept in the several regiments during the eighteenth century and now preserved among the municipal archives in the Town-hall of Rotterdam. The genesis and importance of the Montreuil correspondence, published by the same society, has already been discussed in this column on September 10th, when we referred to the first volume. We understand that the society will publish the second volume within the next few weeks.

We regret to notice the death, from angina pectoris, of Mr. Walter Hamilton. Mr. Hamilton was the author of many books, including a memoir of George Cruikshank, with whom he had been on terms of personal friendship, a "History of the Poets Laureate of England," a volume on "The Aesthetic Movement in England," and "Parodies of the Works of British and American Authors." He was also an authority on Book Plates, a Vice-President of the Ex Libris Society, and of the Société Française des Collectionneurs d'Ex Libris, and "Parodist" to the "Sette of Odd Volumes." His last book, "Odd Volumes and their Book Plates," appeared only a few weeks ago.

Dr. C. D. Ginsburg, who has been devoting his life to a minute study of the traditional "apparatus criticus" of the Old Testament, known by the name of "Massorah," is now printing a huge work in English with the object of explaining the numberless rubrics and technical terms which constitute the lore of the Massorites. Dr. Ginsburg is literally the only person in England who gives his whole mind to the Massorah, and there are probably not more than three or four persons in the whole of Europe who follow his example.

Paul Laurence Dunbar, the negro poet and author of "Lyrics of Lowly Life," has in the press a second series of poems, which Messrs. Dodd, Mead, and Co. will publish shortly. The same firm announce a new volume of poems by Dora Sigerson (Mrs. Clement K. Shorter), entitled "My Lady's Slipper."

"The Perfect Wagnerite," reviewed in our last number, is published by Mr. Grant Richards, and not, as stated, by Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein. The price at which it is issued is 3s. 6d., and not 6s.

Mr. W. Davenport Adams writes:—

With reference to your kindly note on my "Dictionary of the Drama," will you allow me to say that it is now being passed through the press, and that, if all goes well, only a few months will elapse before its publication? Its issue has been delayed by causes so entirely personal and private that I need not trouble you or your readers with a recital of them.

Canon MacColl, whose last volume dealt with the affairs of the "Sultan and the Powers," is engaged upon a work on the subject of the current ecclesiastical controversy.

Mr. "Benjamin Swift" has nearly finished a new novel which he has called "The Siren." The book is largely a study of Naples, with which city Mr. Paterson is well acquainted.

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett have in the press a novel by Mr. Hamilton Aidé, which will be published on the 17th.

A new novel by Mr. Joseph Conrad will be published in the autumn by Messrs. Blackwood. Hitherto Mr. Conrad's novels have been published by Mr. Fisher Unwin.

"Athelstone Ford" is to be the title of Mr. Allen Upward's novel, which will shortly be published by Messrs. Pearson. It is a romance of adventure in India in the days of Clive, and contains a study of character of an almost forgotten type—the Puritan of the eighteenth century before the rise of Methodism. Mr. Upward is also writing a series of sketches, which will begin in Pearson's Magazine next July, under the title of "Historic Mysteries." In some cases his solution of the mysteries is a new one, and in general he has combated the extreme scepticism of the modern historical school. Another book of Mr. Upward's will before long be published under a pseudonym. He is animated by the laudable desire of testing his fortunes, and does not like to be charged with giving the public 'prentice work on the strength of a subsequently acquired reputation.

Mr. Charles Warren Stoddart, the Professor of English Literature in the Catholic University of Washington, the author of "South Sea Idylls," and of a popular life of St. Anthony of Padua, has a volume of stories in the press entitled "My Late Widow." The scenes of these sketches are laid in Tahiti, Honolulu, Hawaii, England, Italy, and the Orient. This will be followed by a second collection of somewhat similar character.

Mr. Clive Holland has almost finished the manuscript of a new novel of artist life in the Quartier Latin. It will probably appear serially first, and in volume form in the autumn.

Queen Nathalie of Servia, who is at present living at Florence, is said to be engaged in writing a novel which is likely to be published shortly.

Mrs. Gertrude Atherton has written another novel entitled "A Daughter of the Vine." It will be issued this spring by Service and Paton.

Mr. Abraham Cahan, of New York, is engaged upon a novel dealing with the life of the educated Russian Jews in the United States, with certain phrases of nihilism, the anti-Jewish riots of 1882, and the beginning of the overflowing Jewish immigration in America.

Mr. John Bickerdyke has just completed a romance entitled "The Passing of Prince Rozan," partly a yachting story and partly concerned with disclosures in recent bankruptcy proceedings. It will be published in New York by Messrs. Putnam's Sons, and in London by Mr. Thomas Burleigh.

Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton, and Co.'s list of forthcoming Lent publications includes a volume by the Bishop of Stepney, entitled "Banners of the Christian Faith"; "Christ in the City: some Elements of Religion in Common Life," by Rev. H. Bickersteth Ottley; Prof. Tyrrell Greene's "The Sinner's Restoration"; the Rev. the Hon. James Adderley's "Salvation by Jesus."

We hear that more than 50,000 copies have been sold of Mr. G. W. Stevens' "With Kitchener to Khartoum."

For M. Bonnet's "Bibliothèque Internationale d'Economie Politique" a translation of Professor Ashley's "Economic History" has been undertaken by M. Lepelletier, chargé de conférence à la faculté de droit de Paris. The second volume of the German translation, in the series edited by Professor Brentano for Messrs. Duncker and Hamblet, appeared last year.

Professor A. Chevalley, one of the staff of the Temps, has just delivered a lecture in Paris on "John Keats: English Romanticism and the Religion of Beauty." It will soon be published.

THE TIMES ATLAS.

THE TIMES ATLAS as a COMPANION to the NEWSPAPER.

At the present time not a day passes in which a reference to a good map is not necessary. Public attention is now closely directed to what is taking place in EGYPT, in CHINA, in K. and W. AFRICA, in the TRANSVAAL, in the PHILIPPINES, in the WEST INDIES, in the ANTARCTIC OCEAN, and in many other parts of the globe. In every one of these cases a proper appreciation of current events can only be arrived at with the assistance of a good map.

THE TIMES ATLAS in the LIBRARY.

Books such as "The Life of Prince Bismarck," "Egyptian Soudan," "Nansen's Farthest North," "The Forbidden Land," &c., and, indeed, every history or book of travels should be read with a good atlas on the table. Every book reader will, therefore, regard The Times Atlas as a most welcome present.

To buy The Times Atlas, and to despatch it to a friend, involves a minimum of trouble. It is only necessary to send a Postal Order representing the cost of the volume selected to THE TIMES OFFICE, addressed to

THE PUBLISHER,

Printing-house-square,

London, E.C.

and to give the name and address of the person for whom the book is intended. The Atlas will then be immediately despatched in a carefully packed parcel, and delivered to the addressee, post free, within the United Kingdom.

For those who desire to send the Atlas to Friends abroad a list of Postal charges to different countries is given below.

THE WORKS OF ANON.

One of the most successful novels of the past year incidentally raised, it may be remembered, an interesting point of literary etiquette. "The Open Question" was the work of a lady who had for several years contrived to maintain an anonymity from which, at last, an indiscreet critic withdrew the veil, thereby provoking her to very natural protest. What surprises us most is that in these days the secret was kept so long, and that there was any complaint of its disclosure. Anonymous writing, except in newspapers, where it raises questions that we are not now considering, is not one of the fashions of the age. Everything is against it. The publishing trade is against it, and prefers that an author shall either possess a reputation or set about making one. And, as a rule, the authors themselves do not wish to be anonymous, but very much the reverse. The last infirmity of noble minds is endemic among them, so that all, or nearly all, make a bid for fame and its pecuniary results. That is natural enough; and yet, when the bid for fame is more than ordinarily loud, and the wares offered more than ordinarily common—a thing that has happened before now—one turns with a certain sympathy to any anonymous volume that asks to be treated on its mere merits. It is not that merit and anonymity always go together, but that one is wearied by prodigious puffs of Mr. Blank's new and important work, and by carefully advertised eulogies of his previous performances in the world of letters. There is something actually refreshing about a book which makes no appeal at all to the reader or the reviewer. Nor does the book itself suffer, if it is worth reading. It excites curiosity, which probably does it as much good in the long run as the log-rolling of innumerable friends.

Sooner or later, the curiosity of the public is sure to be satisfied. Books that make a sensation, always excepting the Letters of Junius, do not remain anonymous. For one thing, the unknown author is always in a position of embarrassment. Unless he is a born actor, he is the only man in the world who cannot discuss the epoch-making work. Besides, there is such a thing as internal evidence. This suggests a suspicion of the truth, and some chance hint or incautious word confirms the suspicion, and discloses the secret. But the instances of important anonymous books are not numerous after all. Scott was recognized as the author of "Waverley" long before he owned the fact, which, indeed, he did not do publicly for thirteen years. There was more real uncertainty, at first, about the origin of "Ecce Homo," a book which was ascribed, when it appeared in 1865, to a great variety of possible and impossible authors. As many of us will remember, it greatly exercised the religious world. Dean Church wrote of it with appreciation, easily perceiving the author's standpoint; Lord Shaftesbury denounced it with unmeasured abuse. But here again, the secret, though an honest attempt was made to keep it, soon became public property. It is practically impossible for a man of genius to hide his light under a bushel, even when he himself wishes it, and when his publisher, like the Jacobite bookseller in "Waverley," is "he that never peached his author." "Waverley," by the way, had a publisher of this kind, who took all manner of elaborate precautions to prevent the world from knowing that a successful poet had written a successful novel. The whole affair seems a little absurd to us in these days. Scott, in his preface of 1829, makes out rather a lame case for himself. In the first place he did not wish to endanger his position as a poet by appearing as a novelist; next, his position was so well established that no further success would improve it; next, "the cup of flattery" and "the partiality of friends" were to be avoided; and, finally, he never expected or hoped that the fact would remain concealed from his intimate acquaintance. Of course, it is always the intimate friend who puts two and two together and frustrates the efforts of the author and the publisher. The distinguished writer whose identity is thus discovered may find consolation in the thought that in a general way the public is willing enough to leave an anonymous author unmolested. In most cases, it is the author himself who knows best "how these things get into the papers."

For some reason or other, there is more anonymous poetry in the world than prose. We are not now referring to such poems as those of which the authorship has been lost in the lapse of centuries, the "Aetna," for instance, and the "Pervigilium Veneris," or to such ballads as "Chevy Chase," but to the considerable number of verses, and good verses too, by nameless and comparatively modern writers. There is the story of the young lady who examined a volume of select poems and finally expressed her preference for the verses of Mr. Anon. Perhaps she had fallen in love with "Helen of Kirkconnell"; for Helen, with as much true lyrical music as any poem in our language, is anonymous. So also, to name only one or two of the most popular, are "Cherry Ripe," "Love will find out the way," "A lover of late was I," and "O Waly, Waly." Ballads, many of them more famous than these, one expects to be anonymous; but in the Golden Treasury there are twelve anonymous poems, not ballads, judged worthy of a place in that fastidious collection. Many others are to be found elsewhere, of varying interest, it is true; but it may always be said of them that their own merits have saved them, and that they owe nothing to the celebrity of their authors. So many of them belong to the seventeenth century that one is tempted to assign them all to some imaginary poet of the time, tracing him from Westminster—the school of many poets—to Cambridge, and thence (his sympathies being clearly Royalist) to Oxford, where he saw the King's camp and Court, and wrote epigrams and amorous verses to Myrtilia and other scornful beauties.

But fancy is not a sure guide in history or literature. These anonymous pieces that one still admires are simply foundlings, for whose future no provision was ever made. Versifying was once a common accomplishment. These respectable waifs and strays are only the surviving representatives of a deal of forgotten rubbish. Their vitality has somehow preserved them for us, but it is now impossible to ascertain their parentage. Many a good little poem has been written by men who were not poets, and did not desire a reputation for poetry. That reputation, indeed, may sometimes be inconvenient, especially if the poetry is indifferent. The first public outing on Pegasus may not be a success, in which case one does not wish to attract much attention. It is all very well for Disraeli to say that "an anonymous writer should at least display power." That is true of all writers; but the beginner who honestly doubts whether his deserts are great or small does well to be anonymous. If he fails, the man who desires to see his adversary in print—a wish very generally gratified in the present day—will be disappointed; if he succeeds, it is always possible to throw off the mask. But, on the whole, people are exceptionally confident of their literary capacity. Failure in literature seems to discredit their native ability more seriously than any other kind of ill-success. A man will admit quite readily that he knows nothing of science, or that he is a bad man of business; but he will resent the suggestion that he cannot write a book. And that, perhaps, is one reason why so many books are written, and why, in this brave world of ours, so few of them are anonymous.

A year's campaign for the protection of literary property is described in the Report just issued by the committee of management of the Society of Authors. No fewer than 110 "cases" came up for treatment in the course of the year; but the nature of them is not such as to convict the Society of undue aggressiveness. In twenty-eight cases the literary property at issue consisted of MSS. which editors or publishers had not returned; in fifty cases it took the equally tangible shape of money claimed by authors from publishers; and there were twenty-three cases in which proper accounts were said to be not forthcoming. The Society's solicitors recovered four-sevenths of the MSS., and rather more than four-fifths of the money, and extracted twenty-one thirty-thirds of the missing accounts. This result may be said to show, at any rate, that the Society has an adequate reason for its existence.

On the other hand, in the matter of Copyright, some harm seems to arise from the rival activities of the Authors' Society and the Copyright Association. The Association wants a full Consolidating and Amending Act. The Society, thinking this impossible in the present state of public business, drafted a short Amending Bill which, without raising too many thorny questions, covered the ground in all essential particulars. Both Bills have been referred to a committee of the House of Lords; and this is how matters stand at present, the Association's Bill is hung up because its consideration would take up more time than the Government can afford; and the Society's Bill is hung up because with a full Consolidating and Amending Bill awaiting its turn, a lesser measure, which professes to go no further than tinkering, has no claim upon the valuable time of honourable members. It is a very unsatisfactory situation, and we do not pretend to know what way out of it is likely to be adopted.

"The Literary Year Book," edited by Mr. Joseph Jacobs, of which a new volume has just appeared, showing a vast improvement in completeness and accuracy to some of its previous issues, contains many particulars not obtainable elsewhere from which curious facts may be extracted. Its list of living authors, for instance, reveals, on close inspection, the fact that only twelve per cent. of our writers are women. This is, however, partly due to the inclusion of a good many men who have a very doubtful claim to be catalogued. Oddly enough the women illustrators of books are in exactly the same proportion. A general consideration of all Mr. Jacobs' lists shows the woman of letters in an entirely new light. Her most conspicuous qualities appear to be industry and what may be termed a general good will to literature. Women figure largely among the "literary searchers" and the "record searchers"; they entirely monopolize the "indexers," and, we may add, they form four-fifths of the typewriters. On the other hand, they have no place among the "literary agents" (of whom the list gives eight) nor among the publishers. But statistics are notoriously misleading.

So much new material for the historian is being continually unearthed from public and private libraries that the older histories will soon become out of date. One almost wonders whether, if their writers had realized what a store of necessary data lay still almost untouched, they would have had the hardihood to write at all. Following on the work of the Historical Manuscripts Commission, of the Master of the Rolls, and of the Selden and other societies, local authorities have now begun to print their records; and Cardiff—a very enterprising borough in all intellectual matters—is following the example so well set by Northampton, and publishing its archives under the editorship of Mr. John Hobson Matthews. They include records dating from Plantagenet times to the present day, and the first volume gives us municipal charters; accounts, lay and ecclesiastical, of the thirteenth and later centuries; Star Chamber proceedings; and a great deal of other interesting matter.

Municipal archives are often more valuable evidence than any other, because they not only throw light on the main current of history, but on its local backwaters; and they are highly useful to specialists in ecclesiastical or social history. To consult them with any effect has so far been a difficult and laborious matter. Their publication, like the publication of Parish Registers, will probably go on but slowly, but in both cases a good beginning has been made, and the same may be said with regard to private libraries, though, as we said last week, not much will be done until they are more systematically catalogued. Such books as the Duke of Grafton's autobiography and two or three volumes of correspondence of well-known literary men recently published give some idea of the treasures still hidden from the public eye, which are gradually finding their way to the light. The National Dictionary of Biography has been the means of unlocking the door of knowledge in a good many cases. The reprint and the facsimile are of course a concession to the modern demand that all knowledge should be brought in portable form to the student, instead of his having the trouble of fetching it. But it counteracts a more pernicious tendency by inviting him to go to original authorities, and from them to gather knowledge and form opinions for himself.

The old cry of envious Grub-street that all successful writers are thieves has been raised again in a somewhat more intelligent form. A learned French critic has come to the conclusion that plagiarism is the foundation of all literary success. This is rather too sweeping a theory: like the current hypotheses of the evolutionists, it is unable to carry us back to the very beginning. But the new examples by which it is supported lend weight to it. These include the demonstration of Chateaubriand's unsuspected debt to Aphra Behn, as well as of Victor Hugo's debt to Maturin—whom Balzac admired so much—and the assertion that the plot of "Salammbô" was stolen wholesale by Flaubert from an old romance. There is much to be said for it à priori for the Frenchman's view. Manner, in pure literature, is far more important than matter. As Buffon observed, it is the style which is the man—on what stuff he uses it is comparatively unimportant. The less trouble a writer spends on discovering or creating his material, the more energy he has to spare upon its adornment and presentation to the world. The man who steals his brooms ready made can prepare a taking shop window at much less cost than he who merely steals the raw materials. Thus, the greatest story-tellers and dramatists—Æschylus, Homer, Shakespeare, Molière—are those who never troubled about originality of matter, but took their plots where they found them. But the process is not to be indiscriminately commended to the young writer.

We have recently remarked, more than once, on the slow progress made by German readers in a knowledge of modern English Literature. Ruskin's writings, one would have thought—most of them so completely devoid of any insularity either in style or subject—would have, by this time, been as well known among German critics as, for instance, Lessing is among us. Yet a writer in Das literarische Echo points out that the author of "Modern Painters" is scarcely known at all in Germany, and very few of his works—and those not the most important—are to be found on the shelves of the Royal Library at Berlin. Jakob Feis, however, the translator of Tennyson's "In Memoriam," has just issued two small volumes of translations from Ruskin.

Reviews.

The Letters of Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett Barrett, 1845-46. With Portraits and Facsimiles. In two vols. 7½ x 5¼ in., 579 + 579 pp. London, 1899. Smith, Elder. 21/-

It was undoubtedly a difficult question which Mr. R. B. Browning has had to decide with regard to the publication of these very intimate letters. He thinks, and we agree with him, that his only alternatives were to allow them to be published or to destroy them. To have left the matter to the decision of others would, as he justly says, have been evading a responsibility which he felt it his duty to accept. His father's wishes in the matter had never been decisively indicated. He had destroyed all the rest of his correspondence, and not long before he said, referring to these letters, "There they are. Do with them as you please when I am dead and gone." Never perhaps was a literary executor left to decide a more delicate question with so complete a lack of clear guidance from without. He must have felt that there was much in the early correspondence between his father and his mother which was almost too sacred to be submitted to the public eye. Yet to destroy the whole, as was the only alternative, would not only have been to sacrifice the record of what is perhaps the tenderest and most spiritual love-story in all literary history, but would have involved the loss of an abundance of interesting comment and criticism exchanged between Robert Browning and his future wife on the current literature of the time. Nor would it have been possible to extract this latter element from the correspondence and present it separately; for, after the first few months' exchange of ideas and comparison of sympathies, courtship and criticism become so closely interwoven that they could not be separated without reducing the letters to a fragmentary condition. Mr. Browning has in these circumstances decided to give the correspondence to the world in its entirety, and his decision, though we think it a right one, can hardly fail to divide opinion. Even for those who read the letters which passed between Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett with the deepest interest in, and admiration for, the writers, it must, we think, be impossible not to feel that there is something bordering on impiety in this lifting of the veil. On the other hand, there are many moments when those in whom this sentiment of protest is strongest will be apt to feel that the shock to their susceptibilities was worth inflicting and suffering for the gain to literature and to the world of this unique record of the communings of two natures so lofty and so rare.

It is, indeed, in this spirit that criticism must approach it if anything like justice is to be done to its immense psychological interest. The critic should discreetly endeavour not to hear that continuous murmur of passionate endearments which begins on Browning's side at about the middle of the first volume, to be gradually, not immediately, responded to by Miss Barrett, and thereafter to be persistently echoed and re-echoed in amœbean utterances of "linked sweetness long"—perhaps too long—"drawn out," until the correspondence closes with the final departure of the wedded couple for the Continent a week after the romantic marriage which did not at first unite them in matrimonial companionship. The critic should endeavour not to hear what certainly was never intended for his or any other human ears than those of the two lovers themselves; and should confine his attention, as far as possible, to the gradual ripening of the reciprocal admiration of the two poets for each other's spiritual and intellectual personalities into an ardent mutual love. It is, in fact, in the progress of the affair from the first sentences of the first letter and the first reply, on January 10 and 11—from the "I love your verses with all my heart, dear Miss Barrett," and the "I thank you, dear Mr. Browning, from the bottom of my heart. You meant to give me pleasure by your letter," down to the fervent out-pourings of both correspondents in November and December of the same year, and onward to the date of their marriage in September, 1846—it is in tracing the course of the poetic wooing through these all-important months that the principal charm of the love idyll consists. The letters of this period do not, for various and obvious reasons, one of which has been already indicated, lend themselves to quotation; but as a whole the picture of the closer and closer approach of two impassioned and enthusiastic natures, as spiritual and intellectual sympathy gradually transforms itself into love, is one of undeniable and, especially on the woman's side, of remarkable beauty. The letter in particular, of September 16, in which she makes her first reply to Browning's proposal, and firmly points out the sad objections to their union, founded on the (as it was then considered) almost desperate state of her health, is written with a combination of dignity and tenderness which is very touching to contemplate:—

Shall I shrink from telling you besides [she writes], you who have been generous to me and have a right to hear it . . . and have spoken to me in the name of an affection and memory most precious and holy to me, in this same letter . . . that neither now nor formerly has any man been to my feelings what you are . . . and that if I were different in some respects and free in others by the providence of God, I would accept the great trust of your happiness gladly, proudly, and gratefully, and give away my own life and soul to that end. . . . But something worse than even a sense of unworthiness God has put between us, and judge yourself if to beat your thoughts against the immovable marble of it can be anything but pain and vexation of spirit, waste and wear of spirit to you—judge! The present is here to be seen, speaking for itself; and the best future you can imagine for me, what a precarious thing it must be—a thing for making burdens out of, only not for your carrying, as I have vowed to my own soul.

Even the protracted and portentous negotiations for the marriage, which was practically an elopement, only preceded, instead of followed, by the wedding ceremony, is largely redeemed from its ever threatening tediousness by Miss Barrett's share in the correspondence. Or at least it is that, combined with the quaint old-fashionedness of the whole affair—an air of antiquity that seems to put much more than half-a-century between its day and our own—which holds our attention. The singular figure of Mr. Barrett, with his incomprehensible hostility to a perfectly suitable match, his imperious claim to control the action of a daughter thirty odd years of age and possessed of independent means, and the unfeigned awe with which the daughter, by that time a poet of established fame and a "personage" in the eyes of the world, regarded him—all this seems to take us back from the Victorian era to that of George II., and to recall the relations of Clarissa Harlowe to her parents. We have to turn to the earlier letters, with their exchange of ideas on contemporary topics, still remembered, in order to recover the nineteenth-century feeling. And in this part of the correspondence it is curious to note the immeasurable superiority of Miss Barrett to Mr. Browning as a letter-writer. The matter of his observations on men and things is, of course, in most cases, valuable enough; but there is a sense of perpetual strain and self-consciousness in his efforts to present them, and the final form in which they reach his correspondent is too often as rugged and amorphous as his verse. Miss Barrett's talk, on the other hand, is delightful in its spontaneity and natural ease. It ripples on like a brook, with much of the brook's music, and with all its shifting play of surface and its glancing lights. Her sketch of a book, of a person, or a scene is almost always more vivid, more genuinely "felt," than his; and, even where her criticism becomes rhetorical, the rhetoric has not the faintest smell of the lamp. It has all the charm of impromptu eloquence, the instantaneous response to the moment's mood. Speaking of a recent article of Professor Wilson on critics, she writes:—

And then he should have begun earlier than Dryden—earlier even than Sir Philip Sidney, who, in his noble "Discourse on Poetry," gives such singular evidence of being stone-critic-blind to the gods who moved around him. As far as I can remember, he saw even Shakespeare but indifferently. Oh, it was in his eyes quite an unilluminated age, that period of Elizabeth which we see so full of suns! and few can see what is close to the eyes, though they run their heads against it; the denial of contemporary genius is the rule rather than the exception. No one counts the eagles in the nest, till there is a rush of wings, and lo! they are flown.

This is quite worthy of the author of the brilliant "Vision of Poets." And again, in almost the same breath, but in a lighter mood:

Do you know Tennyson—that is, with a face-to-face knowledge? I have great admiration for him. In execution he is exquisite, and in music a most subtle weigher-out of fine airs. That such a poet should submit blindly to the suggestions of his critics (I do not say that suggestions from without may not be accepted with discrimination sometimes, to the benefit of the acceptor)—blindly and implicitly to the suggestions of his critics is much as if Babbage were to take my opinion and undo his calculating machine by it. Napoleon called poetry science creuse, which, although he was scientific in poetry himself, is true enough; but anybody is qualified, according to everybody, for giving opinions upon poetry. It is not so in chemistry nor in mathematics. Nor is it so, I believe, in whist and the polka. But then these are more serious things.

Such quick transitions from grave to gay, and the intermingled strain of tender and of playful affection in which, in the later stages of their courtship, she addresses her lover, give her letters an unfailing charm. Here, again, is a half serious, half ironical utterance on the sex question, which gradually deepens into a wholly serious criticism of another great woman writer.

If you promised never to tell Mrs. Jameson, nor Miss Martineau, I would confide to you perhaps my secret profession of faith, which is . . . which is . . . that—let us say and do what we please and can, there is a natural inferiority of mind in women—of the intellect, not by any means of the moral nature—and that the history of Art and of Genius testifies to this fact openly. Oh, I would not say so to Mrs. Jameson for the world. I believe I was a coward to her altogether, for when she denounced carpet work as injurious to the mind, because it led the workers into “fatal habits of reverie” I defended the carpet work as if I were striving pro aris et focis (I who am so innocent of all that knowledge!), and said not a word for the poor reveries which have frayed among so much silken time for me.

Only, she adds,

I should not dare even, I think, to tell her that I believe all women, all of us in a mass, to have minds of quicker movement but less power and depth, and that we are under your feet because we can't stand upon our own. Not that we should be, either, quite under your feet! so you are not to be too proud, if you please—and there is certainly some amount of wrong—but it never will be right in the manner and to the extent contemplated by certain of our own prophetesses . . . nor ought to be, I hold, in intimate persuasion. One woman, indeed, now alive and only that one down all the ages of the world, seems to me to justify for a moment an opposite opinion—that wonderful woman George Sand; who has something monstrous in combination with her genius there is no denying at moments (for she has written one book, “Leila [Lélia],” which I could not read, though I am not easily turned back), but whom, in her good and evil together, I regard with infinitely more admiration than all other women of genius who are or have been. Such a colossal nature in every way—with all that breadth and scope of faculty which women want—magnanimous and loving the truth and loving the people, and with that “hate of hate” too, which you extol, so eloquent, and yet earnest as if she were dumb—so full of a living sense of beauty and of noble, blind instincts towards an ideal purity, and so proving a right, even in her own wrong.

Space fails us to quote further from a correspondence which will surely satisfy most readers that one at least of the alternatives which confronted its editor—that of destroying it—was not for a moment to be entertained. The impression which it leaves of the personalities of his two distinguished parents, and especially of his mother, is so illuminating and so attractive that he could not in justice to their memories have withheld it from the world.

THE BEGINNINGS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

English Literature from the Beginning to the Norman Conquest. By Stopford A. Brooke. 7½ × 5 in., 340 pp. London, 1898. Macmillan. 7/6

The presentation of old English literature has lost nothing by being compressed from the two large volumes in which Mr. Stopford Brooke first dealt with the subject some years since. The local colouring with which he then surrounded his theme was interesting, and, no doubt, helped to give life and reality to a time which is of little general interest to the average reader. But it cannot at best be much more than a personal interpretation of the facts, more valuable in a book of a popular character than in one intended for students, who will always create their own picture of the milieu if their study is fruitful. Hence it comes about, in spite of the author's suggestion that the present work is better suited for use in schools because of its more moderate length, that the earlier book is distinctly more popular because more discursive than the later one. The treatment needed to be much shorter still if the moderate interest of the schoolboy in these far-off days was to be catered for, and it is probable that Mr. Stopford's Brooke public will be found for the most part among older readers. Indeed, anything but the most cursory treatment of old English literature is unsuitable for boys and girls who require to be given of the very best if a love for literature is to be fostered—a truth which applies to beginners of a larger growth no less. To be frank, the literature of the Angles and Saxons, whether verse or prose, was neither first-rate nor easily appreciated by any but a trained literary palate.

For those, however, who, having learnt to love the ripper growth, turn to ask whence these fruits have sprung, no less than for those whose literary training calls for a study of the beginnings, this book will be welcome, for it is the first detailed presentment from the hand of an English scholar. Till now they have been practically restricted to “Ten Brink's Early English Literature” (a work which, with all its brilliant insight and originality, was naturally less fitted as an introduction for Englishmen), for Mr. Brooke's earlier and longer book was confined to a treatment of old English poetry, and left out of view the work of Alfred and the prose writers who succeeded him. This early development of an art of prose writing in England, though arrested by subsequent political events, is a most important and interesting aspect of national life before the Norman invasion and it has received its full share of attention in the present volume. The last two chapters, together with that on Aelfred (c. XIV.), picture for us the most permanent contribution of ancient Wessex to the national wealth. The great English chronicle with its continuations at Winchester, Worcester, and Peterborough, the translations of Aelfred, and the homilies of Aelfric reveal the courage, the stark practical sense, the intellectual curiosity, the scholarship, which made Wessex a great power. Particularly good is the treatment of Aelfric, that of Wulfstan, Archbishop of York, his contemporary, being less sympathetic. His very faults, his passion, his excess, his rugged rhetoric, are more typical of England in her weary struggle against the Danish pirates than the smooth, cultivated, and more modern style of the eleventh-century Bede.

The age which produced the poets of the “Judith” and the “Battle of Maldon” had Wulfstan and many others who were his imitators for its favourite preachers. The poem of “Judith” undoubtedly belongs to the second half of the tenth century, as Professor Gregory Foster has shown, rather than to the time before Cynewulf, as Mr. Brooke would have us believe. And this particular error, unimportant in itself, would not call for mention were it not due to an apparently consistent neglect on the author's part of the more formal aspects of the old English verse style. The spirit of the early poet is portrayed with some sense of all that went to make up English character and sentiment in those days, and there is no denying that this is the more important matter for the historian of literature. The flavour, also, of old English verse and the peculiar characteristics of individual writers are truthfully set forth, but this is not all that is necessary, more particularly for students. That “questions of race are often questions of literature” is well brought out in the suggestive and careful chapter which serves as a general introduction to the subject. No writer who failed to grasp this could have hit upon the satirical poems of the Irish bards as the direct spiritual forbears of the “flytings” of Dunbar. But it is equally true that questions of race are often questions of language, a theme ably handled recently by Emile Boutmy in his “Langue anglaise et le génie national”; and an historian can hardly avoid dealing with literary style from the point of view of vocabulary, syntax and prosody. Mr. Brooke may possibly have thought Old English prosody too contentious a theme to touch on. Yet, without entering on any as yet unstricken field, he might well have given some account of the main characteristics of Old English verse, the principles of its construction, the limitations and peculiarities of its vocabulary, its peculiar parallelism of expression, its use of “Kenningar” or token-words, its absence of simile, the unsuitability of its method for the continuous evolution of its theme. All these things throw light upon the national genius and on the relative age of many anonymous poems, but to deal with them fully requires more detailed scholarship than is here shown.

In handling another highly-contentious matter which could not be avoided—the Beowulf question—Mr. Brooke has added nothing to our knowledge. He has avoided the detailed consideration of disputed theories as to its mythology and as to its unity as a poem, though he presents the ascertained facts clearly.

The book is throughout the work of a man who has a love for his subject, a sane judgment, and an attractive style which at times rises to eloquence—but the author's name leads to an expectation of these things. The translated specimens scattered through the book and in the appendix (for some of which Miss Kate Warren is responsible, as she is for the useful bibliography) are quite excellent. The following lines may serve as a specimen of the translations, and as an illustration of British youth then and now:—

“For behold, my thought hovers now above my heart;
O'er the surging flood of sea now my spirit flies,
O'er the homeland of the whale—hovers then afar
O'er the foldings of the earth! Now again it flies to me
Full of yearning, greedy! yells that lonely flier;
Whets upon the Whale-way irresistibly my heart,
O'er the storming of the seas!”

“Seafarer.”

This use, among others, has the too-despised study of the origins, that it proves to us our true descent and helps us to discern that which is permanent in the national character.

CRITICISM OF CRITICISM.

Nouvelles Etudes sur le XIX^{me} Siècle. By Edouard Rod. 5×3in., 333 pp. Paris, 1898. Perrin. Fr.3.50

In England good literary criticism is rare. In France it abounds. Run your eye down the list of critics, and you will find it a notable one. Anatole France, Jules Lemaitre, Gustave Larroumet, G. Faguet, René Doumic, Brunetière, P. Bourget, G. Pellissier, Arède Barine, and Edouard Rod. As criticism the work of these writers is by no means of equal value: but it is seldom that all are not in their several ways individual, interesting, competent. MM. France and Lemaitre have retired from the ranks leaving their brilliant and accomplished work to serve us as models of effective and original criticism. MM. Larroumet and Faguet, considerably lesser lights, profess to fill up the blank. The former tends to superficiality; the latter to dulness, and both force us to remember our France and Lemaitre with unstilled regret. Those who enjoy philosophic criticism not untinged with pedantry may find their pleasure in the pontifical deliverances and academic solemnities of M. Brunetière. Arède Barine is one of the few existing contributors to the Revue des Deux Mondes who may be classed as remarkable. In M. Bourget, the complaisant student of so-called Parisian life and snobbish cosmopolitanism, the world has lost too soon a subtle and distinguished critic without the gain of a good novelist, and G. Pellissier is a bright and sparkling and slightly impertinent critic known as “Nouveau Jeu.”

M. René Doumic is of latter-day critics the most important, and, in a cold and colourless way, the most trustworthy. He lacks the charm and conviction that a temperament gives to style and impressions as well as to personality. He belongs to the impersonal school of criticism, but, unlike its chief exponent, M. Brunetière, he writes a clear, hard, precise French, and can interpret talent or genius without pedantry or dulness. The somewhat Puritanic tone of mind is more in keeping with our own than the “ainé canaille” of Lemaitre; for M. Doumic exacts, even above style, the incontestable merit of mental and moral elevation in the writers he welcomes as makers of literature. But the Puritan in us must ever hamper the critic; and M. Doumic brings to the desk the traditional load of prejudice and narrowness. He would hardly sit so well at ease in the vacated chair of his master if this were not so. It is well that these qualities, admitting as they do the incessant revelation of an inflexible honesty, so admirable amid the many undulations of the French literary conscience, which seems to recognize morality of any kind as the last obligation of a writer, should not lead to any deliberate unfairness, and should permit of a consistent regard for opponents.

M. Edouard Rod, who has lately given us his last volume of critical articles, is tolerably well equipped for the difficult task. He brings to it a professor's gravity and conscientiousness. True, a little more sparkle, a trifle of humour, just a suspicion of wit, would not come amiss. But these are not characteristics to-day of the great House over which M. Brunetière presides, and to which M. Rod has the honour to belong. Then, again, M. Rod is Swiss, and the lighter arts and graces seem to be held in disesteem in Switzerland. But to make up for this deficiency, he will not hesitate to startle the reader now and then by some rash statement in utter defiance of fact. Here is one culled at random:—

The French are, I believe, the only people of Europe who possess an acute sense of ridicule, and are thus preserved from every exaggeration of sentiment, from anything like swollen expression.

It would, indeed, be difficult to name a race that has so often and so joyously offered itself as an object to the world's hilarity. We need not go further than the daily Press and the Chamber of Deputies for samples of exaggeration of sentiment, swollen expression, and the very latest achievement in the matter of ridicule, beside which broad farce is restrained and sober.

Nothing could be more unequal than this volume of critical essays. It opens with a study of Alphonse Daudet's novels. Daudet is not a fitting subject for a heavy article. He should be touched lightly, tenderly, as we would touch a wounded child. But this implies qualities that M. Rod possesses neither as an essayist nor as a novelist. We must content ourselves with his honesty, his sincerity, his sympathetic and kindly seriousness of sentiment and expression. We can conceive a more charming style than his, but none which reveals a finer feeling, a more absolutely “respectable” nature. Respectable is precisely the word that best sums up the writer's character: not in the sense in which Mrs. Grundy and the British public apply the word, but as a man of letters would use it. M. Rod approaches his subject with a dignified conception and recognition of the author's individual value as a man and a writer. He is nothing of a scoffer, still less of a slayer. He is simply a dull and most amiable gentleman who studies men and books with conspicuous indulgence and pronounced rectitude.

The essay on Anatole France is of quite another character, and this one at least is of distinct value. It would be allowing too much to pretend that M. Rod has caught, much less successfully interpreted, the charm, the mysterious, perfidious charm of Anatole France. To do that would need a distinct charm himself, and to charm M. Rod has no claim whatever. But in his heavy, circumspect way he understands his subject, and has something serious to say about it. He notes with accuracy the priceless individuality of M. France, his erudite gaiety, his graceful irony, the magic form, studied not spontaneous. He laboriously analyses the writer's paganism, his sensuality impregnated with the spirit of poetry, his humour, and his measured audacity.

Side by side with this judicious study, careful and sincere if not precisely luminous and adequate, M. Rod offers us an essay on the Italian novelist Fogazzaro, in which he wastes a number of pages on a copious analysis of “Malombra,” a mere sensational story of the cheapest kind, the sort of thing to run as a serial in a tenth-rate magazine, one of the sins, we believe, of Fogazzaro's youth which neither merits reading nor mention. And this same essay contains not a word on that delicate, sweet little masterpiece “Little People of Olden Times.” If Fogazzaro merits an enduring place in European literature, it will be due rather to this pretty and dainty evocation of a dead Italian world—provincial life in a sort of pot-pourri recalled in the thin and faded melodies of an old spinet—than by his striking if incomplete novel “Daniele Cortis.” “Little People of Olden Times” is one of the most charming books modern Italy has produced, and instead of talking of it M. Rod misleads us by treating trash like “Malombra” seriously.

The essay on Schopenhauer is extremely thin, but the studies of Emile Hennequin, the critic, and of Victor Hugo and his contemporaries are really excellent—especially that of Hugo.

T O T E M I S M .

The Native Tribes of Central Australia. By Baldwin Spencer, M.A., and F. J. Gillen. 9 x 5½ in., xx. + 671 pp. London, 1899. Macmillan. 21/- n.

Within our space it is hardly possible even to indicate the value and importance of Messrs. Spencer and Gillen's work on the natives of Central Australia. Of all undeveloped races now existing in their "natural" social conditions, the Australians are the most archaic. Of the Australians it may well be that the Arunta, and other tribes of the centre (were it not for their male kinship), are "nearest the beginning." To Mr. Gillen, a friend of twenty years, and to Mr. Spencer, they have yielded the secrets of their tribal mysteries and magic, without, we rejoice to say, submitting these authors to the usual painful, dangerous, and disgusting rites. Now most of the Australian tribes have mysteries, but those of the centre possess them in a peculiar form. Again, their social organization, though nominally "totemistic," differs in the highest degree from totemism as hitherto observed in most quarters of the world. The question therefore arises, Is theirs an earlier form of the institution, or only an eccentric development? We are unprepared with an answer, being wholly unwilling to guess why or how, if the Arunta form is earlier, the other Australian tribes on the same level of culture and in similar conditions have wandered off from it into the form of totemism usually found among savages all over the world. But, if the normal form is the earlier, why did the Arunta develop a shape almost its exact contradictory?

As is beginning to be understood, in ordinary totemism groups of kindred, scattered through local tribes, claim kin, or other close connexion, each with a plant, animal, or other natural object; and, as groups, each set of kin is known by its totem's name—it may be trout, rabbit, potato, bear, or what not. Each group is, to say the least, disinclined to kill, eat, or use in any way its patron in nature—trout, bear, and so on. Men and women of the same name may not intermarry (exogamy). As a common rule (with exceptions) the totem and totem name are inherited from the mother. To all this the Australians commonly add a dual division. Such and such totem kindreds are A, such and such others are B, and A may not marry an A woman, nor B a B woman. The A and the B divisions are called "classes." An A man styles all A men of a certain standing his fathers; all their wives his mothers; their sons, elder or younger brothers. All women of the right group he calls his wives; and even a girl-child in his mother's group is his mother. These titles (as against Mr. McLennan) our authors look on as indicating real relationship—to the Australian's mind; and they believe that the terms are not mere modes of address but survivals of a period of actual group marriage. At present a dingo (dog) man has a certain set of water-hen women whom he may marry: they are his Nupa. His wife or wives are Nupa, and other Nupa women are, or may on certain occasions be, "accessory wives" of himself and of other men on his footing. An influential man has plenty of these accessory wives, and if their husbands dislike this arrangement, there may be a fight. The results in the way of relationship are only comprehensible by a white senior wrangler, but do not puzzle the natives.

Among the Arunta, things are worse. Of eight divisions to which a woman may belong, an Arunta may only select his wife from one division. But, among the Arunta totems do not count as a bar to marriage. Almost everywhere, all the world over, persons of the same totem may not marry: it is incest. Among the Arunta they may marry. Now, how did the Arunta throw off the law against incest? Or how, if it did not originally exist, came all the rest of totemistic mankind to put on the law? The Arunta count descent in the male line, and this looks like advance on the primitive reckoning through the spindle side. Moreover the Arunta have no rule forbidding them to eat their totems, though they must not eat much of them, and, at certain rites, when their totem—say emu—comes into season, they must be the first to eat it, sparingly.

Again, among the Arunta a child takes its totem not necessarily from its father or its mother, but from the totem of the ghosts who haunt the place where it was conceived. In the "Alcheringa" (the legendary past) men-kangaroos or kangaroo-men, emu-men or men-emus, moved about in groups of each name. They spent their time in eating their totems. When they died, stones or other objects arose to mark the spot. Each person had carried a stone disc or slab marked, usually, with a conventional pattern which indicated his totem. This got into the ground, and the owner's spirit haunted it. Now, when a woman passes, one of these spirits, say that of a wild-cat-man, desires to be incarnated in and reborn from her. She has a child—say a wild-cat. Its relations hunt in the spot where she conceived it and find the spirit's stone slab, with the wild-cat pattern. This becomes the child's Churinga, or sacred thing, and the child belongs to the totem of the ghosts which haunt the place of its conception. If no stone churinga is found, a wooden one of the same pattern is made. All are kept in sacred stores; women may not see them, and men only after the cruel rites of initiation. With the churinga magic is wrought, by each totem group, at sacred rocks painted with the same pattern as is incised on the churinga. The magic is done to procure a large supply of the totem in each case, say emu or grub, and the grub or emu-men eat of their totem sparingly, before the men of the same totem may gorge themselves on it.

Here is a pretty odd theory of life! But the astounding thing (not observed by our authors) is this: the conventional pattern painted on the rocks, and incised on the churinga are those of our ancient "cup and ring"—marked rocks and kists and standing stones. A glance at the many examples in the proceedings of the Scotch Society of Antiquaries, and another at the figures in the book of Messrs. Spencer and Gillen (pp. 129-150, 630-633), will prove this to the most sceptical. Moreover, in the last three years, small stones, usually perforated like churinga, and incised with some of the same patterns, have been found in a fort near Dumbarton, and in a kind of pile-dwelling under high-water mark in the Clyde, at Dumbuck. Some Scotch antiquaries have cried out "forgery" or "hoax"; but there the things are—Scotch churinga or hoaxes, as the case may be. Similar objects are recently reported from another Scotch site and from Wales.

Having noted the Arunta theory of life, and the corresponding rites, we have but little room for the stages of tribal initiation—tossing in the air; circumcision; and Aritlha, a peculiarly cruel and, one would say, dangerous rite. Finally comes Engwurra, a fire rite, not on a level with the Fijian and other "fire-walks." All these are most minutely described. They are accounted for by myths of the legendary Alcheringa time; the mythic ancestors did so and so, the mutilations being originally performed by means of fire, later by flint knives. We are at present disposed to regard these tales as aetiological myths, originally invented to account for the rites. This is not the view of our authors. The traditions do not refer to a time when the normal totem taboo on marriage existed. The traditions regard men as originally living with women of their own totem, and freely eating their own totems, all of which, to a normal totemist, is anathema. This is part of the puzzle: How did the otherwise universally diffused totem taboos arise? The myths, as given, introduce no Creator, like the Kamilaroi Baiaime. Only two "self-existing beings," "out of nothing," assist the process of evolution of mankind. There is a spirit, Twanyirika, who is supposed by the women to utter his voice when the bull roarer (ρῶμρος) is heard. No myth of him is recorded, and he seems to answer to Daramulun as conceived of among the Baiaime-worshipping Wiradthuri to the south. We hear nothing of moral precepts, under Divine sanction, as among the Kurnai and Kamilaroi, and the Bunjil-worshipping tribes. The Arunta, so far, seem a godless set of men.

For the rest, the minute information and the excellent photographs, results of labour in the most severe conditions of discomfort, leave nothing to be desired. The book is one of the classics of the study of the backward races.

THE BISHOP OF CALCUTTA ON IMMORTALITY.

The Hope of Immortality. An Essay by the Rev. J. E. C. Welldon. 7½ × 5¼ in., viii. + 350 pp. London, 1898. Seeley. 6/-

We are inclined to regret that Dr. (now Bishop) Welldon should have chosen the subject of "Immortality" for a course of Hulsean Lectures. In spite of its many stirring and noble passages, the book betrays a lack of thoroughness which detracts from its value as a specimen of Christian apologetic. For the readers whom Dr. Welldon has in view are, he tells us, "not so much Christians as those who stand, as it were, on the borderland of Christianity"; and we doubt whether the writer's somewhat uncritical use of the "Analogy," to say nothing of the rather superficial "History of the Belief," is likely to prove serviceable to such readers as he contemplates. Further, there is a lack of orderly arrangement in the argument which is perplexing. For example, it seems to us premature to draw "certain inferences from the true conception of the soul's nature" before the discussion of "evidences" in chap. iv. and v. With regard to his use of the argument from analogy, in which he is content to follow Bishop Butler implicitly, it is surprising that practically no account should be taken of the searching criticism to which it has been subjected, both from the philosophical and scientific standpoint. There are also very weak points in Dr. Welldon's account of the Old Testament doctrine of Immortality. There can be little question, for instance, that Hosea xiii. 4, refers to a resurrection and survival, not of individuals, but of the nation whose downfall he predicts; again, Dan. xii. 2, to which Dr. Welldon apparently refers, implies not a general resurrection of the dead, but a resuscitation of Israelites alone. Moreover, it is, to say the least of it, loose language to speak of the canon of the Old Testament as having "closed in Malachi or soon afterwards." Finally, we notice that the longer Greek quotations are very carelessly printed.

We have no wish, however, to indulge in ungracious criticism of a book to which the striking personality of its author, and the high dignity to which he has recently been elevated, lend a special interest. Dr. Welldon frankly accepts, though he imperfectly applies, the historic method in his treatment of the belief in immortality:—

The early beliefs which human history exhibits are not complete or absolute; they are promises of better things: they are the germs out of which new and great beliefs will some day grow.

And if, on the one hand, he does not seem to make the most of the witness of conscience—that "prophetic part of human nature"—he does, on the other hand, state with great fairness the strength of the expectation which is based on the continuous growth of human character. The most valuable contribution made by Dr. Welldon to the discussion of the subject dealt with in his book is his analysis of the phrase "eternal life." The exhibition of this "Life" in its perfection was the work of Christ. He taught mankind that "when the soul is enlightened by grace, elevated through prayer, and disciplined in sanctity, it attains to its own true and perfect life. That life is the 'Life Eternal.'" As manifested in Him it consisted "in His purity, His spirituality, His communion with God, His perfect obedience to the Divine Will." The effect of His life was not only to produce in men "an absolute conviction of immortality"; it opened to them the hope of being partakers in a "Life" which was essentially His gift. Incidentally Dr. Welldon defends in a powerful and beautiful passage the practice of prayer for the dead, which he thinks "needs revival in Protestant Theology." He also lays stress on a circumstance in Christ's teaching which deserves much more attention at the hands of theologians than it usually receives—viz., the fact of His reserve and reticence in His delineations of the life after death. There is much fine thought in this book, and it is pervaded by a moral earnestness which is more impressive than the general treatment of the argument.

THE QUEST OF THE HOLY GRAIL.

The High History of the Holy Grail. Translated from the French by Sebastian Evans, LL.D. Two Vols. (Temple Classics.) 6 × 4 in., 305 + 298 pp. London, 1898. Dent. 3/- n.

In Quest of the Holy Grail. An Introduction to the Study of the Legend, by Sebastian Evans. 7½ × 4½ in., viii. + 200 pp. London, 1898. Dent. 3/6 n.

Not since Malory, we will make bold to say, have we had a better infusion of medieval French romance than the translation of The High History of the Holy Grail which Dr. Sebastian Evans has lately given us. His subsequent volume of theory on the subject, we confess, attracts us less, since good romance is better than doubtful criticism; but for the first we have only praise. His choice of a medium in which to convey this English version was probably instinctive, and it was certainly a happy one. Romance is associated with Malory's style, its limpid movement and simple idiom, and short of a perfect modern equivalent, which is hard to find, one could hardly do better than follow openly in his steps. There is an originality even in imitation; and in simulating our master-simulator of old French, Malory, as well as in copying fair the art of Master Blihis himself (if it was he that wrote this Grail romance?), Dr. Evans displays a more original faculty than nine out ten of our current romancers. He has the perception, and the touch, which count in such writing, and knows how to make his archaic graces look natural. The result is that his little volumes of romance may be read for pure pleasure; and the problems they start only come into the reader's mind as a critical after-thought. Unfortunately, as we cannot but think, he has not let us rest there. What originally seemed his cleverness in tucking away his account of the book into an epilogue proves to have been only the economy of the man who is sparing to-day that he may be extravagant to-morrow. Dr. Evans' third volume is a very feast of entertaining romantic matter, but it is a pure extravagance. The epilogue to the preceding volumes is in another category, however, and will be found of great value by the good Arthurian.

Dr. Evans believes that this history of the Grail, rescued by him from long neglect in the shadow of more fortunate fellow-romances, is in effect the original "Book of the Holy Vessel," concerning which he cites a passage from the end of the curious thirteenth century "Histoire de Foulkes Fitz-Warin" (Rolls Pub. Chron.—Coggeshall, London, 1875). The passage, after a reference to Merlin and King Arthur, speaks of a White Land now named the White Town (names which readers of old Welsh poetry will find suggestive), and describes how in that region lay the chapel of St. Austin, where Kahuz, son of Ywein, dreamt that he carried off the candlestick and was wounded in the adventure. This account of the mysterious death-dream of Kahuz, it further tells us, comes from "the Graal, the Book of the Holy Vessel." Now, the story of Kahuz appears in only one of the Grail romances, and that the present one. In Dr. Evans' text, Kahuz appears as Chaus, son of Ywain li Aoutres; and we find that the dream-blow he received actually proved fatal. King Arthur, and the Queen, hear him crying out for a priest to give him absolution, "for I die!" and they hasten to him carrying great torches and candles, and ask what ails him. Thereupon he tells them his dream. "Ha," saith the King, "Is it then a dream?" "Yea, Sir, but a right foul dream it is for me, for right foully hath it come true." And he shows them the candlestick, and eventually the fatal knife, sticking in his side. When he has been shriven, Arthur himself withdraws the weapon, and Chaus, who is probably only our old friend Kay in another disguise, dies. It is an extraordinary bit of medieval fantasy, as none of the other Grail romances contain it; and the episode affords, therefore, an important link in the chain of evidence as to the date of the MS. in which it occurs.

Turning to the wider question of the origins of the legend, late or early, there is one very interesting corroboration to be obtained from the present version, which strengthens the argument for its extreme age, but of which Dr. Evans takes no note. That is the distinctive element in it which led Sarrazin, the Trouveur, and Helinaud, the Chronicler and Rhymer, to refer to it with the emphasis of a special reverence, due to the insistence of the romancer upon the archaic religious furniture of his story. But this stress upon the mystic side of the story is, we venture to say, a much earlier feature than some popular Arthurians allow, and suggests strongly the early Celtic precursors of medieval romance. And, indeed, one easily finds names and episodes in this book to carry one back into that primitive region which the Breton imagination peopled with the wild immigrants of Caerleon and Tintagil, and adorned with the ecstatic dreams, half Pagan, half Christian, brought over from Enlli and Iona. Half the ingenuity with which Dr. Evans has worked his Albigenian and other historical colours into the woof of the legend, in his reactionary study on the subject, would carry him far in the quest on the Celtic side. But something of the errant spirit of those old questors after the Grail is his. Once he has started on his journey no critical second thought begotten of human probabilities, and no prior experience of the high country of romance, and the way in which its air-castles were built and its mystic hills of vision were imagined, is able to pull him up. There is nothing more ingenious, we admit, than the fitting of historical parallels to mythical tales, after Dr. Evans' method, and nothing less convincing. If we say he has produced a contribution which folk-lorists committed to the Celtic theory of the Grail ought not to neglect, it is only because (pace Mr. Nutt) it may serve to show them how much they have yet to do ere they have driven their argument into the mind of Christian heretics like Dr. Evans.

But, Celtic claims apart, the internal evidence of this romance of the Grail, based upon the legendary colouring and religious particularity it displays, appears to us to corroborate in a marked degree the external. Few readers probably will care to question the inscription within the cover—"Master Blihis : Floruit circa 1200-1250" and few will trouble themselves to conjecture how far the real beginnings of the legend carry one back before Master Blihis,—and Chrestien. A much safer inquiry, and one which we can commend as affording many "finds," is that into the frequent curious resemblances between Malory and Master Blihis. Take, for instance, the episode of the hermit's reproof of Sir Launcelot at the end of the thirteenth book of the "Morte d'Arthur," and compare it with that of the tenth Branch and ninth Title of the "High History of the Holy Grail." The similarity would be startling, if one did not know how closely Malory was apt to follow his originals. However, these little reminders in one book of another, long famous, are not unpleasant. It is as a pendent to the "Morte d'Arthur," no doubt, that these pretty volumes are most likely to make their way popularly as English romance ; but their real interest, as we have shown, goes much further than that.

LANDOR'S CORRESPONDENCE.

Letters of Walter Savage Landor. Private and Public. Ed. by Stephen Wheeler. With Portraits. 8 $\frac{3}{4}$ + 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ in., xiv. + 369 pp. London, 1899. Duckworth. 10/6

Mr. Wheeler's new volume increases the claim on the gratitude of lovers of Landor which his "Letters and Unpublished Writings of Landor" had already given him. The book contains a number of letters to Rose Aylmer's niece, now Lady Graves-Sawle, which show once more the rare warmth of Landor's affections, and the still rarer grace with which he gave them utterance ; and a series of letters to newspapers on public affairs, which once more show that, in these matters, vigour of style, and even vigour of thought, by no means make up for the lack of so humble a quality as mere reasonableness of temper. The latter, we think, were best left in their undisturbed grave. Newspaper politics, even when genius writes them, are of all things the most ephemeral. But it is the penalty as well as the privilege of genius that it cannot die. When a man has written Hyperion, an unwise world insists on knowing that he also wrote letters to Fanny Brawne ; and the poet of "Agamemnon and Iphigeneia" was sure to have a well-intentioned editor who would print his amateur utterances about Irish politics, the Tsar Nicholas, and Napoleon III.

The really interesting part of Mr. Wheeler's book is in the private letters. The circumstances under which they were written may be given in the words of their editor :—

When living at Fiesole, in the thirties, Landor met Mrs. Paynter, whom he knew when she was a little girl. With her he could talk of his boyish devotion to her sister, the beautiful Rose Aylmer, who had died in India in 1800. The name and features of one of Mrs. Paynter's daughters also reminded him of the romance of his youth. The letters in this volume include a few addressed to Mrs. Paynter, but the majority were written to her daughter, Miss Rose Paynter, now Lady Graves-Sawle.

They range from 1838 to 1863. Mr. Wheeler has reprinted the verses which Landor constantly sent with them, but of these nearly all have already appeared in the "Works," and the remainder are mere trifles.

The letters are remarkable for their stately flow of beautiful compliment, as unceasing as those that Madame de Sévigné addressed to her daughter, and as little wearisome :—

"Between the hay-harvest and the corn-harvest [he writes] there is a lull of nature, a calm and dull quiescence. Autumn then comes to tell us of the world's varieties and changes. At last the white pall of Nature closes round us. In the last seven or eight years I seem to myself to have passed through all the seasons of life excepting the very earliest and the very latest. I doubt whether I have ever been so happy in any other equal and continued space of time. Italy would sometimes flash back upon me, but the lightnings only keep the memory awake, without disturbing it. How much, how nearly all, do I owe to your friendship, to your music, and your conversation."

Naturally enough, to one whom he loved in this way, the old man confessed himself very freely. We get a good many characteristic personal touches :—

"A vainer man might have exulted in the celebrity to be expected from Lady Bulwer's Dedication. To me it could afford neither pride nor pleasure. With the exception of Louis the Fourteenth, no man ever was so frequently mentioned by contemporary writers. The best poem, and almost the best novel, of our days, were dedicated to me—"Kehama," by Southey, and "Attila," by James ; and I hear that my name is to be found in twenty places of the first authors."

There we have the Landor of magnificent, self-assured, unapproachable serenity ; but the other Landor, equally real, whose explosions and eccentricities made the streets of Bath ring with laughter, is not absent from the letters. Some of his friends, indeed, tried him very much, and he complains, with some reason, that—"It is a horrible thing to have many literary friends. They are apt to fancy that, however your time may be occupied, you must at all events have enough to read what they send you. Alas ! alas ! There are few who have time enough to read even all the very good books that have been written, old and new ; and who can neglect the good for the bad without compunction and remorse ?"

Yet his eyes are very open to contemporary merit, even the newest and youngest. He praises Leighton's Cimabue ; of Rubinstein he says, "never did I hear anything so wonderful" ; of G. P. R. James, "There is not on God's earth (I like this expression, vulgar or not), any better creature of His hand, any more devoted to His highest service." "The genius of Dickens was sent from Heaven," and "no mortal man ever exerted so beneficial and extensive an influence over the human heart." He delights in Washington Irving, and declares "none of our present writers write such pure English. He reminds me of Addison." And of men of action, he joins Kossuth with Sir William Napier as "the greatest men of our age."

Landor united two qualities not commonly found together. No one in our time has caught the classical note so completely as he did ; and yet no one has more fiercely asserted his right to indulge those private whims and fancies which are usually considered incompatible with it. More, perhaps, than any of his countrymen, he possesses that rare aristocratic utterance of the ancients, so assured of its own dignity, so serenely certain of attention, that it never cares to raise its voice ; but no strength of classical taste or habit could conceal the "unsubduable" personality, which is for ever breaking out at unexpected times and places, now with the waywardness of a child, now with the half-laughable, half-exasperating acerbities and angularities of an octogenarian man of genius. He let Rose Aylmer's niece see both sides of him in these letters.

THE HIMALAYAS.

Among the Himalayas. By Major L. A. Waddell. 9½ x 6½ in., xvi. + 452 pp. London, 1899. Constable. 18/-

Our knowledge—such as it is—of the Himalayas is of very modern origin. The early surveyors, such as Webb and Colebrooke, whose reports may be read in that old Calcutta publication, Asiatick Researches, discovered very little and did not even try to discover very much except the sources of the Ganges. In the map which accompanies J. B. Fraser's account of his Himalayan travels in the twenties, there are large open spaces with memoranda printed across them to the effect that they are unexplored. As late as the thirties we find a learned Quarterly reviewer solemnly discussing the question whether there are any summits of the Himalayas as high as the highest peaks of the Cordilleras, and concluding that there probably are none ; and most of the altitudes now assigned to the different mountains in the Gazetteers were only ascertained by triangulation from remote bases in 1850. Since then, a certain amount of work has been done in the Karakoram range by Sir William Martin Conway and other travellers, but the more interesting neighbourhoods of Mounts Everest and Kanchenjunga have been very little investigated. The most authoritative work on the subject is Hooker's "Himalayan Journals," published in 1854, and Major Waddell says that he approached nearer to Mount Everest than any European since Hooker. He has familiarized himself with these wild regions during the holiday seasons of fourteen years ; and though he is rather to be accounted a traveller than a climber, his book is a valuable addition to a branch of mountaineering literature in which exceedingly few books exist.

Will the really great giants of the Himalayas ever be ascended ? That is one of the questions to which the author addresses himself ; and it is a question which probably arouses wider interest than any other Himalayan problem—not excluding the question whether there is a second Klondike awaiting discovery above the snow line. Mount Everest itself may, for the moment, be excluded from the debate. The Nepaulese, through whose territory that mountain has to be approached, are a jealous and exclusive people, and refuse to give any guarantee that mountaineers who throw themselves upon their hospitality will not get their throats cut. The case of Kanchenjunga remains. It is only 27,820ft. high, but that is enough to go on with. The verdict of Mr. Graham—the only real climber, attended by Swiss guides, who has got near enough to express an opinion—was :—"I do not call it impossible, but improbable in the highest degree. The peak runs east and west like a wall, the two arêtes being the most frightful imaginable." Major Waddell inclines to the view that this verdict should be modified, and in support of his view he cites two photographs, specially taken for the purpose. He writes :—

These photographs show that the great precipice below this southern pinnacle of Kanchen is likely to prove an insuperable obstacle to any attempted ascent from the south ; but the north-eastern slopes, by way of the Zemu glacier or across the "Gap," 19,300ft., look more hopeful ; and in the opinion of Mr. Freshfield these photographs show that there is here possibly a route not steeper than that up Mont Blanc from Chamonix.

Major Waddell further points out that the new roads bring the glaciers of the mountain "within five or six days of Darjeeling, which is under one day's journey from Calcutta, which is less than three weeks from England." In view of the new passion for record-breaking in the matter of high altitudes, it will be strange if some expedition to attempt the ascent of Kanchenjunga does not soon result from this demonstration of its accessibility. The book is profusely illustrated by drawings from the brush of Mr. A. D. McCormick, the artist who accompanied Sir Martin Conway to the Karakorams, and Mr. Clinton Dent to the Caucasus. There is also an excellent map.

A FRENCH IMPRESSIONIST.

Impressions. By Pierre Loti. With an Introduction by Henry James. 9 x 7 in., 189 pp. London, 1898. Constable. 10/6

English translations of French belles lettres cannot but lose somewhat of the flavour of the original—and the idea of an English Loti, in particular, is almost calculated to raise a smile. Yet the anonymous translator of the series of Impressions published in this pretty volume proves that even Loti may, by dint of judicious selection, be made to wear an English dress without too ill a grace. But for that judiciousness of selection the experiment might easily have been disastrous. The pathos of Loti, for instance, has manifestations which, barely tolerable in French, in English could but produce a nausea as of over-ripe and mawkish sentimentality.

The selections here printed are fairly representative of that residuary part of Loti's work to which Mr. James seems to give his preference, the part, namely, which is not occupied with his love-making. Even so warm an admirer of Loti as Mr. James is apt to find the latter a little trying. Yet even on Loti's erotics, Mr. James loyally puts the best colour he can, and finds his individual virtu in his singular power of "telling."

"Whenever Loti landed," he writes, "he made love, and whenever he made love he appears to have told of it." Is it too sceptical to suggest that he "told of it" somewhat oftener ? But this is not to deny what is undeniable—Loti's singular and intensely personal genius, with all its curious exotic bloom, its exquisite simplicity, its fine pity, its never failing, its sometimes too insistent, sense of sorrow, that sensitiveness to the inner significance of so many phases of life which, coupled with his unique gift of expression, enable us to breathe any atmosphere he may choose—so it be not one of untainted joy. But that exception is constant. The Spirit of Delight is not of those that obey this master's wand.

Here is a passage in illustration of the style of the English version. Loti has been describing a midnight mass on Christmas Eve in a Capuchin monastery near the Spanish frontier :—

Then, when all is over, there is a hurried movement among the peasants and the poor towards the choir, where a doll has just arrived in the arms of a monk, who offers it to the faithful to kiss, a poor, lifeless doll that has been carefully wrapped in a child's swaddling clothes, and that represents the new-born Saviour.

And now they all disperse into the night that has grown colder and of a deeper blue.

I return alone to the boat that is to take me to the French shore, as one just awakened from a dream of the olden times. I come away rather saddened ; another Christmas has passed over my head, another year has stretched into the abyss without having brought me the solution of anything, nor the hope of anything.

And, as I go back alone, I feel that I am a thousand times more disinherited than the least of those humble people, those old men or those poor folk, who, praying as their ancestors prayed, have just kissed the simple, ridiculous, and adorably ineffable doll in its linen.

One other passage, recording this time an impression of an Eastern scene :—

Towards two in the afternoon a halt in some place or other from which this image remains with me ; the perpetual boundless plain, flowered over as never a garden, and alone there, a little way off, our old exhausted Caid down on his knees at prayer. We are in a zone of white daisies mixed with pink poppies. The old man, close to his end, has an earthen face, a beard as blanched as lichen, a dress of the same freshness of colour as the poppies and daisies around, the Kaftan of pink cloth showing through the long, white mufflers. His white horse, with its high, red saddle, browses beside him and plunges its head into the grass. He himself, half sunk among the flowers, the white and pink flowers that are circled, beneath the deep blue of the summer sky, by the infinite desert of the immense flowery level—he himself, prostrate on the earth in which he will soon be laid, begs for the mercy of Allah with the fervour of prayer given by the feeling of annihilation at hand.

THE MAKER OF ITALY.

Cavour. By the Countess Evelyn Martinengo Cesaresco. (Foreign Statesmen.) 7½ x 5 in., viii. + 222 pp. London, 1898. Macmillan. 2/6

In his Essay on Ambition Bacon remarks that the ambition to prevail in great things is less harmful than the ambition to appear in everything, because “that breeds confusion and mars business.” The great man, whose name stands at the head of this notice, might almost have taken this sentence as his motto. The unification of Italy, which (except for the additions of Rome and Venetia, made inevitable by his policy) he carried to completion in his short public career, was really the one grand purpose of his life. When this object was fully assured, the “silver cord” snapped under the strain of years of anxiety and sleepless effort, and he passed away. And yet had any one ventured to prophesy in 1845 that within sixteen years this great enterprise would be almost accomplished, and this largely by Cavour’s instrumentality, he must have been regarded as a madman. “In 1846,” says the Countess, “Cavour was only known at home as the most unpopular man in Piedmont.” Like all great men of action, he was penetrated from the first by a consciousness of strength, which he determined to dedicate wholly to his country. When Madame de Circourt, at Paris, divining his ability, advised him to strive after fame in literature or science, he might almost have answered with Themistocles, “I cannot fiddle, but I can make a small town a great city.” What he did reply was to confess his literary incapacity, and to add:—“Happy or unhappy, my country shall have all my life; I will never be unfaithful to her even were I sure of finding elsewhere a brilliant destiny.”

The combination of audacity with shrewd practical gifts, which made Cavour the first diplomatist in Europe, never prevented him from standing aside when the public interests demanded it. In 1852, and again in 1859 (when, as was wittily said, “all the ministers were called Cavour”), he resigned office to prevent an impasse; he had none of that vulgar love of popularity, which “mars business” or sulks in the hour of defeat. He said of himself, as he once justly wrote of Pitt, that he cared for power only as a means to compass the good of his country. Cavour was a fervent admirer of our English constitution. In his early days he wrote a paper on “the condition and future of Ireland,” in which he suggests many of the remedies, which have since been (dare we say successfully?) applied; but he thought that disunion could only be logically supported “by those who desired a revolution.” His gifts as an administrator were hardly less conspicuous than his skill as a diplomatist. When in office, he usually held more than one portfolio; and in the campaign of 1859, being compelled on an emergency to take the War Department, he displayed an energy such as would have saved our soldiers much suffering in the Crimea:—

On one occasion the French Commissariat asked for a hundred thousand rations to make sure of receiving fifty thousand; the officer in charge was surprised to see one hundred and twenty thousand punctually arrive on the day named.

The name of the author of this book is in itself a guarantee that it will be found to be ably and pleasantly written. She writes, however, under a disadvantage, from which the other biographies in this series are free—namely, that of describing a life-work, the full effects of which can as yet scarcely be seen.

The difficulty must have been increased by the fact that no life of Cavour has appeared since the publication of his correspondence. We freely acknowledge the inexorable limits of space in a work of this kind; yet we must express the opinion that the Countess, in her adopted country, presumes too much upon the average Englishman’s knowledge of political geography. The events which she describes are too early for the rising generation to remember, and too recent to have yet taken their place in history; and therefore some map or description of the political divisions of Italy in the first half of the century is unquestionably needed. The book suffers also to some extent from a paucity of dates, which can often be only discovered by allusions to contemporary English politics.

TENNYSON IN GERMANY.

Leben und Werke Alfred Lord Tennysons. Von Th. A. Fischer. Mit Portraet. Gotha, 1899. Perthes.

With the exception of “Enoch Arden,” which has formed the subject of more than one opera, and of which some nine translations have been made since 1863, Tennyson’s poems are little read in Germany. It must be admitted that to render Tennyson satisfactorily in German is an exceedingly difficult, if not an impossible, task, and the translations of his poems are mostly of so poor a quality that no one acquainted with the poet solely through their means can gain an adequate idea of the greatness of his work. This fact may account in some degree for the scant attention paid in Germany to Tennyson. The only German translator of Tennyson whose work is throughout worthy of its subject is Freiligrath; as early as 1842 he recognized the beauty of Tennyson’s poetry and wrote to Mary Howitt a letter in its praise. Unfortunately Freiligrath only translated fourteen poems, among them “Locksley Hall,” all before 1846. Some good work may also be found in S. von Harbou’s “Balladen und Lyrische Gedichte,” published in 1894. German critics of our literature have unaccountably neglected Tennyson. The only essay of any importance that deals with his poetry is Geibel’s preface to Feldmann’s “Ausgewählte Dichtungen,” a volume of Tennyson translations published in 1870.

Herr Fischer’s straightforward and unpretentious study of Tennyson’s life and works will, it is to be hoped, serve as an introduction to German readers who do not know Tennyson. It is conveniently divided into three parts, dealing respectively with the poet’s biography and with his two greatest achievements, “The Idylls of the King” and “In Memoriam.” The descriptive account of Tennyson’s life is sufficient, and is chiefly based on the present Lord Tennyson’s memoir. The analysis of the Idylls is excellent, and is all the more valuable since no German translation of the poems of any worth is available. If Herr Fischer somewhat overrates Tennyson’s dramatic gift and his skill in character development, he demonstrates very clearly the qualities that constitute Tennyson’s greatness.

Herr Feis’ translation of “In Memoriam,” on the other hand, is not likely to be helpful in spreading the love and knowledge of Tennyson in Germany. The poem has been several times translated with varying success. The earliest version was that of Hertzberg in 1853. In 1870 Waldmueller published, under the title of “Freundesklage,” a selection from the poem in the original metre, but very freely rendered and often much abbreviated. The only complete translation prior to that of Herr Feis (but both lack the last portion) was made by Agnes von Bohlen in 1874. This is perhaps the best German rendering that has yet appeared.

Mr. Pater used to declare that the true test of any veritable presentment of a work of imagination in the way of translation was “that it should enfold one, so to speak, in its own atmosphere, that one should feel able to breathe in it.” And it has been equally well said that it is not possible to have the spirit of a poet's work without the letter. Herr Feis boldly disregards such dicta and, without hesitation or apology, explains, amplifies, and even adds to the poet's thoughts and images. When Tennyson wrote—

And from his ashes may be made
The violet of his native land, he scarcely anticipated the rendering—

Als Veilchen zart mag sie erblühen,
Als Rose roth wie Liebesgluth.

Agnes von Bohlen renders it much more happily—

Aus seiner Asche wird erstehen
Das Veilchen seiner Heimatflur.

Sometimes the meaning of a passage is wholly missed. The lines—

The very source and fount of Day
Is dash'd with wandering isles of night.

become—

Zog nicht um früh'ste Morgensonne
Heimtückische Gespensterschaar.

But when the translator is content (as in cxv.) to follow his original, his efforts, if not of high literary merit, will serve to give Germans who do not understand English an idea, not altogether inadequate, of the contents of the poem. In a few cases Herr Feis preserves the Tennysonian stanza, but his general practice is to employ for each single poem the metre he considers best suited to the thought expressed in it.

A MEDIEVAL PUZZLE.

The Bayeux Tapestry. A History and Description by Frank Rede Fowke. (The Ex Libris Series.) 7½×5½ in., 139 pp., lxxix. plates. London, 1898. Bell. 5/- n.

It was undoubtedly a happy thought, thus to provide the student of English history with a handy book on the Bayeux Tapestry, all the more as Mr. Fowke's former work, which contained a series of illustrative appendices, was costly and is out of print. The letterpress of the present volume is confined to a short history of the tapestry and an explanation of the incidents depicted in it, but it contains a reproduction of the whole of the famous tente, by a new photographic method, which does away with the objectionable mesh of the ordinary process. This reproduction is exceedingly good, while additional weight has been given to Mr. Fowke's commentary, since M. Comte, Conservateur du Dépôt Légal au Ministère de l'Instruction Publique, has adopted it as the basis of his official treatise, "La Tapisserie de Bayeux."

A vast quantity of erudition and a not inconsiderable amount of temper have been lavished on the long strip of rough embroidery (for it is not really tapestry) which served, once a year, to adorn the nave of Bayeux Cathedral. At the time of its discovery in 1729 by the learned Benedictine, Montfaucon, it was locally known as la toilette du duc Guillaume and supposed to be the work of his Duchess, Matilda. This hypothesis has been long since exploded, but the tapestry propounds many other conundrums not so easily answered. The most curious feature of all is, that, while the internal evidence, the representation of armour and dress and so forth, is practically conclusive of its eleventh-century origin, the external evidence points rather the other way. To begin with, it exactly fitted the nave of Bayeux Cathedral, which was not completed till the middle of the twelfth century, the old cathedral having been burned down in 1106. It was not known to Wace, who was a canon of Bayeux, nor to any of the other later chroniclers, many of whom commit, in their narratives, anacronisms of which the tapestry is never guilty. Professor Freeman, who regarded it "as the highest authority on the Norman side," held it to be a contemporary work unconnected with Matilda, but a gift from Odo to his newly-built church, and probably made in England. Mr. Fowke also attributes it to Odo, but the attribution to Odo is the one point in Professor Freeman's masterly analysis which is open to serious doubt. Dr. Lingard thought it originated in the personal vanity of the three entirely obscure men of Bayeux who figure in the tapestry, or their heirs. The extremely humble material of which the tapestry is made is certainly not favourable to the theory of its being a gift by the Bishop, a man of vast possessions. Very remarkable too is the silence of the canons, who in 1476 made an inventory of the valuables of the church, and who were at pains to set out the circumstances, including the traditions, attaching to each article. They mention, for instance, cloaks said to have been worn by William and his duchess, tapestries the gift of the patriarch of Jerusalem, and a chasuble that belonged to Odo. And the absence of any reference to Odo in regard to the tapestry is accentuated by the express reference to him in regard to other things. Finally, there is the singular presence in the tapestry of three obscure men of Bayeux, Turol, Wadard, and Vital. They were not people of any account, and yet they are made most important figures. One of these, Vital, is represented as being in fact the leader of the Norman reconnaissance before Hastings, in the picture of which the legend is, "Hic Willelm dux interrogat Vital si vidisset Haroldi exercitum," a fact that none of the chroniclers record. Now, why should Odo have wished to honour him, and who could have desired to commemorate this trifling circumstance except Vital or a relative? That the maker of the tapestry desired to glorify Bayeux is plain, for events which other chroniclers place elsewhere are in the tapestry transferred to that town. In such a work Odo, who was a great man, was a natural figure, but not so these three men, of whom all that is known certainly is that two appear as homagers of the Bishop in Domesday. The disproportionate prominence given to these obscurities, to the prejudice of great prelates and nobles, points most strongly to the conclusion that the obscurities or their relations had, as Dr. Lingard thought, a controlling influence in the work.

Professor Freeman has dealt fully with the puzzle of the lady with the English name whom a tonsured person is chucking under the chin, within what is supposed to be the gate of the ducal palace. He did not solve the riddle, however, nor does Mr. Fowke, though he has founded on it a quite engaging romance. The legend runs here, "Ubi unus clericus et Ælfiva," and stops. Who was she, and what had she to do with Harold's enforced stay in Normandy? Was it a scandal connected, as Mr. Fowke suggests, with the war with Conan? And what was it that stayed the hand of the embroiderer, just when we should like to have seen more of the pair? We have mentioned this because it is a fair sample of the minor riddles which Mr. Fowke's interesting work offers to the ingeniously minded.

THE ITALIAN RENAISSANCE.

The Architecture of the Renaissance in Italy. By William J. Anderson. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged, with Copious Illustrations. 9×5½ in., xx.+185 pp. London, 1898. Batsford. 12/6 n.

That a book which originated in lectures before the Glasgow School of Art and was published for the use of students should have so soon needed a second edition is in itself a healthy sign that the circles of architectural interest are widening beyond those professional centres in which it is a necessary study.

Even in the days of that great thirteenth century of its perfection, the "Gothic" school was limited by the same eternal bars of climate and of sky, of national needs and material possibilities, which bound all forms of artistic expression. And thus when the pointed work had outlived the days that produced it, when it forgot the necessity of construction, and elaborated useless decoration, other schools of architecture had to be discovered; and it was to workmen from Italy that Henry VIII. and Wolsey had to go to find them when Hampton Court was built. Those workmen of 1520 came from an Italy which had known the perfect work of Brunelleschi for a century. For directly we leave the building of the people, which was Gothic, we reach an age when great personalities dominate architecture. "Time was their architect, and the people were their master masons," said Hugo of the great French cathedrals, designed by men whose names are hardly ever known and built by a thousand members of the medieval craft-guilds, even by the whole population of a town.

But in Italy the true pointed style never succeeded. The limitations we have spoken of forbade it. A more natural expression of the nation's life in living stone had to be found. This need became prominent and even imperious just about the time when Columbus was discovering a new world, when the ancient classical manuscripts were revealing the beauty of the old, and of monuments still preserved of classical buildings on the soil of Italy. These had been the true southern expression of the great Empire of the South, and in them the genius of the new Italy recognized the foundations from which all really Italian architecture must spring. In the language of biology you find at this point in architectural history a real reversion to type, a recurrence to older forms. Whatever we may think of the finished product of that reversion, as compared with the best school of pointed architecture, it is needless in these days of tolerant omniscience to claim sole pre-eminence for either. And it is one of the chief merits of Mr. Anderson's book that he can see what is beautiful in many forms of art, while he is swift to indicate the points at which inevitable decay begins.

A very large number of buildings are discussed in this work, and Mr. Anderson helps our understanding with frequent and intelligible illustrations, and guides us through the labyrinth with a sure hand. For he arranges his mass of material on a plan that is neither merely chronological nor merely geographical, but organic. He takes the first great awakening of Brunelleschi and chooses examples from Milan and Florence; then the central period in Rome, of which the Palazzo Massimi, by Peruzzi, is described in detail; and finally gives us a short essay on the later school, in which the coldness and formality of Palladio on the one hand, and the freedom, verging upon licence, of Michelangelo on the other, were the disastrous influences that led to decadence and final ruin. Thus history and architecture go hand in hand from the first page to the last, with their old inevitable lesson that man's ambition reaches perfection only to overleap itself and fall on the other side. Once and again where life is most intense, his work reaches the sublime, but only at wide intervals and in favouring circumstances are those heights attained from which the luminous paths spread out that lead each century to its own horizon. One of those heights was reached in the best days of Italy's Renaissance, and on its path the nations are still working out their destiny.

Mr. Anderson has taken advantage of his new edition to add many new colotype plates and other illustrations to a very full and valuable collection. The improvements in the text of his second chapter on Brunelleschi's work are especially notable, and the table of the principal Italian buildings will be of great service. A good index and list of authorities complete the value of a carefully-planned book, in which we only regret the omission of some reference to Professor W. H. Goodyear's work on the use of horizontal curves, already known in the Parthenon, and first discovered by this American student in the Maison Carrée at Nîmes, with results that were emphasized later on by extended study of many of those Italian buildings on which Mr. Anderson has himself done such good work. But there was so much ground to be covered, and Mr. Anderson has done his task of selection and compression so well, that we have little but praise, on the whole, for a revised edition that bears every trace of careful and considered criticism.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Mr. G. A. Storey's SKETCHES FROM MEMORY (Chatto and Windus, 12s. 6d.) is a book whose existence on the overcrowded shelf of books of "reminiscences" is justified by the engaging way in which it is written and the genial personality which shines through its pages. Its chief interest lies in some jottings from boyish memories of the Revolution of 1848, in a good many pleasant chapters on the author's life in Spain, in some side glances at the art and artists of the fifties, and in its gossip about the Landseers, the Leslies, and others. There is a good deal in it which many people would not think worth recording, but even this is redeemed from commonplace by Mr. Storey's narrative gift, and by a power he has of making the most of events and conversations, which almost causes us to wonder that he never tried his hand at novel writing.

Biographies of Robert Clive are numerous enough, and a new one, with no new facts to justify it, was not particularly needed. Yet it must have seemed as difficult to keep Clive out of the Builders of Greater Britain Series as the sailor declared that it would be to keep Nelson out of Paradise if the Admiral made up his mind to go there. So we have LORD CLIVE, by Sir Alexander John Arbuthnot (Unwin, 5s.), with a frank admission in the preface that new facts are conspicuous by their absence. The book states the old facts, and covers the ground; more than this cannot be said for it without gross flattery. It is dull—a feature that is scarcely excusable seeing that the subject was picturesque. How such books ought to be written was shown, some time since, by Sir Walter Besant, in a monograph which he contributed to a similar series on the life of Captain Cook—a model which may be recommended to future labourers in the field. By way of illustration there is a portrait of Clive, reproduced from a picture at Powis Castle.

Mr. Thiselton Dyer has utilized much well-spent industry in his OLD ENGLISH SOCIAL LIFE AS TOLD BY THE PARISH REGISTER (Elliot Stock, 6s.). Under our present regulations registers can no longer be treated in the careless and haphazard way in which their guardian used too often to treat them in days gone by; but this practice of careful preservation has only come into operation when, for the student of social life, the registers have ceased to be worth preserving. The old registers are full of life and individuality. The parson often does not content himself with a bare record of births, marriages, and deaths, but jots down memoranda of local events, and remarks upon them as the fancy takes him. Sometimes he is a wit and enlivens his register with pungent comment; sometimes he is a scholar and quotes Latin. Sometimes he is himself the subject of satire, as in the case of a Mr. Nalton who, in the days of Cromwell, was chosen Minister of St. Martin's, Ludgate Hill. The register states that he did not accept the appointment and adds:—

Twas Jeroboam's practice and his sport
Priests to elect out of the baser sort.

But the more important entries form a store of curious lore as to old customs and village history, to which Mr. Thiselton Dyer's book forms a very interesting introduction. We trust it may do something to assist the work of the Parish Register Society by showing the real importance of these records.

GREEK SCULPTURE WITH STORY AND SONG, by Miss Albinia Wherry (Dent, 6s. n.), is another of the very numerous well-meant attempts to awaken interest in a subject which we have in England excellent means of studying, and which, despite the work of Mr. Gardner, Miss Jane Harrison, Mr. Upcott, and others, does not appeal as much as it ought to do to the general public. This book differs from others in paying much attention to the literature of the subject, explaining the mythology of the statues, and quoting largely from critics among the ancients like Pausanias, Pliny, and Strabo, and from modern poets and others. The style is not exactly such as to attract boys and girls, for whom the book is, so the author says, largely intended, and we should have liked—in the cases, for instance, of the Apollo Belvedere, the Faun of Praxiteles, and the Laocoon—more attempt to give a popular account of the motif of the artist, and an explanation of the beauties of the works. In the two latter instances, too, we should surely have had some mention of Hawthorne's novel and of Lessing's criticism. But Miss Wherry's work is, on the whole, careful, complete, and full of information. It is also well illustrated.

CAN WE DISARM? by Joseph MacCabe (Heinemann, 2s. 6d.), is a brightly written, if not particularly cogent pamphlet on the questions raised by the Tsar's rescript. The first part of the pamphlet proves that disarmament is outside the domain of practical politics, and the second part shows how it might be brought within that sphere. Something in the way of a Holy Alliance under the patronage of the Pope is the nostrum to which Mr. MacCabe pins his faith. It might be replied, of course, that there is no startling novelty in the idea of a Holy Alliance and that the Bishop of Rome was never very successful in keeping the world in order, even in the days when there were no Protestants to snort defiance at him, and has even encouraged war, from time to time, for the purpose of proving the orthodoxy of his doctrines. But this is politics. Another force which Mr. MacCabe believes will make for peace is the increasing political influence of women. Yet, when women have exercised political influence in the past, they have not invariably used it for the purpose of preventing war. "The face that launched a thousand ships" may belong to legend; but history records that Mme. de Maintenon was responsible for the dragooning of the Camisards, that Queen Elizabeth was in full sympathy with the buccaneering industry, and that the Empress Eugénie displayed no particular anxiety to prevent the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war.

In so far as Vasili Verestchagin's "1812." NAPOLEON I. IN RUSSIA (Heinemann, 6s.) is intended as a contribution to history, it has very little value, and might be curtly dismissed as a rechauffée of Ségur and Marbot—a sort of Russian "Fights for the Flag." The interest of the book centres, however, in the introductory chapter entitled "Realism." Here we have criticisms of life, and an essay in political philosophy. Society is in peril! Where shall Society find defenders? That is the problem. Hitherto it has been defended by the Army and the Church; but the Church is losing its influence, and the day is coming when the Army will hesitate to shoot. "Clearly," says Verestchagin, "things assume a serious aspect." But he does not despair. It will be necessary to bring up the reserve; but the reserve will turn the scale and win the victory. This reserve force—need it be said?—is Art. "Its influence over the minds, the hearts, and the actions of people is enormous, unsurpassed, unrivalled. Art must and will defend Society." So runs the argument; and it will be agreed that it is an argument more likely to convince an artist than an historian. For while the artist is humming over his Didicisse fideliter artes the historian will be taking a rapid survey of events from the time of the Borgias to the time when Courbet attempted to save Society by helping to pull down the Colonne Vendôme, and concluding that the evidence before him scarcely justifies the nec sinit esse feros. The gospel which Verestchagin desires artists to preach is, indeed, a good enough gospel in its way. "Give up," they are to urge, "give up enjoying yourselves amidst the illusions of the idealism which lulls your senses"—an injunction which certainly has all the merit of high moral tone. Unfortunately, austerities, though beloved by Count Tolstoi, do not agree with the artistic temperament in general. Perhaps, however, Society is not in such imminent danger of falling to pieces as M. Verestchagin fears. One would fain hope that, even in Russia, it may not be necessary to have recourse to the desperate measure of mobilising the "artists" in order to keep anarchy at bay.

TRAVEL.

It might have been supposed that, when Nansen had told the story of his voyage in the Fram, the possibilities of the subject were exhausted; and so, no doubt, they were, from the point of view of the reader who only reads for information. None the less Lieutenant Johansen's WITH NANSEN IN THE NORTH (Ward, Lock, 6s.) merits a warm, and even an enthusiastic, welcome. It would be hard to say exactly what it is that constitutes the charm of his narrative, which neither is extravagantly well written nor tells us anything of importance that we did not know before. Yet the charm is there. Open the book at random, and it will assert itself at once. Read on, and it will not lose hold of you until the last page is reached. There is little word painting, yet every picture stands out definitely. There are no tricks of style and construction, no carefully prepared surprises, yet at every dramatic moment of the story the true dramatic impression is produced as clearly and unmistakably as in any elaborately built work of fiction. To read the book through is like reading an epic poem rather than the chronicles of the adventures of an explorer. It is, so to say, the Odyssey of the Polar regions. It reproduces the glamour of the Arctic as does no other book that we have ever read.

Quotation can give no idea of the great fascination of the book. As well might one apply the principle of elegant extracts to such a work as "Robinson Crusoe." The art—a perfectly unconscious art, we take it—lies in the slow elaboration of a romantic picture out of a multitude of trivial details, and in the natural manner in which the writer lets his emotions find expression. He writes as frankly as a child would talk—never hysterically, yet never cynically, or with that false stoicism which arises from the feeling that one's emotions, however interesting to oneself, are of no concern to the community at large. His temperament was suited to his task, and his book, from the general reader's point of view, deserves the highest praise.

There is one passage that may stand apart from its context without injustice. It is from the account of the dramatic meeting with Mr. Jackson's party. Nansen, it will be remembered, met the Englishmen first. Lieutenant Johansen was half afraid that he had lost him; but a deputation came to greet him.

Mr. Armitage [writes Lieutenant Johansen] took out his pocket flask and filled a cup with port wine, which he offered me. All took off their caps, and, with uncovered heads, they gave a cheer for Norway while they looked up at our little flag. My feelings at this moment may be more easily imagined than described. There I stood, in the midst of these brave men, a horrible, blackened savage in rags and with long hair, suddenly restored to civilization, among a crowd of strange people, who brought with them the fragrance of soap and clean clothes, surrounded by the ice with which we had been struggling for the last three years, while above my head waved the flag which I felt that I represented. Never have I felt as I did then, that I had a "fatherland," and, with uplifted head, I drank the cup of welcome, while the Englishmen's cheers rang out across the icefields.

In conclusion, we will recommend every one to read Lieutenant Johansen's book, and congratulate Mr. Braekstad upon the admirable manner in which he has rendered it into English.

THE VALLEY OF LIGHT, by Basil W. Worsfold (Macmillan, 10s. n.), is rather a difficult book to classify. Ostensibly it is a book of travel. Practically it is a history—interesting, though scrappy and unmethodical—of the persecutions of the Vaudois. But in form it is a collection of letters to a lady; and that form is not the most appropriate that could have been selected. The choice lay between making the letters pedantic, or treating the history with casual nonchalance. Both courses had their drawbacks, and Mr. Worsfold has chosen to illustrate the drawbacks of the former plan. One reads, for example, in the second letter, "To-day I wish to tell you something more than I have already told you of the historical associations of the country"; and one is irresistibly reminded of little Mr. Bouncer's letter home, which began, "I will now tell you something about Merton College," and continued with a substantial extract from a guide-book. It is an unfortunate association of ideas, and does injustice to Mr. Worsfold, who has not got his knowledge from a guide-book but from the fountain-head; but, at the same time, it is an association hardly to be avoided when the epistolary method is employed in a book the interest of which is purely objective.

The fact remains, however, that Mr. Worsfold has written a good book on an interesting subject, and that, though he may not have made the most of his opportunity, he has made a good deal of it. He is too self-conscious to be a really great writer; he constantly suggests the professor talking down to the level of inferior understandings. But he has, at bottom, a true sense of drama, and his theme is as dramatic as could be desired, and not, as themes go, a hackneyed one. The literature of Vaudois Protestantism—as distinguished from mere books about it—is neither extensive nor of recent date; and the material is picturesque and worthy of a great writer's pen. The glorieuse rentrée, for example, is one of the most striking incidents in religious history that historical novelists have ever overlooked. One may prefer Arnaud's account of it to Mr. Worsfold's; but Mr. Worsfold is more graphic than any modern competitor. On the subject of the massacres, too, he is very eloquent and vivid. He takes his story, of course, from the "most naked and punctual Relation" of Samuel Morland; and he quotes freely from Morland's vigorous and indignant prose. But his own prose is not overshadowed by it; and his description of the audience given to Cromwell's Commissioner by the Duke of Savoy is really a fine bit of writing. If all the writing had been on the same level, the book would have been a great one.

There is one point in Vaudois history which concerns the honour of England. It relates to the moneys collected for the victims of the massacres in 1655, and funded by Cromwell to form a perpetual annuity to the Vaudois Church. After the Restoration, the payment was stopped. Mr. Bewes, in his "Church Briefs," adduced evidence to acquit Charles II. of appropriating the money to his own use. Mr. Worsfold, however, comments as follows:—

The scandalous dishonesty of this proceeding is too obvious to require any comment. Here is a sum of money given by the nation for a specific purpose, and the Government for the time being appointed trustee. This trustee subsequently appropriates the trust fund to its own use. It is quite true that the Acts of Cromwell were subsequently annulled by Parliament. But all that this annulling could effect (in the case in point) would be to render the disposition of the fund void. The fund itself was left precisely as it was before Cromwell disposed of it. If the Government of to-day do not recognize their liability for every penny of this fund (and of the interest on it) there is only one word for the transaction—repudiation.

The hardships of travel to Dawson City and the picturesque features of gold-hunting in its neighbourhood are well described in Mr. Julius M. Price's little book, FROM EURON TO KLONDIKE (Sampson Low, 6s.). Mr. Price went out by the notorious Chilcoot Pass, and returned down the Yukon River, so that his book gives an account of the two main ways of reaching the district of Klondike. Neither of them can be called attractive, though neither presents the same difficulties and dangers as appalled and often slew the earliest pioneers. An "aerial tramway," consisting of cars slung on a wire rope, carries goods over the Chilcoot, though the liability of the cars to stick for hours together at some inaccessible and stormy altitude prevents its being used for passengers. The actual ascent of the pass, Mr. Price says, "owing to its terrific angle, is about as fatiguing a climb as could well be imagined"; but the practised Alpinist, who reads in the next sentence that the distance is a thousand yards and the angle 46deg., will be inclined to think that Mr. Price's standard of comparison was not very lofty. In coming home down the Yukon Mr. Price had more adventures; his steamer broke down, and its proprietor, who was on board its consort, proposed to leave it for the passengers to get into order—or die of starvation! It is a good thing he was overruled; we should be sorry to have lost Mr. Price's lively and interesting book.

There is much good matter in the pages of Miss Edith M. Nicholl's OBSERVATIONS OF A RANCHWOMAN IN NEW MEXICO (Macmillan, 6s.). Miss Nicholl went to New Mexico—the Mesilla Valley—in pursuit of health, and found not only that but occupation. Her enthusiastic account of the New Mexican climate seems to point out the district as an almost ideal resort for those who suffer from lung diseases:—

In this dry, aseptic, bracing atmosphere, and at such an altitude, there is no relaxation of the system, and in consequence comparatively little susceptibility to atmospheric variations. The astonishing leaps the thermometer is capable of making between a winter sunrise and its noon are looked on by progressive physicians as being not only beneficial to consumptives, but almost essential to their improvement, implying as it does a strong tonic and bracing influence, combined with the important factor of excessive dryness."

Miss Nicholl's description of her housekeeping experiences in New Mexico is uniformly bright and amusing. In her later chapters she throws light on some interesting social problems of the Southern States, and illustrates her remarks on "law-abidingness" by the history of an outlaw, named, from his youthful appearance and early ferocity, "Billy the Kid," who is rather fascinating to read about, but must have been a decidedly unpleasant neighbour in real life. During his career of five years some 300 persons met their death by violence in his district; his prison-breaking feats rival those of Jack Sheppard, whom he must have somewhat resembled. Miss Nicholl's book is both entertaining and instructive.

The new edition—the third—of Baedeker's PALESTINE AND SYRIA (Leipzig: Karl Baedeker, 12 marks) is also remarkable for both these qualities. In one respect it illustrates the unchangeableness of the East. Those who go down from Jerusalem to Jericho are expressly warned against the danger of falling among thieves. On the other hand, the progress of the East is attested by the recommendation of a confectioner at Jerusalem, a tailor at Damascus, a German beer-house at Beirut, and something almost amounting to a hydro-pathic establishment on the Sea of Galilee. A pleasant feature of the handbook is the candour with which the author warns his readers against this, that, and the other "arrant knave," who hangs about Hebron or Jericho, or wherever his haunt may be.

NAVAL.

THE CRUISE OF THE CACHALOT, by Frank T. Bullen (Smith, Elder, 8s. 6d.), comes with a commendation from Mr. Rudyard Kipling as "immense—there is no other word." It is an exceedingly graphic account of a cruise in a whaler, written from a seaman's point of view. The thing has been done before—by the American writer, Herman Melville, in his "Moby Dick," but Mr. Bullen, in going over the ground a second time, has done quite well enough to escape reproaches upon that score. Out of the way information abounds in his pages; and the fight between the whale and the octopus is as fine a fight as any reader need desire. The book is illustrated.

A GUNNER ABOARD THE YANKEE (Doubleday and McClure, New York, 6s.) is composed from the diary of a man of the naval reserve who acted as number five of the after port gun on board that ship during the Spanish-American war. These plain, direct notes of an eye-witness of the war have been edited by Mr. H. H. Lewis, and are preceded by an introduction by Rear-Admiral W. T. Sampson, who says, in effect, that the young men forming the ship's company were called into service several weeks before any other naval reserve battalion, that they came from all walks of civil life, and that they have made the name of their ship a household word throughout the country, proving that the average American, whatever his employment, is a capable fighter. To "No. 5" all was new and fresh and of vital interest; he received his impressions rapidly, and as they quickly followed one another they were captured and hastily set down. Thus the book is very pleasant reading, even if one does not chance to be an American, for it tells, in a breezy and high-spirited way, of youth in action, of bravery, of duty courageously carried to its final issue, of victory, and of lavish praises modestly borne. The illustrations, mainly from photographs taken on board the ship, greatly assist the narrator in making vivid the more technical part of his interesting history.

A new instalment of the "TEMPLE" DICKENS (Dent, 3s. n.) is two volumes containing "Sketches by Boz." They first appeared a year before the Queen's Accession, and were the work of a youth of four-and-twenty. Far away from us as is much of the "Everyday Life" described in them, they are full of humour and observation, and, as Mr. Gissing has said of them, they "contain in germ all the future Dickens."

In a volume two inches square and half-an-inch thick the Clarendon Press and Mr. Horace Hart, printer to Oxford University, have produced a VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. It is a wonderful booklet, which only those who know the technical processes of printing can properly appreciate. Moreover, it is readable. It is not, of course, for the library, but for the pocket. Many handy books are now published which are intended for the same destination; but, when all the other pockets are filled with portable reprints, the waistcoat pocket will still remain for the "Vicar of Wakefield," and indeed a shy student could conceal it, like a conjurer's half-crown, within the hollow of the hand.

"ONLY A DOG!"

Bright eyed companion ! when you seek to prove,
 While round my path the storm-clouds gather black,
 The depth of your unutterable love,
 What is the "soul" some tell me that you lack ?
 Is it not that same spark which (as God's air
 May blow at will thro' princely palace panes
 Or some poor peasant's hovel, and may share
 The glory of the swelling organ-strains
 Or lend the pan-pipe of the shepherd-boy
 Its cruder music) animates with flame
 The greatest and the lowest that enjoy
 This breath of life, which might have seem'd the same
 In man and beast, but for the outer shell,
 The special mechanism that controls
 And thro' each subtle valve of nerve and cell
 Elaborates what mortals call their "souls" ?

In you, it may be that the vital ray
 Shines not from out a many-sconced link,
 E'en as a little rush-light burns away,
 Or little reed-pipe from the river's brink
 Set to a shepherd's lip, upon the breeze
 Flings forth a fluting treble, even so
 The instrument, or, call it what you please,
 The channel thro' the which your feelings flow,
 Limits your soul's expansion, circumscribes
 The freedom and the fleetness of her wing,
 Her voice's compass, yet, despite the gibes
 Of those who deem you but a soulless thing,
 I feel some ray of the Eternal Light,
 Some note divine, is surely here indeed,
 In rough-hewn torch I watch it beaming bright,
 And recognize its music in the reed.

PHONETICS AND PROSODY.

Is it not clear that in the science of phonetics lies the key to those intricate questions as to the nature of quantity and accent in verse that have baffled and irritated so many generations of scholars? I cannot flatter myself that this is a new observation; yet it does not seem to have come within the ken of Mr. John M. Robertson, whose acutely-reasoned disquisition "Concerning Accent, Quantity, and Feet,"* now lies before me. If it has not occurred to Mr. Robertson, who is always careful to thresh out the literature of a subject before writing about it, there are probably a good many other people to whom it will be equally unfamiliar. I make no apology, then, for knocking at a door which, though doubtless ajar, is not plainly and notoriously open.

The main fault of Mr. Robertson's essay, I think, is that its positive upshot is a little difficult to grasp. He is so busy demolishing the theories of other people that he forgets to construct his own, or at any rate to throw it into definite relief. For the present, however, we need not concern ourselves with the results at which he arrives or does not arrive. My point is to show that in some details of his argument he, like most other enquirers, is misled by the conventional symbols we call letters of the alphabet. I suggest that if we want really to understand the nature and function of quantity, whether in ancient or modern verse, we must clear our minds of the alphabet, and bring phonetics to bear upon the problem.

Mr. Robertson quotes from Melancthon certain remarks upon stress and quantity in the word Virgilius, and interprets them thus:—"What is asserted is that, though the stress is laid on the second syllable, it remains short—the short sound of i, as distinguished from the sound (in English, ee) which can be prolonged—while the Vir, having the sound of the long Latin i, counts as long, though it be not emphasized." Assuming that Virgilius should be pronounced Veergilius (ee as in been and i as in bin), is it not a mere darkening of counsel to think and speak of these vowels as the long and short forms of the same letter? They are two totally different sonorities, represented by one symbol; and it is the failure to recognize, or rather to remember, this fact that leads Mr. Robertson into the error of supposing that, while the ee "can be prolonged," the i (by implication) cannot. Let him make the experiment: he will find it every bit as easy to prolong, to sustain, the i in bin as the ee in been. Whether the reverse is true, whether it is possible to pronounce been as short as bin, I am not skilled enough in phonetics to determine. Following the guidance of my untrained ear, I should say it was possible, but difficult. It takes a distinct effort, and a certain explosiveness of enunciation, to prevent the ee in been from turning into a diphthong, bee-en. Unless we put special constraint upon it, the tongue takes rather longer to produce been than bin; it has a somewhat more complex operation to perform. Or is it simply that (the throat being the starting-point of all vowel sounds) the i is formed further back in the mouth than the ee, and the breath has therefore a shorter distance to travel? That is perhaps the reason why, if we would make been as short as bin, we must give the breath an unusual impetus, and shoot it forth like a projectile.

A little further on, Mr. Robertson chides Walker (presumably him of the Dictionary) for failing to perceive that "fat is in a very practical sense as long as far"; since in fatness the first syllable normally bulks more to the ear than the second, whether or not it actually takes longer to sound." This is surely to confuse accent with quantity. It is to the mind, not the ear, that the first syllable in fatness bulks large. It is the essential portion of the word; the second syllable is a mere affix; and the stress, of course, falls on the essential portion. If an accented syllable necessarily takes longer to pronounce than an unaccented syllable (as I am inclined to think it does), then, in so far, the fat is longer than the ness; but quantity which is conferred wholly by stress is not true quantity, and must not be confounded with it. Fat may be long as compared with ness; but, when pronounced by educated persons, it is certainly short as compared with the first syllable of hardness or fardel. There are, however, certain dialects, or provincial methods of pronunciation, in which the a of fatness, without altering its sonority, is indefinitely prolonged. The difference between fat and far (as I think Mr. Robertson will find if he looks into it) is much like the difference between bin and been: fat can be prolonged at will, but far cannot be shortened. Here the case is clearer than in the former example. The ee of been may, by an effort, be almost deprived of its diphthongal quality; but no effort of which I, at any rate, am capable can make the a of far other than a diphthong. In order to produce the open sound fa, the mouth must assume a position from which it cannot pass direct to the r, but must insert an e—fa-er. So, too, in the words fir and fire: fir may be indefinitely elongated, fire is practically incompressible. The i is so manifestly a diphthong that the Elizabethans, as we know, often treated fire (fi-er) as a dissyllable.

Three instances afford a scanty basis for a generalization, yet I cannot but throw out the theory—which others may verify or refute—that there are no such things as “long” single vowels, but that the true distinction is between pure vowels and diphthongs. Pure vowels, in the English of educated men, are usually pronounced short or staccato, but are capable of sostenuto treatment. When the sound is sustained, however, it seems to me that the succeeding consonant can seldom, if ever, be reached without the intercalation of another vowel; so that an elongated “short” vowel, like the ordinary “long” vowel, is in effect a diphthong. I am speaking, at present, of English alone. The vocal organs of other nations may be differently constituted both for the emission of single sounds and for the transition from one sound to another. I cannot but think that a careful study of the range of variation among the articulate-speaking peoples of to-day should put us on the track of a reasonable theory as to what the ancients really meant by a long vowel and a short vowel, a long syllable and a short syllable.

Here is another point at which Mr. Robertson falls into one of the snares set by our conventional spelling. “The a in metal,” he says, “is in every sense short; but it clearly becomes longer in metallic before the doubled consonant.” This is a variation on a familiar fallacy; it is a case of ante hoc, ergo propter hoc. What can the double l, which is the veriest convention of school orthography, have to do with the matter? Mr. Robertson himself calls it in the next breath “a rule of spelling not always observed, but fairly general.” The plain fact is that in metal the stress falls on the met, in metallic on the al. In the latter case the a undergoes the slight elongation which is, I believe, inseparable from stress. Pronounce metallic with the accent on the first syllable, and the double l does not lengthen the a any more than the ph (another convention of the schools) lengthens the a in metaphor. But here arises a point worthy of observation: in rapid everyday speaking we do not say metal but metul or met'l—a tendency so fundamental that in one signification the word has come to be spelt mettle. How, then, does the tendency arise? Clearly from the fact that it takes a little more time and trouble to say metal than metul. Thus we have a triple gradation: very short, u as in metul; short, a as in metal; long, a as (for instance) in Bâle, where it becomes a diphthong, something like Ba-ul. Still more delicate gradations could doubtless be noted, all depending on the more or less complex movements of the tongue and jaw necessary for the production of the different sounds.

If any such gradations held good in the pronunciation of Greek and Latin, the equation of “two shorts to one long” is at once seen to be purely conventional. As regards English, again, it appears that Mr. Robertson was over hasty in saying: “Quantity in spoken verse consists of stress and of the consonantal total of syllables. The pre-supposition that certain vowel sounds are in themselves ‘long’ is the ruin of discussion.” The physical mechanism of speech renders some vowel sounds necessarily longer than others, quite apart from their consonantal context. At the same time, the “consonantal total” of the syllable (as Mr. Robertson calls it) is of great importance from the metrical point of view, and depends, not on the mere number of consonants, but on the ease or difficulty of transition from consonant to vowel, from vowel to consonant. Furthermore, I need scarcely insist that, apart from quantity, there is a colour-quality in different vowel sounds which is of supreme importance to the poet.

“Quantity in speaking,” says Mr. Robertson, “must amount substantially to the same thing as stress, the remaining elements of quantity counting for something as regards euphony, but not enough to affect scansion.” This is excellently put, though in place of “something” I should say “a great deal.” Accent, it is true, gives English verse its laws, but its beauty largely depends upon quantity. You can write correct, and spirited, and ingenious verse by attending to accent alone; without an ear for quantity you will never be a poet.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

A SMOKING PHILOSOPHER.

Some years ago in Paris I picked up from one of the book-stalls on the banks of the Seine a witty and pleasing treatise entitled “Traité théorique et pratique du Culottage des Pipes.” The author’s name is modestly withheld, but the book is dedicated to the “friends of the pipe,” and it takes for its motto “la pipe, c’est l’homme.” But, whatever his name, clearly the author was a gay dog and a learned. For there is great scope—is there not?—for a display both of learning and of art in this weighty matter of choosing, colouring, and caking pipes. The writer professes, indeed, that, in spite of prolonged meditations and conscientious research, he has only succeeded in lifting a corner of the veil of smoke which hides from our straining eyes the mystery of the matter.

But how thorough those researches had been we may gather from the introductory chapter, wherein, after an eloquent defence of the pipe (“Why does one smoke so many cigars when beyond all question all serious smokers proclaim the superiority of the pipe? I do not speak of the cigarette, ce jorjou d’enfant, cette eau sucrée du tabac”), he proceeds to pass in review the various kinds of pipes—pipes en terre: marseillaises, belges, hollandaises, parisiennes; pipes en écume, en fausse écume, en porcelaine, en bois, en métal. Whilst dealing with this division of his subject, however, it is disappointing to find that our author is content with the bare mention of M. Gustave A—’s elementary treatise on Hypnocalpy, or the Art of Smoking in one’s Sleep, 3 vols. folio—a work very suitable for family use and singularly moral. Thus, sometimes with an air even of flippancy, the author discourses on the subject which is clearly next his heart. He is capable, one can judge from his enthusiasm, of having felt, if not of having written, those lines of passionate lament—

Mon cher Philippe,
J'ai perdu ma femme et j'ai cassé ma pipe.
Ah ! combien je regrette ma pipe !

Or of having said, with that artist who lay dying in the Quartier Latin, "My friend, I leave you my pipe and my wife. Take care of my pipe !" He does, in fact, remark that in his youthful days he was ignorant "qu'on ne remplace pas une pipe comme on remplace une maîtresse."

At other times he deals in scientific theories as to the burning of pipes, or in practical advice as to the choice of meerschaums, with all the seriousness the subject demands. He traces with care and loving minuteness the complete process of colouring a pipe (marche générale du culottage). Especially to be commended is that dictum of his that the device of leaving a dottle in a pipe should only be used in the extreme cases of pipes "rebelles à tout culottage"; although, perhaps, an even wiser recommendation would be to put such pipes aside altogether. Without instancing other examples we must be content to say in general that he treats this branch of his subject with all the needful sympathy and, in spite of his modest protest that he is better skilled to wield the pipe than the pen, with all the needful learning. He tells us, too, with simple sincerity of the dangers and difficulties, of the joys and sorrows, that await the enthusiastic colourist. With how grand and how melancholy an eloquence does he describe the pathos and the passion of the smoker's life ! "Nothing in this world is stable," he cries like a later Heraclitus, "and the pipe which was once your joy and pride ends by succumbing to the force and flow of years ; its qualities disappear or are transformed into defects ; it grows old like a woman, like a mere mortal." Again, how penetrating is the vision of this smoking philosopher, who could see that "the greatest misfortune that can befall an honest man is—to break his pipe.

On ne casse jamais une pipe brûlée,
Mais la pipe qu'on aimait tant !"

That is much more affecting than the death of our English poet's beloved gazelle.

Ardent admirer as he is of a well-coloured clay, he would not have you misled by too exaggerated an appreciation of mere beauty. Attach yourself, he exclaims, to the qualities of a pipe, not to its mere outward appearance. Of the beauty of pipes one may say, as of the beauty of women, le fond avant tout. But he recognizes that, even as with women, so with pipes, the most experienced judge may be deceived. In that case, if in spite of all your cares your pipe burns, his advice is tinged with the true dignity of philosophic calm. Trouble not deaf heaven, he says in effect, with your bootless cries, but comfort yourself with the consciousness of duty done. There are some pipes which seem predestined to be burned.

It is impossible to part with our smoking philosopher without quoting some of the golden maxims which adorn his penultimate chapter :—

- (1) Do not smoke whilst you write ; the second labour distracts from the first ; you smoke your pipe irregularly, sometimes even you let it go out.
- (2) Do not give pet names to your pipe. They in no way help you to colour it.
- (3) Light the whole surface of the tobacco, if possible with a coal. Believe me, a pipe will never be good if it is lit at a candle.
- (4) Smoke slowly and regularly. A pipe well smoked is as good as a chronometer.
- (5) Do not sacrifice convenience to appearances ; appearances are always deceptive. Nimium ne crede colori.
- (6) Un bon fumeur a pour principe
De fumer jusqu'au bout sa pipe.

And with that excellent maxim we might well take leave of him. The only cause for regret or complaint that we have is that this gifted author, this fumeur émérité, was so completely enamoured of clay pipes that we are deprived of the instructive and profitable lessons which he would otherwise have been able to give us on the subject of the briar, the meerschaum, or the cigar. Concerning cigars, indeed, he was content to quote Mabilles's couplet

Le cigare ne fumeras
Mais bien la pipe seulement.

There are limits, then, even to the genius of this philosopher.

CECIL HEADLAM.

Notes.

In next week's Literature Among my Books will be written by Mr. Stephen Wheeler, on "Charles James Fox as a Reading Man." The article will contain some hitherto unpublished criticisms on Fox's literary tastes, by Walter Savage Landor.

The University of St. Andrews has shown much discrimination in deciding to confer its degree of LL.D. upon Mr. Edmund Gosse. The distinction is well merited not only by Mr. Gosse's services to English Letters in the department of criticism and by what he has done in introducing continental writers to the English public, but also by the sanity of his judgment, and the fine taste displayed in his writings both in prose and verse.

After a period of service in the British Museum of some 47 years, Dr. Garnett is now resigning his position as Keeper of the Printed Books, the resignation to date from March 20. Dr. Garnett, as our readers well know, is a man of very wide culture, which has shown itself equally in the field of research and in original work. But what is not so well known to the outside world is the good work he has rendered to the reading public by his share in the improvements introduced into the British Museum Library, and in the catalogue of printed books which he has superintended from the first. The great value of his services to literature was recognized three years ago, when he was made a C.B.

The sixpenny reprints have already, so we hear, begun to exercise a melancholy effect upon the sale of six-shilling novels on the railway bookstalls. This is only what one would have expected ; and the case of the six-shilling novels is likely to be harder still when new novels begin, as we are told they will shortly, to appear at sixpence. To a certain extent the depression may be only temporary. Sixpenny novels, with all their merits, are not the things we care to keep in our libraries, and from the trade point of view, the margin of profit on them must be so small as to endanger their permanent success. But, for the moment, they are the "new toys" of the book-buying public ; and, in the immediate future, books of higher price can hardly fail to suffer from their sudden advent.

Sir John Lubbock's list of best books, which, by the way, was drawn up, to use Sir John's words, "not as that of the hundred best books, but which is very different, of those which have been most frequently recommended as best worth reading," suggested to Reynolds' Newspaper the notion of asking for lists of the best fifty books for working men. Many of the lists were excellent, and, what is more, would make but a small demand on a working man's purse, but many tended to be curiously one-sided, and seemed to be drawn up on the curious theory that if, for instance, you are a Socialist, you should only read books supporting Socialism.

Still more curious was one correspondent's list, under the heading "Religion"—a purely destructive one :—

Viscount Amberley's "Analysis of Religious Belief," Forlong's "Faiths of Men in All Lands," "Supernatural Religion," Payne Knight's "Worship of Priapus," Rourke's "Scatologic (sic) Rites," Inman's "Ancient Faiths," Cobbett's "History of the Reformation," Taylor's "Diegesis," Higgins' "Anacalypsis," and Foote and Wheeler's "Crimes of Christianity."

For the "Worship of Priapus" and the "Scatologic Rites" this gentleman would surely have done well to substitute—for literary if no other reasons—the “Pilgrim’s Progress” and the “Christian Year.” Has he read a judicious selection of all the books on the side of religion, we wonder, before compiling this very one-sided list? It reminds one of the inquiring youth who, hesitating between Romanism and Anglicanism, determined to guide himself by a course of reading on both sides. Just when he had come to an end of the last of his authorities on the Roman side he met a Roman priest, to whom he explained his procedure and the exact point he had reached in his reading. “Throw your books away,” was the advice of the acute ecclesiastic, “throw your books away, and trust simply to the instincts of your own heart.” After all, the practice of Reynolds’ correspondent does not differ much from that of the Liberal who takes in nothing but the Daily News, or the Conservative who takes in nothing but the Standard. How much better we should get on in controversies, both political and religious, if the combatants read nothing but the literature of the other side!

A NON-COMBATANT.

(The village of Dalebury contributes an enquiry to the controversy in the Church.)

Between the budding hedgerows, along the winding lanes,
Across the meadows flooded by the February rains,
Above the dripping spinneys of oak and elm and birch
A rumour comes to Dalebury of dissension in the Church.

We hear that there’s a crisis and a quarrel in the air,
That there’s a want of concord and order everywhere;
It seems a grievous schism the Mother-church divides
With laymen raising protests and the clergy taking sides.

We pride ourselves at Dalebury the village looks its best
On a summer Sunday evening, that hour of rural rest,
When the cattle wander homeward beneath the shady trees,
And the clover in the churchyard is alive with droning bees.

The small church stands half-hidden by a belt of sombre yews;
It boasts a three-decked pulpit and rows of oaken pews,
With narrow stained-glass windows through which the sunbeams fall
On brasses in the chancel and hatchments on the wall.

Our old white-headed vicar is something quaint of phrase,
Yet all the parish loves him, his kindly words and ways;
Our ritual is the simplest, old-fashioned, yet sublime;
Our music gains in fervour what it lacks in tune and time.

The clerk leads the responses, we sing “Incline our hearts,”
And wait in doubtful places until the harmonium starts,
Although upon occasion we drown that useful guide
In some familiar hymn-tune, Hursley or Hollingside.

So, while the shadows lengthen, our act of worship goes Beyond the homely sermon towards its peaceful close,
Till you hear the vicar praying the altar-stone before
That the Peace of God our Father may be with us evermore.

Such is the Dalebury service, and such the Dalebury rites,
And now when people tell us of controversial fights,
It seems to us at Dalebury that if the tale be true
And all the Church at warfare, we here are fighting too.

The fact itself amazes, and we regard it thus;
We neither ask for details, which would be Greek to us,
Nor seek for information of how the fight has gone,
But what we wonder dimly is which side we are on.

ALFRED COCHRANE.

The University of Munich has recently conferred on Lady Blennerhasset the honorary degree of Doctor of Philosophy in recognition of her services to literature. Lady Blennerhasset (née Countess Leyden) is a brilliant example of the cosmopolitan woman of letters. Born in Munich, and educated in a convent at Aix-la-Chapelle, she has since lived in almost every capital in Europe. Her friendship with Dr. Döllinger stimulated her in her literary efforts, and in 1888 a biography of Madame de Staël in three volumes appeared, which at once established her reputation. It has been followed by an admirable study of Talleyrand, published in 1894, and by countless contributions to foreign periodicals, notably an article on the late Prof. Jowett, in the German section of Cosmopolis, and a critical estimate of the poems and novels of d’Annunzio in the Deutsche Rundschau.

H. C. H. co. Donegal, sends the following note with reference to “The Man in the Moone, or a Discourse of a Voyage Thither,” by Domingo Gonzalez (Bishop Godwin), 1638.

In Literature, p. 93 (Jan. 28, 1899), there is mention made of this work and Swift’s indebtedness to it in his “Voyage to Laputa.” Although I have not seen the original publication, yet this note was of interest to me, as I had just read “A View of St. Helena” (Harl. Miscell. XI., 511, 1811), wherein the above work is reproduced (Circa, 1680). This subject seems worthy of research. The idea is, no doubt, much older than Bishop Godwin’s “Man in the Moon.” When Ben Jonson produced his masque at Court “News from the New World Discovered in the Moon,” in 1620, he refers apparently to some unknown (?) prior work wherein the planet is peopled with “volatees” and “epicœnes,” and much descriptive matter is entertainingly entered into. He says this world in the moon has been discovered by the “neat and clean power of poetry, the mistress of all discovery.” But Ben himself gives us an earlier and less known reference. In an earlier masque (1610) “Love freed from Folly,” he speaks of the “New World in the Moone.” However, the masque of the moon was probably, from internal evidence, written, or, at least, planned as early or nearly as early as 1610. In Beaumont and Fletcher’s Fair Maid of the Inn (IV. 2) there is a reference to the new world in the moon, “most fantastically peopled.” This comedy was acted in 1626. Possibly this alludes to Ben Jonson’s masque, but it is more likely both refer to some popular production of the early years of the seventeenth century.

Collectors are always on the look-out for new worlds to conquer, and the sale of Scott relics announced for next month might supply them with a hint. Amongst these is the famous silver taper-stand which Scott bought for his mother with his first considerable earnings. It was not absolutely his first fee: that, as Lockhart tells us on William Clerk’s authority, went to the purchase of a new nightcap for the young advocate’s own use. But the taper-stand might serve as the nucleus of a collection, to consist of the various objects which great writers have purchased with their first earnings. The pleasure of the collector is always more in the chase than in its results, and the peculiar advantage of such a hobby is that it would afford occupation for all the leisure of the longest life. The only drawback is that no purse, however long, no industry, however persevering, could ever make such a collection complete. As an author who could never appear in it one may instance the late Mr. James Payn. That eminent novelist told the world what he did with his first cheque, for three guineas, from “Household Words.” “It was a sum too small to invest and too sacred to be frittered away; in the end I bought a pig with it.” The pig, which was intended as a present to Mr. Payn’s tutor, escaped on the journey, and is probably now beyond the reach of even the Chicago millionaire.

There is a singular omission in Dr. George Adam Smith’s memoir of his friend Drummond. Dealing with the criticisms on “Natural Law in the Spiritual World” he ignores the article which appeared in the Contemporary for March, 1885. This critique was written by Dr. Watson, of Dundee, a distinguished contributor to the Expositor’s Bible Series. Moreover, the Contemporary article was republished in a volume called “Gospels of Yesterday,” which secured no small attention, and is in a third edition. It is no secret that Professor Drummond’s argument suffered from this attack more than from any other.

The American Bookman prints some interesting particulars of the life of Mrs. E. L. Voynich, whose novel, “The Gadfly,” will be remembered as one of the great successes of last year. Ethel Lilian Voynich (née Boole) was born some thirty-three years ago in Ireland. Her parents were English, and she was educated in London. Her husband is a native of Lithuania, in Russian Poland, who, not approving of the methods of the Russian Government, migrated to England and he has since his marriage lived in London. “The Gadfly” was Mrs. Voynich’s first novel, but for some years she had worked at translations from the Russian.

The intricacies of the New York Custom House regulations are again causing trouble to American publishers. In future no English books will be allowed into the States which do not bear the imprint of the English printer. When American editions are printed in England American publishers often request that the names of the English printer should be omitted from the title-page. This omission will now prevent the books from being passed by the Custom House; and English publishers should be careful to see that the printer's name does in every case appear. It seems uncertain whether the regulations allow of the imprint being at the end of the book. In any case, it will save delay if it appears on the back of the title-page.

All collectors of Dickens' works know The Village Coquettes, that unfortunate comic opera in two acts which was published in 1836—unfortunate, because after occupying a position of great rarity for many years it suddenly tumbled from its high estate by reason of the accidental discovery, in 1894, of nearly 100 copies in quires among some waste paper about to be carted off to the mills. Since then The Village Coquettes has been comparatively common. Not so, however, the songs, choruses, and concerted pieces from the opera which were separately published in pamphlet form in 1837. During the last twelve years only one copy of these has been seen in the London auction rooms, and it has generally been regarded as unique. A second copy is, however, now reported by Mr. Spencer, of New Oxford-street. It contains an autograph dedication to J. P. Harley "with the author's and composer's compliments." The Village Coquettes was produced at the St. James's Theatre in December, 1836, the words by Charles Dickens, then in his twenty-fourth year, and the music by John Hullah.

A catalogue of miscellaneous books, just issued by Messrs. Maggs Brothers, of Paddington-green, contains a long series of works relating to Napoleon and the French Revolution, and almost as long a list of Court memoirs. Among the "Miscellanea" is a large, paper copy of the "Œuvres Complètes de Voltaire," 70 vols. 8vo., 1784-80. Beaumarchais established a printing-office at Kehl for the purpose of publishing this edition. He employed the Baskerville type, which, according to Lewine, was then new in France, had special paper manufactured, and from first to last expended upwards of three million francs on the production, even going so far as to print twenty-five copies on blue paper for the benefit of the King of Prussia, whose sight was affected. Of late years the value of this edition of Voltaire has declined, owing, no doubt, to its unwieldy proportions.

The most popular book in the States is Kipling's "The Day's Work." Mr. Nelson Page's novel, "Red Rock," is selling very well, and there is a demand for a new humorous book, "Mr. Dooley in Peace and War." Rostand's "Cyrano de Bergerac" comes second in the Bookman's list of best selling books, but there is no mention of a translation.

It is gratifying to find that the best, as distinguished from the most popular, English novels are finding an appreciative public in France. A translation, by M. Félix Fénéon, of Jane Austen's "Catherine Morland," just issued from the office of the Revue Blanche, is the latest instance of the critical discrimination of our neighbours, and it is no less pleasing to note that they have lately discovered Mr. George Gissing. In England Mr. Gissing's novels have often been considered "too good" to be acceptable as serials; but several of them have lately appeared serially in some of the best French magazines and journals.

M. Pierre Loti, whose last work we review in another column, has just returned to Rochefort. The house where he lives, in the Rue Saint-Pierre, has been the home of his family for generations. The celebrated novelist intends shortly to start on a journey to the East but, according to an extract from one of his letters published in a French paper, he has made no definite plans:—

"I assure you" he writes "I do not know myself where I am going. I am setting out for the East and shall go straight ahead without any fixed plan just as far as I feel inclined. . . . to Persia, perhaps, unless it should just happen to be somewhere else instead. All I can tell you is that I am not taking any one with me; that is one of the essential conditions of my journey."

M. Paul Margueritte is now travelling in Italy with his children and his brother Victor, who collaborates with him in his novels. The two authors have almost finished the work on which they are engaged, "Femmes Nouvelles," and are also collecting material for the novel which is to be published as a continuation of "Le Désastre." This next work is to be entitled "Les Tronçons du Glaive," and the third volume of the series is to be "La Commune."

The latest addition to the festive list of "authors at Play" comes from Paris. M. Catulle Mendès, the poet, and M. Richard O'Monroy, the story-writer, have undertaken to act as judges in a beauty competition that is being organized by the proprietors of the Gil Blas.

The remarkable thing about the particulars given in a new French periodical—L'Ami des Bêtes—as to the favourite animals of French literary men is their dead level of uniformity. They all love cats—as Mr. Frankfort Moore loves them in England—and no single man of genius acknowledges eccentricity in the choice of his dumb friends. Perhaps, as only Academicians seem to have been consulted, we have here a fresh instance of the effect of Academies in checking the free play of the individual temperament. At any rate, Frenchmen outside the Academy have shown more originality. Gérard de Nerval made friends with a lobster, and led it by a blue ribbon through the Palais Royal; and to his friends who demanded an explanation of his conduct he replied:—"Lobsters neither bark nor bite, and, besides, they know the secrets of the sea." This story must have been in Mr. Ashby Sterry's mind when, in his poem on kindness to animals, he wrote the striking lines:—

Be lenient with lobsters,
Be courteous to crabs.

A number has been sent to us of a new periodical, the Paris Magazine, published in England by Messrs. Sands, and in France by Messrs. Clarke. The place which it is intended to fill is apparently that left vacant by the demise of the Tauchnitz Magazine. It caters, that is to say, for the average British resident in foreign parts; and, so far as we are acquainted with the literary tastes of the average Englishman (and Englishwoman) abroad, we should imagine that the serial story by Miss Florence Warden, which is running in the magazine, is just the sort of thing to meet their views. The most notable of the foreign contributors is M. Edouard Rod, who, as is well known, is more than British (being, in fact, Swiss) in the seriousness of his outlook upon life. We wish the magazine success.

There is an interesting bit of criticism in the Mercur de France, where M. Edmond Barthélemy compares Carlyle's historical methods with those of Macaulay. He imagines Macaulay narrating the proceedings of the Convention that sat to make the Constitution:—

Dans cette Convention, il verrait tout d'abord ceci; la Constitution à faire. Sur quoi, il passerait en revue les partis, évaluerait leurs ressources, montrerait, dans une série de ces sentences morales dont il a la spécialité, en quoi ils ont tort, en quoi ils ont raison; ensuite il les ferait manœuvrer en bon ordre, comme des régiments à la parade, opposant systématiquement le fort de l'un au faible de l'autre; au bout de ce symétrique tournoi parlementaire, prononçant sa sentence de juge du camp, il déclarerait qu'en somme la Constitution éternelle faite, déduirait les raisons pourquoi, et peut-être, en guise de péroration, finirait par quelque brillante, généreuse et humanitaire complainte sur la chute des Girondins : le tout, d'une calme et large poussée de style discursif, amenant les objets par files régulières tous de la même catégorie.

It is a just estimate of the great Whig historian's manner. Carlyle's mode of giving the events a vivid human interest is thus contrasted with it :—

Un Carlyle commence par écarter comme un jeu pédantesque du moment, comme une chimère et comme une abstraction qu'elle est, cette fameuse Constitution. Du même coup, il voit plus directement l'effort de tous ces hommes ; la vie même se découvre à lui, vertigineuse, splendidement troublée, toute en enchevêtrements féconds qui ne s'interrompent sur nul point du temps et de l'espace, et dont toute volonté est le centre, et tire après soi, surtout aux heures de crise, l'indéfini réseau. Ces hommes qui se querellent là font bien autre chose que de rivaliser d'influences et d'appétits à propos d'une géométrale Constitution à la Sieyès ; c'est la vie de vingt siècles, avec ses droits et ses torts accumulés, qui est derrière eux, en eux, et qui les soulève ; elle crie par leurs gorges, cette vie ; toute l'histoire de France vient d'aboutir à eux, et en même temps vingt fois multipliées l'idée de ceux-là qui fondèrent cette histoire. Sans le tapage toujours assez vain d'un "Acte Constitutionnel," il aperçoit le caractère héréditaire de la nation, il entrevoit tout l'ordre de nécessités séculaires qui produit la frénésie et les créations de ce moment.

Sudermann's "Die drei Reiherfedern" has already run through four editions and its popularity in book-form should atone in some measure for the cold reception accorded it behind the footlights. German critics have been much exercised concerning the hidden symbolism that lies behind the story. One ingenious interpretation of a somewhat personal character appeared in rhyme as a feuilleton to the Berliner Tageblatt a day or two after the première of the play. The three feathers are, according to the rhymester of the Tageblatt, the three plumes or rather pens (a play on the word "Feder," which means both pen and feather), borrowed by Sudermann for the occasion from his successful brother dramatists, Hauptmann, Fulda, and Wildenbruch, with the result that in endeavouring to produce a blend of the imagery of the "Versunkene Glocke," the elegant smoothly-flowing verse of "The Talisman," and the historical romanticism of "Heinrich IV.," the author of "Die Ehre" has murdered his own original dramatic muse of whose vigorous beauty and abounding life, it is said, there is no trace in "Die drei Reiherfedern."

THE LITERATURE OF OCCULTISM

There is a sense, of course, in which all fine literature, both in prose and in verse, belongs to the region of things mysterious and occult. Formerly it might have been maintained that music was the purest of all the arts, that the shuddering and reverberant summons of the organ, the far, faint echo of a distant choir singing, spoke clearly to the soul without the material impediment of a story, without that "body" which must clothe the spirit of pictures and sculptured forms, being as they are representations of the visible things around us. But since Wagner came and conquered, music has become more and more an intellectual exercise, and to the modern musical critic every bar must be capable of interpretation, of an intelligible translation, if it is to be absolved in the judgment.

Since then music has frankly become a "mixed" art, a "criticism of life" in the medium of sound, we who try to understand literature may well insist that our fine prose and our fine poetry have a part in them, and that part the most precious, which is wholly super-intellectual, non-intelligible, occult. The lines of Keats, the "magic casements, opening on the foam of perilous seas, in faëry lands forlorn," will occur to every one as an instance of this mysterious element in poetry, Poe's ode to Helen is another example, and there are passages in the old prose writers, sentences in Browne and Jeremy Taylor, and sometimes a sudden triumphant word in Ken, which thrill the heart with an inexplicable, ineffable charm. This, perhaps, is the true literature of occultism. These are the runes which call up the unknown spirits from the mind.

But there is a literature which is occult in a more special sense, which either undertakes to explain and comment on the secrets of man's life, or is explicitly founded on mysterious beliefs of one kind or another. Books of this sort have, it is well known, existed from the earliest times ; perhaps, indeed, when the last explorer leaves Babylon, bringing with him positively the most antique inscription in the world, he will find an incantation written on the brick or on the rock. It will be said, no doubt, that there would be nothing strange in such a discovery, that early man living in a world which he understood either dimly or not at all, would naturally devise occult causes for occult effects, would imagine that he too by esoteric means could pass behind the veil, and attain to the knowledge of the secret workings of the universe. But we know that such beliefs were by no means peculiar to the Egyptian and the Accadian of prehistoric times, we are able to trace all through the ages the one conviction of an occult world lying a little beyond the world of sense, and probably at the present day, in our sober London streets, there are as many students of and believers in magic, white and black, as there were in the awful hanging gardens of Babylon. But though belief is as fervent as ever, the expression of it has lamentably deteriorated, as may be seen in Mr. W. T. Stead's "Letters from Julia," written by the hand of Mr. W. T. Stead, which we reviewed some time ago. The modern disciples of Isis speak in a tongue that differs from that of the ancient initiates. They who wish to learn the message of the new hierophant may read the review, or even the book in question, but here, where we discourse of literature and of literature only, we cannot enter into the squalid chapter of back-parlour magic, into the follies of modern theosophy and modern spiritualism. And here we must not even speak of "imposture," for we know nothing of most of these persons, save that they cannot write books.

But this literature of occultism was not always vulgar. Futile, perhaps, it was always, or perhaps, like the ritual of Freemasonry, it did once point the way to veritable enigmas ; if it could never tell the secret, it may have whispered that there was a secret, that we are the sons of God and it doth not yet appear what we shall be. But no one could look into the alchemical writings of the middle ages and deny them the name of literature. Alchemy, in spite of all confident pronouncements on the subject, remains still a mystery, the very nature and object of the quest are unknown. The baser alchemists—there were quacks and impostors and dupes then as now—no doubt sought or pretended to seek some method of making gold artificially, but the sages, those who practised the true spagyric art, were engaged in some infinitely more mysterious adventure. The Life of Nicholas Flamel is decisive on this point, and Thomas Vaughan, the brother of the Silurist, was certainly not hinting at any chemical or material transmutation when he wrote his "Lumen de Lumine" and the "Magia Adamica." The theory has been advanced that the true alchemists were, in fact, the successors of the hierophants of Eleusis, that their transmutation was a transmutation of man, not of metal, that their "first matter" was "that hermaphrodite, the son of Adam, who, though in the form of a man, ever bears about him in his body the body of Eve, his wife," that their fine gold, glistening and glorious as the sun, symbolized the soul, freed from the bonds of matter, in communion with the source of all things, initiated in the perfect mysteries. However that may be, there can be no question as to the beauty of the best alchemical treatises, of that strange symbolism which spoke of the Bird of Hermes, of the Red Dragon, of the Son Blessed of the Fire. The curious in such matters may consult Ashmole's "Fasciculus Chemicus," and the extraordinary "Opusculum" of Denys Zachaire, at once an autobiography and an alchemical treatise.

In the space of an article it is, of course, impossible to sketch out even a brief scheme of old occult literature. We must pass over the Greeks, in spite of the songs of the Initiated that Aristophanes has given us, in spite of that Thessalian magic which Apuleius moulded to such exquisite literary ends. We must decline the question of the origin of alchemy, which a distinguished French chemist has characteristically referred to some misunderstood trade receipts, relating to methods of gilding and bronzing the baser metals. Then there is the great question of the Sabbath. History tells us that in the Dark Ages people were mad about witchcraft, and that they tortured old women till they confessed to anything rather than suffer another turn of the rack. It was a familiar superstition, that of the poor old woman with her black cat, but it may be noted that Payne Knight's monograph on the "Worship of Priapus" throws a very different light on it, and that Hawthorne understood something of the real Sabbath. The terror and the flame of it glow behind all the chapters of the "Scarlet Letter," and those who can read between the lines see the same red glare in "Young Goodman Brown." We must leave, too, the problem of Rosicrucianism, concerning which Mr. A. E. Waite has said the last words in his "Real History of the Rosicrucians," a kind of historical counterblast to the fantastic and entertaining, but wholly unreliable work by the late Hargrave Jennings. The "Black Mass," which M. Huysmans exploited to such purpose in "Là Bas" is a degenerate, décadent descendant of the medieval Sabbath, and is really only a revival of the blasphemous fooleries that went on in France about the time of the Revolution, when great persons assembled to adore a toad, which had received "all the Sacraments of the Church." Indeed, there seems to be a constant Satanic tradition in France; in the middle ages one finds Gilles de Raiz, and about ten years ago a clever writer described an appearance of Satan in Paris with extraordinary effectiveness, and this, be it remarked, was long before Léo Taxil had invented Diana Vaughan, and the diabolic rites of an inner Masonry. Those who know anything of occultism will be aware that we have scarcely touched the fringes of the subject; we have said nothing of the Kabbala, nothing of the Evil Eye, perhaps the most widespread, ancient, and persistent of all beliefs, nothing of the malefic images, such as "Sister Helen" made in Rossetti's ballad, which are being made in our Somersetshire at the present time by village women who love and hate. And all these beliefs and many others have left deep marks on our literature, and perhaps on our hearts also.

So far our subject has been chiefly the "expository" literature of the secret sciences, we have noted some few of the forms which occultism has assumed, and have mentioned one or two of the leading books and leading cases. The imaginative literature inspired by or dealing with the mysteries is a far smaller field for criticism. Passing by the "Golden Ass" and all the mass of legends and songs that the middle ages have given us, doing reverence to King Arthur as we read that "here in this world he changed his life," leaving the strange Hermetic Poems of Sir George Ripley, and that mystical romance the "Chymical Marriage of Christian Rosycross," we may glance at the fiction of the present century and see how it has been influenced by the occult idea. Sir Walter Scott dabbled slightly in the subject, as he dabbled in most antique and curious things, but occultism to him was merely a "property" with which he decked some of his pages, as he chose to deck his hall at Abbotsford with helmets, and broadswords. "Mervyn Clitheroe," by Harrison Ainsworth, and the "Lancashire Witches," by the same writer, are books to make boys quake of dark nights when they pass the black end of the lane, but Bulwer Lytton's "Strange Story" strikes a genuine and original note of terror, and few will forget the appearance of the Scin Laca, the Luminous Shadow of Icelandic belief. And perhaps the "Haunters and the Haunted" comes still nearer to perfection, with its theory of the malignant dead, of the instruments by which they work. Hawthorne and Poe, so utterly unlike in most things, were at one in their love of haunting, but while Hawthorne suggested the presence of the infernal army camped all about us and around us, Poe found his terror and awe in the mortal human body, in his theory of a living death. He wrote the story of the corporal frame that rots in death, and thinks while it decays. Those who have read Mrs. Oliphant's "Wizard's Son" have seen a splendid theme spoilt by weak and diffuse execution, but her "Beleaguered City" may stand with Mr. Kipling's very different "Mark of the Beast," that is amongst the little masterpieces of occult fiction. In the one case spiritual awe, in the other panic terror, and the hint of awful possibilities are developed with the extremest skill, and after such successes as these it would be painful to contemplate the sorry imitation, the lath and plaster mysteries of "Mr. Isaacs," a book which recalls Madame Blavatsky and her sliding panels. At the outset of our article we barred all discussion of "Theosophy," so it will only be necessary to say that Mr. A. P. Sinnett once wrote two novels, which may be Theosophic but are certainly not literature. "Jekyll and Hyde" remains to some of us Stevenson's most perfect work, and it may be that a too obvious undercurrent of allegory is its only flaw. But those who revel in the creations of a bizarre and powerful imagination may perhaps find something to satisfy them in Mr. M. P. Shiel's "Prince Zaleski," and "Shapes in the Fire," stories which tell of a wilder wonderland than Poe dreamed of in his most fantastic moments. And "Pierrot," by Mr. De Vere Stacpoole, stands alone, perfect in its pure and singular invention. We must say at the end as at the beginning that perhaps the true occultism is to be found in the books of those that never consciously designed to write of hidden things, that the "melodies unheard" are the mightiest incantations, that the "magic casements" open on the very vision of the world unseen.

SPANISH JOURNALISM.

The feuilleton was in Spain, as in other countries, the germ of journalism. Dryden, Addison, Swift were simply feuilletonists. So far back as the reign of Charles V. we know that "printed papers" circulated not only throughout the Peninsula, but also in the colonies of Spain. The cities of Valencia, 1528, Barcelona, 1618, Valladolid, 1620, possessed in these respective dates each its newspapers. King Philip, the first Bourbon on the Spanish Throne, supported from his private purse two journals, published in the vernacular of this Monarch—French. Statistics inform us that the Spanish Press had reached a considerable altitude, when the début of the "Little Corporal" upset the inkbottle, blood being the liquid in which were then registered the events of that tragic epoch.

An avalanche in journal form swept over the South of Spain during the stormy days when Cadiz was constituted the seat of the provisional Government while Joseph Buonaparte sat on his unstable Throne at Madrid. La Gaceta, the oldest publication extant in Spain, was founded anterior to this period, 1659, went over to King Joseph, and is now the official organ of the Spanish Government. Between the Press of to-day and that of yesterday there yawns an abyss; and the telegraph, with its uses and abuses, has inaugurated methods little in harmony with the stately tongue of Cervantes.

The dominant note, and that which lends most lustre to Spanish journalism, is to-day the prestige which attaches to the names connected with the Press of Spain as collaborateurs and editors within the last quarter of this century. Their successes as political and literary leaders have invariably been prefaced by those of the journalist. The genius of a Canovas de Castillo, illuminating each paragraph as it roamed at will through realms of unexplored literature, science, art, was revealed in a criticism which has been compared to the copies from Dominichino, more beautiful than the original. The gifts of Castelar as a writer are scarcely inferior to his oratory, and his words have been translated into most European languages, albeit Cervantes says that "translations are like tapestries seen on the seamy side." The cultured pen of Pi Margal has given to journalistic literature much that is excellent. Señor Pi Margal is, as also is his compatriot, Señor Castelar, an ex-Minister of the Republican Government. El Nuevo Régimen is edited by Pi Margal, who is also its proprietor. The genius of Señor Balart has been known to the literary world at Madrid for many years, in which he has, on El Imparcial, laboured as collaborateur in the interests of criticism, art, and literature. The present Prime Minister, Sagasta, was for many years editor-in-chief of the Iberia, a Madrid paper.

Classic, severe, profound are the writings of Sagasta's present rival, Silvela, leader to-day of the Conservative party, and likely, unless sent to the right-about by a possible new régime in Spain, to become Prime Minister in the near future. The organ of Señor Silvela is El Tiempo. Diplomacy has been recruited occasionally from the ranks of journalism. Señor Valera, the versatility of whose talent has charmed many of the Courts of Europe, is renowned as a delightful novelist, critic, poet. The contributions from the pen of Valera to journalism form another precious mosaic to Press literature in Spain. In a discourse delivered at the Royal Academy of Letters lately at Madrid Valera said :—

The author of a book, no matter how successful the book may be, can never influence the popular mind so efficaciously, nor to the extent, nor so immediately as he who writes in a newspaper. In England, France, and the States, the countries where the greatest number of books are read and sold, the work of an eminent author may reach hundreds of thousands of copies ; in Spain the copies sold—save in rare and extraordinary cases—never pass six or eight thousand, and then only when the volume has been glorified by journalistic criticism. On the other hand a periodical or newspaper article is read, commented, applauded, and possesses in political and social affairs an immediate and powerful authority.

Señor Navarro Rodrigo, an ex-minister of the Crown, edited for several years before entering the political arena the Conservative journal the Epoca, the organ of the late regretted Premier, Canovas.

For the first time in the annals of the Immortals the portals of the Royal Academy of Letters were thrown open to journalism quite recently. Señor Fernandez Florez, who had the honour of being received, entered as a journalist, although the literary merits of this leader of the Press at Madrid would have secured the "open sesame." Señor Fernandez is director of El Liberal.

One of the most successful journalists of his age has been the late Señor Santa Anna, founder of the important evening paper La Correspondencia de España, perhaps more widely read than any other Madrid publication. The present editor-in-chief, Señor Mellado, is favourably known to literature, and is a prominent member of the Cortes. El Diario de Barcelona, founded 1792, is at the head of the Spanish literary and political Press. Directed by the erudite and accomplished scholar, Señor Mañe Flacquer, whose connexion extends back to the year 1847, the Diario de Barcelona may be said to be not only one of the first publications in Spain, but in Europe. Illustrated journals at Madrid and Barcelona are, many of them, quite up to the mark and might compete with any in Europe. The national sport has its Press representatives ; the merits of toro and torero form no mean item in to-day's Madrid print. On Spanish journalism generally the opinions of a distinguished Madrid journalist may be found interesting :—

It is scarcely to be expected that the Press of a country two-thirds of whose population regard printed characters as mysterious inscriptions can exercise a decisive influence on the masses. Even if this were sufficient to explain the limited authority of the newspaper, which scarcely penetrates beyond the sphere of our semi-cultured "bourgeoisie," it gives no adequate reason for the profound discredit which has come over the institution pompously denominated the fourth power of the State, a state of things the more to be regretted since those who can read do not, the book and even the review being beyond the reach of the general indolence. Only to the daily political Press falls the lot of the teacher. Culture is administered to its subscribers in homoeopathic doses or under the form of gilded pills, the more tempting "tit-bits" of the moment. This deplorable phenomenon, effect of many causes, is due chiefly to the excessive number of publications, the enormous competition engendering a price so reduced as to be unremunerative—and thus bringing the position of the writer into a state of economic and social decadence—the means of sustenance resorted to by some daily papers, the frequent want of the necessary technical competence in the treatment of problems which call forth public attention, and the marked and growing indifference to questions exclusively political of a public who seek in the columns of a newspaper or magazine not a guide, but opinion, doctrine, sensational news. Above and beyond all those co-operating causes which have damaged the political Press is the partiality of judgment to-day evinced in this class of newspaper, elevating to the skies all who belong to their own party, burning incense at the shrines of personages "chez-eux," and flinging into the mud those who differ from themselves, unless by some rare coincidence, interest and political prejudices coincide with right or justice. Once set in discord, the truth is unhesitatingly sacrificed.

FICTION.

The Two Standards. By William Barry. 8½×5½in., viii. + 530 pp. London, 1898. Unwin. 6/-

The one attribute of this new novel by Dr. Barry which is bound to arrest the attention of the reader is its eloquence. The author has an enviable flow of words, a sense of rhythm in prose, a quick eye for a felicitous epithet. If the value of a work of fiction depended only upon these qualities, his book would have to be greeted as a masterpiece. It has, in fact, been so greeted by a certain number of young critics in a hurry ; but this verdict cannot stand. The book exhibits all the faults one sometimes finds in the sermons of a divine, or the charges of a Bishop. That is to say, the writer seems to be absolutely incapable of getting at close quarters with his subject, and making it clear what he means and what he does not mean. The dominant theme—so far as any theme is dominant—is finance. A company promoter is brought to ruin through the intrigues of a rival financier, who is in love with the company promoter's wife. When the crash comes the company promoter stands in the dock and is sentenced to five years' penal servitude. Why? Dr. Barry gives no reason ; and we feel absolutely certain that no clear reason was present to his mind when he was writing. At any rate we found it impossible to make head or tail of his finance. The company about which the trouble arose is described as a Missionary Syndicate. Its avowed purpose was to put the conversion of the heathen on a sound dividend-paying basis ; and we read that the shares on one occasion fell several points because a divorced lady had been re-married in a church. If Dr. Barry were merely "guying" the Stock Exchange this, of course, might pass. But, as he sets out to draw moral lessons from the collapse of the company, we feel justified in challenging him to produce the prospectus, and show us from what sources of revenue the vendor told the subscribers that they might look for dividends. If he cannot do this, we shall maintain that his treatment of financial affairs is childish, and that it is fortunate that his morals are independent of his arguments.

It should be added, however, that, though the action of the story turns on the financial crash, the bulk of the book consists of extraneous matter. Dr. Barry flings to us great slabs of eloquence on every subject under the sun—hypnotism, spiritualism, Protestantism, art, music, and the state of Piccadilly at midnight. It is very fine eloquence. But it hardly ever helps in the development of the story, and, consequently, it is out of place in a novel. Moreover, as the novel comprises 530 pages of small print, a liberal use of the merciful blue pencil would still have left quite as much reading matter as the average client of the circulating libraries demands.

THE VISION SPLENDID, by Florence Bright and Robert Machray (Hutchinson, 6s.), is the latest of the novels about the theatre, and is evidently the work of writers who have a considerable knowledge of the subject. They have discovered that theatres are very wicked places—that the virtue of actresses is not always more precious to them than the rubies and other precious stones that are sometimes offered in exchange for it—and they do not hesitate to say so. The heroine is innocent, though illegitimate, and expresses surprise as well as indignation at the proposals made to her by a wicked baronet. The moral intended is, apparently, that a young lady of birth and breeding who goes upon the stage does so at the peril of her brightest jewel; but the moral is given away for the sake of a happy ending. The intentions of the wicked baronet become honourable by degrees. He decides that life will not be worth living for him unless he marries the actress. The prospect, one fears, is scarcely such as to deter the stage-struck. The book is indifferently written, and the characters are flabby and ill-defined; though the writers have a certain artless gift of story telling.

The story of Semiramis has been found useful by novelists before now, and it is handled again by Mr. Louis Vintras in his rather oddly-named PASSION ROYAL (Chapman and Hall, 6s.). It is always difficult to adopt a satisfactory style in writing a romance of ancient times. The novelist is easily led into one of two errors; he is apt either to adopt a stilted phraseology, or to run into the other extreme of obtrusive modernity. Mr. Vintras has the bad fortune to combine both faults in an aggravated form; he makes his characters talk in a dialect compounded of reminiscences of Scriptural language and the banal persiflage of a modern love-story. The effect is sometimes extremely comical. The book is not well written, but it contrives to maintain a certain level of interest, and Mr. Vintras occasionally secures a dramatic situation.

The name of Mr. Clement Scott has been so closely connected with dramatic criticism that it is interesting to find him turning aside from journalism to an acknowledged form of literature. In his collection of short stories entitled MADONNA MIA (Greening, 3s. 6d.), Mr. Scott has not, however, attempted to be brilliant or original. He has been content to reproduce scenes and characters with which we have long been familiar. He has not attempted an unusual style or laboured after distinction. The stories have doubtless seen the light previously in the Christmas or summer numbers of magazines, and so have achieved the purpose for which they were written. A few of them are reminiscent of Dickens; the rest are reminiscent of Mr. Clement Scott.

The pleasure we have all derived from Mr. Frank Stockton's stories in the past makes us reluctant to admit that his latest book, THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS (Harper, 6s.), is distinctly dull, although the idea is a peculiarly Stocktonian idea, and promises well. A number of people go to play at camping-out in the woods, under the ægis of a crippled and autocratic hotel-keeper, who sits, spider-like, in the centre of a web of camps, and allots his guests Camp No. 1, 2, or 3, according to his estimation of their toughness. You feel that this might be funny, but Mr. Stockton has evidently felt that it must be funny coûte que coûte. Once the inevitable "engagement" is brought off we are glad to accompany our hermits back to civilization and there bid them good-bye.

THE RAINBOW FEATHER, by Fergus Hume (Digby, Long, 6s.), is a detective story of a familiar type, the interest of which depends entirely upon the handling of a particularly intricate plot. A murder is committed, a vast number of characters are introduced to the reader, and the rest is simple. The author has only to place each and all of them, in turn, in very suspicious relation to the murdered man, and his object is gained. The reader's vanity will be agreeably titillated at first. "Ha! I have it—plain as a pikestaff," will be his thought. The next chapter, by bringing in a fresh unmistakable criminal, starts him with equal confidence on a new tack, and he draws towards the end in a not unpleasantly bewildered condition, in which it would take but little to persuade him that he did the deed himself. It is fair to say that Mr. Fergus Hume has shown much ingenuity at the game, and that "The Rainbow Feather" will fill an idle hour, in a train or an armchair, as well as another book of its class.

Mr. Joseph F. Charles, the author of THE DUKE OF LINCOLN (Lane, 6s.), has undoubtedly the gift of "romantic" writing; but he has hardly yet proved that he can produce a good romance. There are one or two excellent battle-pieces in his present venture; and the strife between the Storckens and the Lichtens, with which is bound up a course that recalls only too readily "the Jackdaw of Rheims," is described with a pretty touch of sarcasm. Mr. Charles does not seem, however, to be sufficiently in earnest. Every third page or so he appears to be laughing at his own more serious work. At the same time he has acquired a firm and flexible style, and in time will learn how to use it.

THE CONSOLATIONS OF TRUTH.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Although not generally a reader of philosophical writings, I wish to pay a tribute of thankfulness to the author of "Sursum Corda" for the valuable letter which appears in your columns to-day; and, in doing so, perhaps you will allow me to unburden myself of a thought which has long been with me, which seems to me very much the same as the argument of that letter, though put in a somewhat different way. One of the most effective arguments used by what we may call the non-spiritual school among us was stated long ago by the late Professor Clifford in words which I cannot now recall; but their effect was that we had no right to believe in a high doctrine, such as the existence of God, merely because it was extremely consolatory to man. A delusion might be consolatory, and truth a very painful thing. Yet the pursuit of truth was right for its own sake, whether it made us happier or more melancholy.

The conclusion certainly is right; yet the idea that truth brings with it no reward of any kind is not only paralysing to all our efforts, but, as it seems to me, absolutely untenable in itself. How shall we pursue truth at all if this be so? Disagreeable truths, of course, there are, and such truths should be faced; for the mind is always strengthened by facing them boldly. But how do we know truth from falsehood at all? I should say only by a sense in ourselves that there is always in truth a certain harmony which, when once we see it, gives the mind satisfaction. And this satisfaction is in itself a happiness which mitigates pain, even when the truth is disagreeable. How often do we say in trying circumstances, "Thank God, now we know the worst!" The very fact that a ray of truth is shed upon evil, rendering it all clear, defined and visible, takes half the sting out of it. And in other cases, when we say "I am satisfied this is the case," we mean that our knowledge gives us satisfaction, that is to say, happiness; for we have attained that position of mental rest and comfort which truth alone can give.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

Pinner, Feb. 11, 1899. JAMES GAIRDNER.

JOUBERT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am sorry if I have pained Mrs. Ward by reflecting upon the morals of M. Joubert—the more so as the reflection was immaterial to my argument, which was directed against the philosopher's manners. From this point of view it is obvious of very little importance whether the lady whom the philosopher notified of the disappearance of his wife's charms happened to be his mistress or not. On the theory that she was his mistress one can understand his wishing to make it clear to her that she had no cause for jealousy of his wife. On the theory that she was not his mistress I must really leave the explanation to Mrs. Ward, merely remarking that it seems to me that the philosopher's offence was rank in either case. I note, of course, Mrs. Ward's suggestion that "one of the chief anxieties of his correspondence is to bring the aristocratic and fastidious Pauline to understand his homely, brusque, and silent wife." But I submit that, in directing the attention of the fastidious Pauline to the fact that the homely wife's charms had vanished, the philosopher was pursuing a somewhat devious course towards his goal.

And, in any case, I cannot but think that very few people will share Mrs. Ward's opinion that the behaviour of a philosopher who, writing to a lady of his acquaintance (whether she is his mistress or not), remarks, to amuse her, that his wife's charms have vanished, is "Something ethereally stainless."

Turning from Joubert's aphorism about his wife to his aphorisms about things in general, I really scarcely know what to say in reply to Mrs. Ward's remonstrances beyond what I have already said. Perhaps, however, the best plan will be to take a few aphorisms at random, have them printed in italics, so that they may look as imposing as possible, and leave the world to judge whether they are conspicuous either for originality or for profundity. For example :—

It is my province to sow, but not to build or found.

What admirable affections result from chastity !

Be saving ; but not at the cost of all liberality.

Chance generally favours the prudent.

Space is to place what eternity is to time.

Agriculture engenders good sense.

The style of St. Jerome shines like ebony.

There is a certain roughness about the Latin writers.

The table is a kind of altar which should be decked on high days and holidays.

Before employing a fine word find a place for it.

The true mark of the Epistolary style is cheerfulness and urbanity.

Such are our aphorisms. They may not be the very best that Joubert ever wrote ; but, on the other hand, as they are taken from the "selection" of an admirer, it is to be presumed that they are not the very worst. We may take it, in fact, that they are a good average lot. They reminded me of the aphorism that there are milestones on the Dover-road. I thought them fatuous ; I think so still ; and that they should apparently have made so deep an impression upon a writer who is herself the last person in the world to be charged with mistaking platitude for profundity is to me, I own, inexplicable. Given sufficient time and a sufficient motive, I would undertake to compile from Mrs. Ward's own novels a set of elegant extracts which would compare favourably with these of Joubert from every point of view.

Obediently yours,

YOUR REVIEWER.

"THE PEN AND THE BOOK."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In his attack on Sir Walter Besant "A Publisher" makes a number of sweeping statements. Perhaps the experiences of a mere author may interest him and others. Either he must disbelieve them, or he must modify some of his opinions.

In an agreement for publishing one of my books I insisted on the insertion of a clause providing for the expenditure of £30 on advertisements. I had a great deal of trouble about it, but at last the firm gave way. The agreement was signed and duly stamped. Some months after publication I asked for a statement of account. I was assured that the money had been spent, and with that assurance the firm seemed to think I ought to rest content. I demanded details, however, and, after many letters had passed backwards and forwards, got them. In the account advertisements were put down, not at £30 as agreed upon, but at £7 10s., and of this sum all except 15s. was a charge for advertising in the firm's own magazine. The 15s. was for an advertisement in a technical journal, though the book was a novel ! An exchange advertisement, of course. In plain words, not a single penny had actually been spent on advertising.

Nevertheless, "A Publisher" asserts that "secret profits exist only in the brains of literary guide-book writers," and this, too, although he is apparently in the habit of making them himself—"whatever 'extra terms' I make," to quote his own words, "are legally and morally mine." I have heard another publisher defend secret profits. As an instance, he stated that he often bought cheaply a job lot of paper and used it as required. Was he to have no interest for his money, he asked, no remuneration for his knowledge of how to choose, and so forth ? For these reasons he contended that he was justified in charging in his accounts the full market price of the paper. If this were done openly and above board, it might perhaps be defensible, provided that the author got fair value for his money ; though, on the other hand, it may be asked what is a publisher paid for if not for his business knowledge ? The fundamental objection, however, is that the author is never a party to these arrangements, and secret profits, even when not fraudulent in themselves, always open the door to fraud.

"Publishers' fees," says "A Publisher," "are unknown." Are they ? My first book was submitted to a firm that did an exceedingly big business. They wrote that it had been reported on very favourably and that they would be willing to produce it "at their own expense" if I would pay £150 for advertising and £30 as their reader's fee. Even in those days I was not quite a greenhorn ; I knew that £150 would more than cover the whole cost of production, so I requested the return of my MS. The firm replied that they had reconsidered the matter and that they would publish the book if I would pay £75 for advertising and £3 as a reader's fee. My only answer was to ask again for my MS. They wrote that they would send it to me if I forwarded £1 to recompense them for the trouble they had been put to. I did not get it until I threatened legal proceedings. What was this firm trying to make ? "Publishers' fees," "incidental expenses," or "secret profits" ? One of them certainly, yet "A Publisher" denies the existence of all three. Does he give £30 to his reader for reading a MS. ?

Another of his rash statements is that "publishers are not very anxious to buy outright." If he had said "some publishers" he would have been nearer the mark. Over and over again I have had offers to purchase, and could not get a royalty instead. Indeed, there are several firms that never publish a book unless the copyright belongs to them.

A serious feature of the case is that many authors cannot sell their books in the open market to the highest bidder. I doubt whether they are aware—whether even the Society of Authors is aware—that there exists a very powerful publishing ring for the purpose of preventing competition and keeping down prices. A few years ago a number of leading publishers entered into an agreement that if an author whose works had been produced by one firm should take a MS. to another, it should be declined. This pretty little arrangement, which still exists, must have put thousands of pounds into the pockets of the firms in question, of course at the expense of authors. Unless "A Publisher" belongs to this ring—and if I identify him correctly he does not—he may refuse to believe my statement, but it is true nevertheless, and, if necessary, I can substantiate it with names.

"Publishers," he says again, "care not a rap for undertaking work on commission." Why, there are some firms that never publish on any other terms. Really, he should be a little more careful in his statements. It is true that royalties are "often paid in advance," but it is also true that they are often paid, either in whole or in part, in three months' bills, even by large firms. Not so very long ago I held one of these bills. My bankers cashed it, as they had cashed others, and just before it fell due the firm who had given it to me wrote to ask if, as a favour, I would hold it over. I replied that it had passed out of my possession, but I agreed, as they seemed rather anxious, to give them a cheque and to take another bill instead. Within a week they were bankrupt.

What do I infer from all this ? That all publishers are rogues ? Certainly not ; neither does Sir Walter Besant. It would be just as ridiculous to assert that all authors are rogues because some may have treated publishers unfairly. Among the latter, as among the former, there are many whose characters need no defence, but that is no argument against Sir Walter Besant's contention—that both should thoroughly understand their business and conduct it in a business-like manner.

A MERE AUTHOR.

"QUEEN ELIZABETH."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Excuse me for recurring to this subject (respecting which there was correspondence in your columns last June and July), but I see it announced that Bishop Creighton's "Queen Elizabeth" is about to be re-issued in a cheaper form, though without the illustrations. Being, however, confessedly a reprint of the letterpress of the original edition, it is to all intents and purposes an infraction of the conditions on which the latter was published and subscribed—namely, those of a numbered édition de luxe, and another, "strictly limited to 1,000 copies," and seems to involve a breach of faith.

The literary matter of the original issue constituted as valuable a part as the pictorial, and the divorce of the two affords not the slightest pretext for the intended evasion of the original conditions of publication. The limitation of the number of copies applied to the whole contents of the book, that is, letterpress and illustrations, and, therefore, excluded the republication of either or both of them in whatever form. When a book is offered to the public for subscription in two expensive editions, and each is limited, as was the case with this book, it implies a distinct undertaking that no further editions of any kind will be published, and that the book will not only go out of print, but remain so, as long as the copyright lasts. If this were not the case, limited editions at fancy prices, such as the subject of this letter, would have no raison d'être, and consequently not be patronized. Although the cheaper issue of this book cannot enter into competition with its sumptuous predecessor, it will nevertheless exercise a somewhat depreciatory effect on the market value of the latter, as well as affect its estimate in the eyes of its possessor.

It may be a selfish passion, but the collector's pleasure in a book is enhanced by the knowledge that few can possess it, for which, however, he is willing to pay liberally; and seeing that the publisher takes full advantage of this in fixing the price, there is no excuse whatever for betraying the collector.

Begging your insertion of this in the interest of commercial ethics,
I am, Sir, yours truly,

WM. STEAD MILLS.

"A LYKE-WAKE DIRGE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Graham agrees with me that it is impossible to make any good sense of such a sequence as "Fire and sleet (in its obvious sense) and candle-light." He also allows that "Fire and Fleet and Candle-light" may be the "authoritative" reading. On this latter point there can be no question at all. The New English Dictionary (s.v. Fleet) has the following:—"Bp. Kennett (ante 1728) quotes in MS. Lansd. 1033, fol. 132, an 'old northern song over a dead corps,' containing the lines 'Fire and fleet and candle-light.'" There is not the slightest doubt about the reading; and there can be no doubt about the sense of the phrase "fire and fleet." It is an expression frequently occurring in northern wills. In these documents it is a common thing for the testator to provide that his wife shall have after his death "fire and fleet"—i.e., fire and house-room. The New English Dictionary gives quotations to this effect from wills in Somerset-house and the Durham Registry.

In Sir W. Scott's "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border," p. 232, edition 1802, the words appear as "Fire and Sleet." But the editor could make nothing of the word "sleet" in this context, and therefore makes a desperate shot. He suggests that sleet "seems to be corrupted from selt or salt, a quantity of which is frequently placed on the breast of a corpse"! I suppose that Sir W. Scott held that "selt" was the original or "authoritative" reading, and that "selt" was a pronunciation of "salt." Unfortunately for this baseless conjecture, in the North "salt" is pronounced "saut," never pronounced "selt." It was most certainly never pronounced in any "local patois sleet," as Mr. Graham seems to imagine.

Yours faithfully,

A. L. MAYHEW.

Authors and Publishers.

Messrs. James Nisbet and Co. will publish early in March a volume of autobiography by Mr. Felix Moscheles, who, as painter, traveller, musician, and man of letters, has included among his friends a large number of interesting men. The book will contain recollections of Mendelssohn and of Rossini, sketches of well-known political figures like Mazzini, letters and reminiscences of Robert Browning, and memoirs relating to the Paris commune, to early art studies abroad, to travel in America, and to many other interesting places and events. The volume will be published simultaneously by Messrs. Harper in New York.

The series of handbooks on the great masters in painting and sculpture about to be published by Messrs. Bell and edited by Dr. G. C. Williamson, the author of "Richard Cosway and His Companions" and other books, will comprise as its first few volumes: "Raphael," by Mr. H. Strachey; "Velasquez," by Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson; "Correggio," by Mr. Selwyn Brinton, author of "The Renaissance of Italian Art"; "Fra Angelico," by Mr. Langton Douglas; "Carlo Crivelli," by Mr. G. McNeil Rushforth; "Giorgione," by Mr. Charles Loeser; "Bernardino Luini," by the editor. The series will contain thirty or forty illustrations in each volume, with a list of the artist's works in the chief galleries of Europe, with descriptions and notes. The volumes will probably be issued at about 4s. 6d.

The new Plato-Lexicon, which is to be published by the Clarendon Press under the editorship of Professor Lewis Campbell, is already in course of production. The impulse to the undertaking came from the appearance a little more than a year ago of M. Lutoslawski's Origin and Growth of Plato's Logic. That learned Pole's review of modern writings on Plato pointed to a growing consensus among scholars as to the dates of the dialogues. On grounds of style a late date was assigned to the logical dialogues—the Theætetus, Parmenides, Sophist, and Politicus. The Laws are admittedly late. They have very definite characteristics of style, quite different from those of the Socratic dialogues. The approximation in style of a particular dialogue to the Laws thus becomes a test of its date.

This is the animating thought of the new lexicon. Besides furnishing a concordance to Plato, it ought to constitute a treasury of observations on Plato's style, leading to a settlement of the vexed question as to the order of the dialogues, and so giving a clue to the development of Plato's philosophy. It is to be hoped that the editor and his helpers will not content themselves with a mere revision of Ast, but start ab initio. The possibility of this depends upon the amount of co-operation, by means of which the work may be rendered exhaustive without undue labour on the part of any one. There are doubtless many scholars with leisure who would be glad to lend a hand. Dictionary-making is pre-eminently a field for volunteers. That all should help where all reap the profit seems part of the fitness of things.

Messrs. Methuen are publishing the opening volumes of two new series of Byzantine Texts, edited by Professor Bury, of which the first volume is "The Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius." Two Belgian scholars, MM. Bidez and Parmentier, have spent many years in preparing the first critical text that has yet appeared of this work. The second series, "Oxford Commentaries," of which Dr. Lock, the Warden of Keble College, is the general editor, opens with "The Book of Job," edited by Dr. Gibson, the Vicar of Leeds. The text is that of the Revised Version, and is accompanied by a full commentary at the foot of the page.

The first volume of the publications of the Irish Text Society, containing romantic tales of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, edited by Dr. Douglas Hyde, will appear in March. We have already remarked upon the useful work undertaken by this society, which was formed in the beginning of last year as an offshoot of the Irish Literary Society. In addition to their annual publication, the society intend to publish at intervals special volumes under the title of the Medieval Series, the first number next May. It will contain the text and translation of the Feast of Bricriu, edited by George Henderson, M.A., Ph.D. This will be the first English translation of a fine old romance which possesses many points of comparison with the Arthurian legend. The annual subscription is so small that the society find it necessary to make an appeal to all who are interested in Irish manuscripts for contributions to the editorial fund.

The autobiography of Mr. Clement Scott—a large portion of which is already written—will be published by Macmillan. It is intended that the book shall appear in a large and luxurious format, at a high price, and shall be illustrated by the reproduction of a large number of old play-bills.

Miss Frances Arnold-Forster's work, "Studies in Church Dedications; or, England's Patron Saints," will be issued during this year in three large 8vo. volumes by Messrs. Skeffington and Son. Miss Arnold-Forster is a grand-daughter of Dr. Arnold, of Rugby, and adopted daughter of the late Mr. W. E. Forster.

Messrs. Innes have just sent to press the volume of their Isthmian Library which deals with rackets and tennis. The author is Mr. Eustace Miles, who, in rackets, represented Cambridge, and in tennis is, next to Sir Edward Grey, the most eminent of the amateurs.

At last Busch's Bismarck has found a publisher in Germany. It will be issued shortly by Grunow, of Leipzig, in three volumes, under the title of "Tagebuchblätter von Moritz Busch." It covers the period from 1870 to 1893.

Messrs. Macmillan are about to add to their well-known "Golden Treasury Series" Edward FitzGerald's classic version of "The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám."

The ninth volume of the "Cambridge Natural History," long promised, is now about to be issued by Macmillan. It treats of Birds, and is written by Mr. A. H. Evans, of Clare College. He has given such careful descriptions of the various families as should enable all travellers to distinguish any unfamiliar specimens they may meet with, and Mr. G. E. Lodge's illustrations are abundant.

Messrs. Gay and Bird announce "The Miracles of Anti-Christ," by Selma Lagerlöf, the author of "The Story of Gösta Berling"; Miss P. B. Flach is the translator; and also "A History of the American-Spanish War," by the War Leaders. Among the contributors are General Garcia, who will describe the Cuban Side of the War; General Shafter, who deals with the Santiago Campaign, and others. General Miles describes the Work of the Army as a Whole, and the Hon. John D. Long, Secretary of the Navy, the part taken by the Navy. Mr. Justin McCarthy, M.P., writes on "What the War teaches from the English Standpoint."

Mr. Redway is about to supplement the issue of "Dickens and His Illustrators" by a series of "Dickens Illustrations" in a portfolio. Mr. Kitton will contribute descriptive notes to accompany the designs, many of which have never yet been engraved. There are nine subjects by Cruikshank, nine by "Phiz," five by Leech, three by Mr. Marcus Stone, and four by Mr. Luke Fildes. The same publisher has ready for issue the collected works of James Braid, the Manchester surgeon, who is known as the father of hypnotism in England.

Professor R. Y. Tyrrell, of Trinity College, Dublin, is engaged upon an "Anthology of Latin Poetry" for Messrs. Macmillan, which will form a companion volume to his lectures on "Latin Poetry," delivered in America, in Baltimore, Richmond, Chicago, and New York, in the spring of 1893, and also published in 1895 by Messrs. Macmillan.

The Rev. Edward John Hamilton, D.D., Professor of Philosophy in the State University at Seattle, Washington, U.S.A., is about to have published a new edition of his textbook "Mental Science," under the title of "The Perceptualist." It is an abridgment of a large book entitled "The Human Mind." Dr. Hamilton describes his philosophy as a modern development of Aristotelianism. He is also preparing a text-book in ethics.

Professor T. E. Holland, D.C.L., has written a preface to a work published by the Cambridge University Press, on "Cases on International Law during the Chino-Japanese War," in which he says:—

The author of this book, my friend Professor Takahashi, thinks that a few words from an Oxford colleague may commend it to English readers. . . . Mr. Takahashi has exceptional claims to speak with authority upon the subject of which he treats. Becoming a Professor in the Naval College at Tokyo, he was directed to join the Matsushima as legal adviser to the Admiral commanding the Japanese Fleet, and remain on board the flag-ship nearly to the end of the war with China. . . . Under his guidance great pains were taken to observe in all questions of naval capture the best traditions of European Prize Courts.

Several interesting biographies are announced for immediate publication in Germany. The most important are Dr. Carl Francke's Life and Work of the Brothers Grimm, Herr Hoffmann's Life of Dostoevsky, and Professor Emil Koeppl's "Tennyson." For its fiction the reading public in Germany depend largely on translations. During the last few weeks translations have been issued of novels by Marcel Prévost, André Theuriot, G. de Maupassant, A. Lugowoi, the Russian novelist, and "Curtis Yorke." There has also been published a complete edition of the works of the Danish writer, J. P. Jacobsen, whose novels have enjoyed not a little popularity in Germany, but have met with little success, we believe, in this country.

Mr. Robert L. Jefferson's narrative of his cycle ride across Europe and Asia to Khiva, eclipsing the late Colonel Fred Burnaby's ride on horseback, will appear serially for three months in the Wide World Magazine. Mr. Jefferson illustrates his narrative with a series of photographs taken by himself.

For some time past articles have appeared in the Journal of the Ex-Libris Society on the "Odd Volumes and their Book Plates." These have just been published by Mr. George Redway in a volume uniform in size and style with the opuscula of the "Sette of Odd Volumes." The edition is limited to 150 copies, and each has a portrait of the author, the late Mr. Walter Hamilton, as well as other plates.

Elsewhere we review Mr. Stopford Brooke's "History of English Literature to the Norman Conquest." He is now at work upon the second volume, covering the time from the Norman Conquest up to the reign of Elizabeth.

Mr. Poultney Bigelow, who suffered a good deal from his experiences in the Philippines, hopes soon to be able to resume work. He contemplates another volume for his "History of the German Struggle for Liberty," of which the last part was published in 1895, since which date Mr. Bigelow has given us "The White Man's Africa."

Mr. Fred. W. Christian, who lectured recently before the Royal Geographical Society on "Exploration in the Caroline Islands," is writing a book on the same subject, which will be published by Messrs. Methuen. Mr. Christian is an Eton and Balliol man who has lived a roving life in the South Seas. He has come to spend some eighteen months in England, and is employing his time in putting into shape some of the interesting materials he has accumulated. He made the acquaintance of Robert Louis Stevenson soon after the latter took up his residence in Samoa, and used to visit Vailima whenever he was in the island.

A "History of Modern Literature" on a novel plan is announced for publication by the Berlin firm of Schuster and Loeffler. The author, Arthur Moeller-Bruck, arranges his matter in twelve small volumes with the following curious titles:—I., Tschandala Nietzsche; II., Neutoener; III., Europäer; IV., Die deutsche Nuance; V., Richard Demet; VI., Nationalismus; VII., Dekadence; VIII., Form; IX., Die Frau in der Dichtung; X., Variétéstil; XI., Der Neue Humor; XII., Propheten.

Dr. A. T. Pierson is now completing the authoritative life of George Müller, of Bristol, which Mr. Müller's relatives have requested him to write. It will be published by Messrs. James Nisbet early in the spring.

A study of the Cardinals, with a view to determining the future successor of Pope Leo XIII., will be issued shortly in Paris, under the title "Le Futur Pape." It is by M. G. Berthelet.

Messrs. Hutchinson and Co. are publishing a new novel by Mr. Morley Roberts called "A Son of Empire."

Mr. John Long intends to publish on the 24th inst. simultaneously in London and New York, Mr. James MacLaren Cobban's new novel, entitled "Pursued by the Law."

It has been said that "man is as tow and women is a spark, and the Devil sets 'em both alight," or, perhaps, more euphemistically, by Longfellow:—

For man is fire and women tow,

And the Somebody comes and begins to blow.

These phrases explain the title of Mr. G. E. Mitton's coming book, "Fire and Tow," which Messrs. Hutchinson will publish early in the spring.

The series of stories "The Brotherhood of the Seven Kings," by Mrs. L. T. Meade and Mr. Robert Eustace, which has appeared in the Strand Magazine, has been dramatized by the authors and Mr. Max Elgin for production on the London stage.

Owing to numerous engagements, Mr. Richard Marsh has been unable to finish, as he had hoped, the revision of his novel, "Ada Vernham, Actress." The book will, however, be ready for publication in the autumn, by Mr. John Long. "Curios," the author's last novel, has run to a fourth edition.

George Augustus Sala's last novel, "Margaret Forster," with a preface by Mrs. Sala, published posthumously as a six-shilling novel by Mr. Fisher Unwin, will shortly appear at two-and-six.

Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall are publishing a new volume of poems called "English Roses," by F. Harold Williams.

Mr. Hilaire Belloc's "Life of Dante" will be published early in March by Messrs. James Nisbet and Co.

Mr. C. G. Leland ("Hans Breitmann") is issuing the book already mentioned in Literature, which promises to be of considerable interest, bearing the title, "Have You a Strong Will?" Mr. Redway is the publisher.

"The Resources of the Sea; or, An Inquiry into the Experiments of Trawling and the Closure of Areas," is the title of a work of Professor McIntosh, which will shortly be issued by Messrs. Clay.

PUBLISHER AND AUTHOR.

The criticisms of "A Publisher" on Sir Walter Besant's "The Pen and the Book" have naturally provoked a lively discussion in our correspondence columns. To begin with, of course, the author of the work has defended his views, and maintained the accuracy of his facts and figures with his usual point and vigour. Mr. Herbert Spencer has contributed an interesting letter detailing his own methods of publishing, and offering, in his own person, at least one successful example of the "commission" system. Experts on both sides have joined in the debate, and not always to support the views of the class which they represent. In fact, the whole subject has, we think, been fairly well threshed out; and whatever of solid gain that process has yielded has now been spread before the readers of this Review. Perhaps the most judicial-minded of the contributions which have reached us is that which we publish herewith over the signature of "One who Knows." Its impartiality of tone, indeed, is astonishing when one considers the recorded experience of the writer in his dealings with "the trade." The gist of his summing up of the controversy is apparently that there is not much amiss in the relations between author and publisher if they would only make up their minds not to expect too much of each other. Let it be granted, says our correspondent, that a publisher is not a philanthropist, but a business man anxious to do the best for himself, and therefore not incapable of framing an agreement in which he has not devoted his chief attention to the author's interests; let it be further granted that he sometimes submits unsatisfactory and one-sided agreements, and sometimes takes secret profits, and that the author on his side is not always a paying speculation to his publisher, or well enough versed in the details of the business to protect his own interests. Let these postulates be conceded, "and the war between publishers and their authors," concludes the writer, "could be easily put an end to."

Our correspondent, we fear, is too sanguine. Surely these concessions have all been made long since by every sensible and competent debater of the question. Publishers have admitted them so far as they tell against publishers; Sir Walter Besant himself has never hesitated to accept them so far as they affect the author. But, unfortunately, it is round the interpretation of our correspondent's "sometimes" that the war is still likely to continue raging. There are black sheep in every flock, admit the members of the class attacked; but then, we ask, what is their proportion to the white? If they are really but the merest handful, why trouble about them, or at any rate why trouble about them so much? Surely, against a small disreputable minority of publishers the Author's Society and "The Pen and the Book" together might be left to protect the inexperienced and unbusinesslike author. But it is quite clear that Sir Walter Besant does not think or reckon them a small minority—perhaps does not account them a minority at all. Indeed, the presumption from his writing is that he does not. The formal exception to his censures which he is wont to make in favour of "respectable" publishing houses leave the impression that they are not the rule but the exception; while the very persistency with which, for many years past, he has warned his younger and less experienced literary brethren against the malpractices of publishers can only be explained on the assumption that those against whom the author requires to be protected are, in his opinion, not the exception but the rule.

And, singularly enough, we might almost draw the same inference as to his own opinion from the observations of our correspondent of to-day. For cheerful as is the optimism with which, in the passage above referred to, he regards the "war" between the publishers and their authors, the earlier part of his letter was devoted to an expression of incredulous astonishment at the good fortune of another of our correspondents, Mr. E. H. Cooper, in his dealings with the publishing trade, and to a comparison therewith of his own very different experiences. "I have had dealings," he says, "with rather more firms than he, as my work covers a larger field. And the results have been much as might have been expected. In three cases I have been treated straightforwardly. That is to say, I have not had either to complain of my bargains or the manner in which the contracts, so far as the publishers were concerned, have been carried out. In the five other cases I have had the greatest difficulty (though three of the firms are well known and long established) in getting accurate or promptly rendered accounts such as one has a right to expect from partners with a controlling interest in a transaction. In two cases I have not succeeded in getting the money due to me until my solicitor's letters brought the offenders to a sense of their position. In one instance I detected fraudulent accounts, in another I found that many more copies had been printed of the work than were accounted for to me when royalty was reckoned." Five unsatisfactory publishers, two of them dishonest, out of eight, is surely a rather discouraging proportion, and presents a startling contrast to the statistics furnished by our earlier correspondent, who not only has "had business dealings with six firms of publishers" to his own complete satisfaction, but is able to assure us that his own experiences are "those of all his acquaintances without exception." He has not, in his own person, come across one publisher who "tried any of these ingeniously fraudulent tricks" upon him, and he has "never met a writer, man or woman, who has encountered them." We can hardly help concluding from such an extraordinary conflict of testimony as here confronts us that neither witness's experience can fairly claim to be representative; and that Mr. Cooper has been as exceptionally fortunate in his dealings with publishers as "One Who Knows" was singularly unlucky in his.

Where the true mean is to be found we have absolutely no data for determining; but we have little doubt, for our own part, that the case of Mr. Cooper lies considerably nearer to it than that of "One Who Knows." Wholesale accusations of dishonesty, or of something not easily distinguishable from dishonesty, against a body of men engaged in a particular business—for, in spite of the conventional exception made in favour of a few of them, these accusations must be regarded as wholesale ones—have the stamp of exaggeration impressed upon them by the very laws of probability themselves. The publishing business could not continue to exist, and certainly it would not be able to find its inexhaustible supply of victims among the literary class, if the relations between the two were really of such a character as we are asked to believe. It is quite possible that some of the practices held up, and legitimately so, to reprobation as inequitable to authors may have established themselves in the dealings of upright and reputable publishing houses as "customs of trade." That, however, would be an abuse not confined to this particular branch of commerce. Use and wont have a marvellous power of blinding men of business to the ethical aspect of any well-established commercial usage; and there is nothing in the particular industry of book-producing which seems specially calculated to purge the moral vision of the producer as with "euphrasy and rue." But from laxity of this kind to deliberate and systematic attempts to over-reach, if not actually to defraud, every author of whose inexperience a publisher can take advantage is an inordinately long step. We do not say that Sir Walter Besant exactly takes it; but the comprehensive sweep of some of his sentences too often, we think, creates the impression that he does; and the sense of injustice which this naturally awakens among the class assailed by him predisposes them to resent even his reasonable criticisms. He also seems to us a little apt to confound a hard bargain with an act of dishonesty, and to demand an amount of consideration and generosity from the publisher in his dealings with a young author which is not looked for in the dealings of men with each other in any other species of contract. It is true that the young author's position vis-à-vis of the publisher is, or was, a comparatively powerless one, but the Society which Sir Walter Besant so ably represents has done valuable service in enabling the latter to hold his own, and will no doubt do more yet. It would be a pity if he should mar the completeness of this good work by injustice and exaggeration.

The "field for modern verse," which Mr. Stephen Phillips claims to have discovered, and which he delineates for the benefit of the readers of the Dome, appears to us to be somewhat lacking in precision of outline. After noting that the general picture of a world beyond the grave, which is gradually usurping the modern imagination, is not far removed from the scheme of Dante, and that "in communications made through trance or by the governed hand" we are again permitted to view realms of darkness, of ice, of twilight, of glory, he goes on to point out the transcendent difference between the medieval and the modern conception—that "whereas Dante imagined a definite place of darkness, or fire, or beauty to which the soul repaired, we are now shown that the soul creates its own atmosphere, environment, and scenery." Thus the soul of the self-wrapped King or statesman whose intellect has reduced the world to a December bareness sits freezing among dazzling bergs and brilliant snow. In like manner the sensualist and the sot surround themselves with their own night, the murderer and the fanatic kindle their own flame. On the other hand we see the purified human spirit "emerging by his own will from a self-created night to a self-created Elysium, his surroundings and atmosphere" continually changing and corresponding to the soul itself, and so "an eternal progress upwards, from beauty to beauty, splendour to splendour, bliss to bliss."

This, though a striking picture of the new "field for modern verse," is surely, also, a little vague. It does not, at first sight, quite show how the poet of the future is to derive assistance from the fact that the soul creates its own atmosphere; for in dealing with the souls of other people the poet will presumably have to call upon his own imagination, just as much as Dante had to call upon his. Perhaps, however—though we hope not—there is a "mediumistic" significance underlying Mr. Phillips' speculations. Such expressions as "the trance" and the "governed hand" appear to indicate that this is the case, and that the poet of the future is not to begin writing until after a "preliminary canter"—if the irreverence of the metaphor may be excused us—with the "planchette."

If that is so, all we can say is that the spirits will have to develop a considerably larger share of the poetic faculty than they have hitherto displayed. With the single and doubtful exception of certain verses by the late Mr. Thomas Lake Harris the quality of their "poetic" utterances has been beneath contempt.

A meeting was held at Toronto, on February 6, for the purpose of founding a Canadian Society of Authors. The idea is a good one; but a great deal depends upon the application of it, and this particular Society scarcely seems to have been founded under the most promising auspices. The association is alleged to have been really organized by publishers for the purpose of demanding, in the name of authors, an amendment of Canadian Copyright Law on the lines of the abortive measure of 1889; and this view certainly derives support from the reports of the debate in the Toronto Globe. We read, for example, that the chairman, the Hon. George W. Ross, made certain proposals for the advantage of Canadian printers, and that a committee was appointed to draft a memorandum on the subject. The Globe proceeds:—

Mr. Haultain wanted to move that the Committee be instructed to inquire how the suggestions of Mr. Ross would benefit Canadian authors. Mr. Ross ruled the motion out of order. Mr. Haultain appealed against the ruling, but Mr. Bain moved the adjournment of the meeting, and this was carried.

This is a somewhat singular ending for a first meeting of a society assembled to charge itself with the protection of literary property.

The article on "Canadian Copyright" recently published in Literature, was read to the meeting by Mr. Haultain, who thought the views expressed therein just, and it was endorsed by Dr. Goldwin Smith as "deserving careful consideration." But we must demur to the statement of the Globe that "this dealt with the matter largely from the point of view of the British publisher." Our article treated the subject not from the point of view of the publishers of any country, but from that of the authors of all countries. What we pointed out was that separate Copyright legislation for Canada would damage authors all over the world for the benefit of the Canadian printers. Canadian authors have, perhaps, more to lose by such legislation than any others. In the Dominion itself they would hardly acquire any better protection than they enjoy at present; while they would be in imminent danger of losing all the benefit which they derive from the adhesion of Canada to the Berne Convention.

Speaking of Canada reminds us of the Canadian Magazine, a very readable periodical. Its contents are varied and intelligent, and the February issue has a capitally illustrated article on the birthplace of Gray's "Elegy." But in this effete and decadent old country its chief attraction is its cheery optimism. Canadian actors and actresses seem to be something quite out of the common; while "Canadian newspapers are, on the whole, unsurpassed in the world." Moreover, when Canadian editors are compared with their brethren in America and England, "the average of intelligence and insight—if we may be pardoned for saying so—is considerably higher." He would, indeed, be a morose critic who would grudge pardon to so delightfully naïve a remark, especially when he contemplates the forty portraits of editors, whose modesty, we are told, the editor of the magazine found it "a huge task" to overcome. If we must to some extent discount these genial utterances, it is certainly matter for congratulation that, in the two great countries formed by the expansion of England—Australasia and Canada—journalism of the highest class, trustworthy and broad in outlook, should have flourished abundantly. It is, perhaps, the most hopeful earnest of a true Imperial Literature.

The tradition of Latin quotation is, as a correspondent points out elsewhere, preserved in the scholarly "Blackwood," which, however, does not, in its February issue, avoid one very familiar misquotation. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman said, a week or two ago, that "one is not allowed in these days to quote even the least recondite piece of Latin." With that apology for the obscurity of a learned language, the Liberal leader risked the quotation, "mutato nomine de te fabula narratur"; and a little while afterwards Mr. Asquith, a Balliol scholar, without any apology at all, boldly ventured upon "solvitur ambulando." No one but a second Mr. Gladstone will, as he did in the Bradlaugh debate, ever again quote six consecutive lines of Lucretius to the House of Commons, and no one but he was capable of so great an implied compliment to its culture.

It was not a really apt quotation—it was not necessary to quote Lucretius at length to illustrate the agnosticism of the present day—nor can it compare for an instant with Pitt's famous reference, in the slavery debate, to the morning sun shining through the windows of the House. The quotation proper should be terse, surprisingly apt, and not too familiar even to scholars. All others in common use have practically lost all connexion with their context and their original, and are no longer quotations. The only matter for scholars is to prevent an uncultured generation from misusing them. We remember a worthy city man describing some trucks which got loose at a railway station and ran down an incline. "Down they went!" said he, "Ipse dixit! Right down the hill!" Even the House of Commons, if it quotes no longer, would not allow its members to misquote.

A History of the Colonization of Africa by Alien Races. By Sir Harry H. Johnston, K.C.B. With 8 Maps by the Author and J. G. Bartholomew. 7½ x 5 in., xii. + 319 pp. Cambridge, 1899. University Press. 6/-

Sir Harry Johnston has an unusually wide experience of Africa. As Consul in the Oil Rivers, as Commissioner of British Central Africa, and now as Consul-General at Tunis, his official work has brought him into touch with widely-varied types of the African; and his explorations in the country of the Great Lakes have qualified him to write at first hand upon the less-known parts of that continent. What is more, he has naturally a picturesque touch. But he has so conceived his subject that the book, although valuable as a work of reference, will hardly take a high place as literature. It summarizes like an official précis, and subtracts from all narrative the details that give life and colour. With the utmost desire not to disparage a man who has done so much valuable work, we cannot say that this book is likely to attract general readers. Sheer curiosity carries us through the first chapter, which describes the movements of coloured races in the conquest of Africa, and indicates the source and diffusion of the great Bantu stock; for this is a fascinating subject of which very little is known. The same may be said of the chapter devoted to the early Portuguese settlement and the conversions effected by them on the Congo in the sixteenth century. But little remains in the mind except a confused string of names and dates. No relief is given to the more important facts and nowhere is there any attempt to show the effect produced by colonization on the natives.

The one really interesting thing that emerges from the narrative is the fact that European influence may be traced in many parts of Africa where white men are practically or absolutely unknown, by the presence of crops which they imported—for instance, maize, yams, and tobacco. The Portuguese appear to have been in this respect the greatest benefactors. Sir Harry Johnston makes an ingenious point when he suggests that the intimate acquaintance with Mahomedans gained during the Moorish occupation of the peninsula and the surviving familiarity with Arabic were of great assistance to the Portuguese in their dealings with the African. We note, also, that his estimate of the value of the present Portuguese possessions in Africa is high, and in short that he is in no way disposed to speak contemptuously of this race, who are our neighbours on the East Coast, and who might have been our allies on the Congo. Nor does he fall into the common error of undervaluing the Germans as colonists; perhaps for the excellent reason that he has worked with them and beside them in Central Africa. They have set themselves to learn their business with their usual thoroughness, and they are learning it; new and cleanly streets are springing up fast in the towns under their rule; and on the long roll of African explorers many of the greatest names are German.

The best feature in the book is the judgment shown in the supply of maps. No attempt has been made at detailed cartography, and to follow the history a good atlas is indispensable; but several charts illustrate in the most admirable way general principles; one, for instance, shows the diffusion of Mahomedanism, another marks the main slave trade centres and routes, and the most interesting of all indicates the "colonizability of Africa" by painting the map in different colours; the conclusion to be drawn from which is that we hold an immense proportion of the relatively small part of Africa available for European settlement. These maps are the most suggestive things in a useful but not, on the whole, suggestive book.

Roman Canon Law in the Church of England. Six Essays by Frederic William Maitland. 9 $\frac{3}{4}$ x 6 $\frac{3}{4}$ in., viii. + 184 pp. London, 1898. Methuen. 7/6

Professor Maitland has embarked on a bold adventure: nothing less than to upset the conclusion of a learned and reverend Royal Commission on a subject supposed to be specially within their competence. In 1883 the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission stated, as matter of historical fact (and on this matter no dissenting opinion is recorded), that, even before the Reformation "the canon law of Rome, although always regarded as of great authority in England, was not held to be binding on the [English ecclesiastical] courts."

Was this really so? Professor Maitland, as a secular lawyer having neither Roman, Anglican, nor any other ecclesiastical or even anti-ecclesiastical interest to serve, holds an inquest and brings the witnesses before us. He examines Lyndwood, known even to common lawyers as the foremost of English canonists, and representing the developed law of the late medieval English Church in the fifteenth century. He examines William of Drogheda, a respectable though less famous Oxford canonist of the thirteenth century, not only a learned man but a keen practitioner. He follows the lines of medieval controversy and compromise between Church and State, noting what were the effective arguments on either side. He considers the legal theory of punishing obstinate heretics, and the exact point in dispute between Henry II. and Becket as to the functions of spiritual and secular jurisdiction. As he does this, we become aware of a cumulative body of reasons not merely throwing doubt on the statement of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission, but showing that it is directly contrary to the evidence. If Professor Maitland is right, the supposed independence of the English National Church before the Reformation is no better than a post-Reformation Anglican legend. At present we do not see where or how his argument can be proved wrong.

It is common knowledge that English Kings and Parliaments interfered, over and over again, with the enforcement in England of the law of the Church, or what that law was alleged to be by its official representatives, on the ground that the spiritual authorities, judicial or administrative, were exceeding their due bounds, "putting their sickle into another man's crop," as was currently said. But that is not the question. The point is whether English ecclesiastical authority, within the sphere left free to it, and apart from controversies with secular powers, ever claimed an inherent discretion to refuse obedience to the legislative or judicial authority of the Pope. What Professor Maitland finds is that no such discretion is even hinted at by English canonists, that no King ever asserted it against a Pope, or attempted to get it exercised by the English Bishops (though this would have been an obvious way out of many difficulties), that there is no trace of its exercise in fact; in short, that nobody ever heard of it before the days of Anglican apologetic literature. The Pope's constitutions are treated without hesitation by canonists in England as they are treated in Germany or Italy, that is, as binding law, the law of the Church universal. As the Roman Emperor was the supreme judge and legislator in the empire, so is the Pope in the Church. Nay, more; the Pope has a direct and immediate jurisdiction everywhere as "universal ordinary." He can, and does, appoint his judges delegate, if he thinks fit, to hear an ecclesiastical cause in the first instance, thereby superseding the local court. William of Drogheda will advise us to get a papal mandate of this kind, if we have a cause of any importance. It costs time and money to begin with, but it is cheaper in the end than the regular course of procedure, with an ultimate appeal to Rome in the background; and we may get better judges—absolutely or from our own point of view—than the local ordinary would be. What law, then, will papal delegates, appointed to sit in England, administer? A particularist English law, "received" by English clerics who claim a right not to receive decrees and constitutions of the Holy See which may mislike them? Hardly. Such a thing is credible only to that sort of modern Anglicans who have forgotten that Rome has discipline as well as doctrine.

William Lyndwood, again, knows nothing of any reservations or exceptions to the Pope's authority. Not only the Pope but the legate is the archbishop's superior; it savours of impertinence even for the archbishop to order that a legate's constitutions shall be observed, unless it is a mere "executive precept" by way of reminder. The Ecclesiastical Courts Commission called this a ratification supplying "the sanction of the National Church." Lyndwood very distinctly did not. The laws and the law-books to which Lyndwood refers as authoritative are not peculiarly English, and often are not English at all. Lyndwood, in his own official proceedings, followed the forms and practice of the Roman Court. The learned and reverend Commissioners' position would have appeared to him a very serious heresy. Clerks, and sometimes Bishops, might grumble at the Pope's mandates; but it was as the subaltern grumbles against the superior's discretion, not as men who claim independence protest against usurpation.

It is really quite consistent with all this that claims of the Church against the State for immunity from secular jurisdiction, and the like, may be found now and again outstanding in a kind of limbo. They are like the claims of Spain in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries to universal dominion in the New World. The Church cannot enforce them, and will not openly withdraw them, and the Pope winks at the non-observance of points which he knows it would be disastrous to insist on. Some things are, strictly speaking, encroachments on the clergy's rights, but per patientiam tolerantur; and so we have constitutions—provincial constitutions at any rate—which in paucis servantur, and do not enter into a practising canonist's consideration. Submission to the de facto power of the King's secular judges may not have been always unwilling. Probably many of the English clergy had come even in the thirteenth century to think the King's yoke lighter than the Pope's. But the submission was nevertheless made with saving clauses and protests. There could be no overt supporting of the Crown against the Holy See. Bishops might think, and in extreme cases even say, that a Pope was abusing his canonical right to dispose of English benefices; they could not deny the right or take part in the secular legislation prohibiting its exercise in England. This or that Pope may be a bad shepherd, but the sheep are his from any orthodox canonical point of view.

There is another topic on which Mr. Maitland lays no stress, and which probably was of no great importance in practice: but it is relevant as far it goes, and may help to account for later misunderstanding. It is a familiar principle of Roman law that even express decrees of a supreme legislator may lose their validity by disuse. "Desuetude" is a known term in Scots law since civilian theories and terminology have been accepted in Scotland. The Common Law, and therefore the average educated Englishman, does not know it. A medieval canonist might perfectly well discuss the question whether a particular canon had become of none effect by "desuetude" in a particular local jurisdiction, without in any degree disputing the original authority to make and publish it, or justifying the original disobedience. A modern Englishman can easily confound this with the quite different position of maintaining that the rule in question could at no time claim to be obeyed in this country. However, the examples commonly adduced in support of Anglican particularism are mostly examples of the temporal power restraining the application of ecclesiastical law and dealing with the matter in its own way, which, as already said, is nothing to the purpose.

Mr. Maitland's essay on "Henry II. and the Criminous Clerks" is not without bearing on his general thesis, but stands apart and has its own interest. He does not admit the current view that Henry II. wanted to take into his own hands the whole trial and punishment of clerks who committed felonies. According to Mr. Maitland, what Henry II. really offered the Bishops was this: "A clerk charged with crime must plead in my Court so that we may know what he is charged with, and whether he defends himself. Then you can take him and try him in your own Court; but I must be free to watch the proceedings, otherwise there might be collusion and even escapes. If he is condemned, you will degrade him and send him back to the lay Court, no longer a clerk, but a common felon deserving the rigour of the law; and we shall know what to do with him." For this position there was plausible authority, while that which is commonly attributed to the King would have been outrageous, and not only English Bishops but the Pope would have been bound to resist it to the utmost.

THE LITERATURE OF JAPAN.

A History of Japanese Literature. By W. G. Aston, C.M.G., D.Lit. 8×5½ in., 402 pp. London, 1890.

Heinemann. 6/-

[By SIR EDWIN ARNOLD.]

In this contribution to the series of "Short Histories of the Literatures of the World" something much more has been accomplished than to augment and enrich an interesting collection. Justice has been done for the first time to the neglected or, rather, never yet comprehended subject of the prose and verse of Japan. The arts, manufactures, and industries of that wonderful and gifted country have received ample attention, but no one hitherto has had the courage and the competency combined to deal comprehensively with her literature. In saying this I am not forgetting the admirable labours towards that end of Mr. Basil Chamberlain, Mr. Lafcadio Hearn, and others. But such high authorities would be the first to agree that nothing hitherto existed out of the vernacular which could help the inquirer to survey Japanese letters from their ancient origins to the present time, so as accurately to inform intelligent minds ignorant of the language, or to assist those who know something of Dai Nippon and her ways and speech, towards formulating and harmonizing their knowledge. This is what Mr. Aston has here effected, in a volume of unique erudition, wide research, clear discrimination, and excellent design; while, by such an achievement, he has wrought a memorable service not only to those interested in Japan and Japanese studies, but to the world of letters at large, in the midst of which he now gives to her literature an intelligible, established, and, as I think, a very honourable place.

Forty years ago, be it remembered, no Englishman and very few Continental scholars had so much as read a Japanese book. Those who have read any will know how well justified Mr. Aston is in dwelling on the difficulties of translating and representing them. Few or none among such could be better qualified than the author, whose ample acquaintance with the language, evinced by many useful works, has been supplemented by long residence in the land, part of the time in a high diplomatic station. Frankly, it is possible for no man—except, perhaps, Mr. Lafcadio Hearn—perfectly to transfer the subtle characteristics of Japanese poetry into another tongue; and you must learn enough Japanese to understand Tanka or Uta if you will catch its inner charm, its evanescent fragrance, its native grace. The next best thing is to read carefully as good a work as this, which will, in the first place, astonish many a reader by showing him how far-dating, various, rich, and special Japanese literature has been, and how well worth study it is for the sake of what it contains, and yet more for what it is likely to develop into in the future.

The oldest relics of genuine native verse are the Kojiki and Nihongi. The Shinto liturgy, called Norito, is mainly in prose. Mr. Aston rejects the inordinate antiquity ascribed to some of these, and thinks the Kojiki may at farthest belong to the sixth or seventh century of our era. It is the archaeologist rather than the literary man who will linger over these questions. One is sufficiently reminded of the vast background which exists to "Things Japanese" when one finds a well-marked literary period beginning at Nara A.D. 710. The Mikado lived there then. He entertained Kataribe or reciters, from whose rhapsodies, probably, the Kojiki itself was compiled, written in a motley of Chinese and Japanese. But that same Nara Age did better than collect or re-edit the Kojiki, which is dull stuff of the Oasianic type. It really originated or vivified true Japanese poetry, which never had any love or taste for epics or long didactic, historical, or philosophical productions. It is essentially lyrical—and lyrical in its own swift, brief, impressionist way; so that the genius of the land may be said to live in those tanka, uta, and naga-uta, of which an anthology was made in the ninth century, called Manyōshū, or “Collection of a Thousand Leaves.” There are really 4,000 separate pieces, the vast majority being little poems of thirty-one syllables each, and generally of five lines, and these are still the classic standard, the unchanging canon for the best Japanese poetry. The Western critic will smile at the upbuilding a national school upon sparkles of verselets of five lines alternating from five to seven syllables. But, as has been said, the quick fancy of Japan dislikes prolixity, and many of these Tanka say in a breath more than could be said by dull wits in a thousand. Next, bear in mind that practically you cannot rhyme in pure Japanese. In Chinese you can, but every word in Japanese ends with a vowel, and there are thus but five rhymes to be had, which means monotony. Happily, the Nara Court, and the influences which succeeded, restricted the Japanese muse to the employment of pure Japanese words in verse. These little tanka and uta, therefore, saved the language, which in prose and colloquy was already threatened with being swamped by Chinese vocables and phrases. Moreover, there is no quantity and no accent in Japanese—all syllables are equally pronounced—so that the laws of Western verse could find no footing. Briefly, the exquisite, delicate, suggestive Tanka resulted from the literary conditions, and has survived till now, and will survive, for the present Mikado gives splendid prizes yearly for the same thing which was in vogue at Nara in King Alfred's time, and the verse jewels of the Manyōshū, Kokinshū, and Hakuninshū are still nationally universal favourites and models. Well has Mr. Aston written:—

It may be thought that in the compass of thirty-one syllables and with the other limitations to which the poet in Japan is subject, nothing of much value can be the result. This, however, is far from being the case. Although no great qualities can be claimed for the Tanka, it must be admitted that the Japanese poets have made the most of their slender resources. It is wonderful what felicity of phrase, melody of versification, and true sentiment can be compressed within these narrow limits. In their way nothing can be more perfect than some of these little poems. They remind us of those tiny carvings known to us as Netsuke, in which exquisite skill of workmanship is displayed in fashioning figures an inch or two in height, or of those sketches where the Japanese artist has managed to produce a truly admirable effect by a few dexterous strokes of the brush.

Both these comparisons are just, because, while some of these poemlets have been carved out of cold fancy with all the pains and patience of the ivory cutter, others, as you can feel and see, have sprung into being like those wonderful sketches which Hokusai and the great impressionists would dash upon paper with one or two brushes full of Indian ink. In the tanka, as in the sketches and Kakemono, there is oftentimes the same instant and magical mastery of line. The curve of bamboo leaf, of stork's wing, or of fishes' fleeting silver falls into fact as it had to fall—and so the word, the fancy, the image flashes into its place in these charming miniatures of song.

Mr. Aston will also tell the astonished student of so strangely new, though antique, art, all about “pillow words” and “pivot words.” These are embellishments and graces—not indispensable, but greatly admired—of the tanka; strange devices to make them handier, and more capricious. Very good examples, cleverly interpreted, will be found in this volume, which is indeed wisely rich in extracts. Mr. Aston gives abundant illustrations of the all-pervading poemlet of which I am speaking. I myself will, by way of variety, adduce one written by the hand of her Majesty the present Empress, which I am so happy as to possess:—

Yoshino-yama
Mine no Kasumi wa
Tachi nagara
Kawakami tooki
Chidori naku nari

There you have a tanka, the model and standard of Japanese poetry, and you must set it down to my incompetence, not to her

Imperial Majesty's taste and skill, if this be the most and best my Western pen can make of its grace:—

From the crest of Yoshino.
When the mist lifts, far below,
Along the stream
Is heard the scream
Of plovers crying ho-ho-ho!

It is a notable fact, as mentioned by the author,

That a very large and important part of the best literature which Japan has produced was written by women. A good share of the Nara poetry is of feminine authorship. In the Heian period the women took a still more conspicuous part in maintaining the honour of the native literature. The two greatest works which have come down to us from this time are both by women. This was, no doubt, partly due to the absorption of the masculine intellect in Chinese studies, and to the contempt of the stronger sex for such frivolous pursuits as the writing of poetry and romances. But there was still a more effective cause. The position of women in ancient Japan was very different from what it afterwards became when Chinese ideas were in the ascendant. The Japanese of this early period did not share the feeling common to most Eastern countries, that women should be kept in subjection, and, as far as possible, in seclusion. Feminine chieftains are frequently mentioned in the old histories, and several even of the Mikados were women. Many instances might be quoted of Japanese women exercising an influence and maintaining an independence of conduct quite at variance with our preconceived notions of the position of women in the East. It is this which gives their literary work an air of freedom and originality which it would be vain to expect in the writings of inmates of a harem; and the fact that the Heian literature was largely the work of women no doubt accounts partly for its gentle, domestic character.

It is quite impossible, of course, to follow Mr. Aston through-out his lucid and serviceable review of the course of Japanese literature from these earlier periods downwards. With a marvellous knowledge and insight the learned author introduces his reader to the vast school of fiction in prose and verse known as the Monogatari, takes him through the “pillow-stories,” Makura-Zōshi, the beginnings of serious history in the Yeiwa and O-Kagami and the Kamakura period of letters, which ended in A.D. 1332. From this to A.D. 1633 was a Dark Age comparatively for Japan, relieved by Kenko-Boshi's remarkable Tsurezure-gusa, which Mr. Aston well appreciates, and the No, or lyrical drama. Then from A.D. 1603 to A.D. 1867 followed that great epoch of the Tokugawa Shogunate, when Japan, apart from the world, revelled in an age of Florentine grace and culture, nursing her genius and her strength for the Meiji, the marvellous revival, and her open entry into the list of powerful civilized States. Countless are the passages of interest in this portion of the author's admirable labour, and he shows how the Haikai rose to favour, to abbreviate even the Tanka, and to let in sometimes illicit Chinese words. Here is a well-known haikai:—

Asagao
Tsurube torarete,
Morai-mizu!

Literally, “Having had my well-bucket taken away by the convolvuli—gift-water!” The meaning is this: “The poetess Chiyo, having gone to her well one morning to draw water, found that some tendrils of the Asagao, the morning-glory, had twined themselves around the rope. As a poetess and a woman of taste she could not bring herself to disturb the dainty blossoms. So, leaving her own well to the convolvuli, she went and begged water of a neighbour. A pretty little vignette, all expressed in five words.”

Then we come down to recent days, and find historical novels, romantic novels, and ample works of fiction, with names great and famous throughout Dai Nippon, though unknown here, such as Kiōden, Tanehiko, and especially Bakin. Nine out of ten Japanese would style Bakin their most gifted modern writer. In 1805 he published his masterpiece, “Yumibari-Tsuki” (“The Bend of the New Moon's Bow”), albeit his “Hakkenden,” a Story of the Eight Dogs, is more read; but people of nice taste must not peruse Ikku's “Hizakurige,” which means “Knee of Chestnut Horse.”

Readers of Mr. Aston's excellent work must learn for themselves how about 1879 Western literature began to creep into the Japanese book shops by translations, Lord Lytton's "Ernest Maltravers," being, oddly enough, the first so to appear. Newspapers have arisen and spread afar, and literature of all kinds is more than ever flourishing. A new style of poetry is growing up, rather on the type of the Naga-uta, and we are glad to conclude with the subjoined hopeful words from Mr. Aston :—

The conditions of the present day are more favourable than those of any previous time to the production of good poetry in Japan. The ordinary language, by the more thorough assimilation of its Chinese element, has gained considerably in fitness for poetical purposes, and its phonetic capabilities are now appreciably greater than in the time of the Manyōshū. Still more important considerations are the great stimulus which the national life has received from the introduction of European ideas, and the attention which has been recently directed to the poetry of Europe, especially of England. The credit of being the first to recognize the advantages which the Japanese poet might derive from a study of European models belongs to Toyama Masakazu, a Professor of the Imperial University, Yatabe Riōkichi and Inuye Tetsujirō, whose joint publication, entitled Shintaishisho; or, Poetry in a New Form, marks a new epoch in Japanese verse.

Sufficient, however, has been said to prove how large is the subject, how vast the field, how full of novelty and artistic wealth are the products of the Literature of Japan, which will assuredly owe to Mr. Aston its first formal and adequate introduction to the good opinion and respectful attention of the West. At the same time, I cannot myself believe that the tanka, that dainty jewel in the hair of the Muse of Japan, will ever be discarded while the Samisen is still struck with ivory bachi, and while cherry blossoms deck the spring with rose and silver in that lovely and gentle land. But the chief change for the popular literature of Japan will come on the day when she is wise enough to discard the cumbrous Chinese character of the Honji and its corrupt derivatives Hira-gana and Katakana the Romaji, the romanized type common to the West. That will release the childhood of Japan from the ten years drudgery of learning only some few of the Chinese ideographs, and will open a whole new world of books to the Japanese student. Something will be lost, of course. A tanka written in "Roman" misses the charm of the graceful script which flows like frost crystals from the brush of the Japanese lover or poet. But the gain of the change would be prodigious, and the educational authorities of the land ought to lose no time in recommending and facilitating this immense and indispensable reform.

GREEK PAPYRI.

The study of Palæography is, like golf, a pursuit which to the uninitiated seems to offer very little in the way of entertainment, but which repays its devotees a thousandfold. Just as the pedigree hunter, immersed in musty parchments and spending laborious days in deciphering obscure and remote documents, yet knows something of the zest of the chase as he closes in upon his quarry, so the palæographer enjoys in his favourite occupation that mixture of chance and skill, that alternation of baffling failure and sudden unexpected success which is the essence of true sport. The ardour of pursuit is keenest in the actual work of discovery. The lucky adventurer who first strikes gold in a new country knows no such glow of triumph as the explorer who lights upon a "find" of real importance buried in a heap of rubbish or wrapped round a mummy on the site of some ancient city in the heart of Egypt—some sample of an hitherto unknown classical author, as the orations of Hyperides; or some work supposed to be irretrievably lost, like the Odes of Bacchylides. But the student who stays at home can be an explorer, too. He finds himself under entirely different conditions from those under which he worked fifty, nay twenty, years ago. He need no longer travel abroad to inspect the documents which his more adventurous brethren have unearthed, for photography can now lay upon his desk the treasures stored in the libraries of Vienna, Berlin, Paris, or London. And he is living at a period when the revelation of new papyri is proceeding with startling and unexampled rapidity.

The first discovery of Greek papyri was made at Herculaneum in 1752. Some years later a great mass of them were discovered by natives in Egypt and offered to a dealer. He purchased one out of curiosity and all the rest were burned by the natives, who enjoyed the smell which the flames extracted from them. From 1820 to 1856 discoveries were made from time to time, including some parts of the Iliad and the first instalment of the new Hyperides. In 1877 a new era began, which is now at its height, with the opening up of the Fayyum, followed by the wonderful acquisitions made by Mr. Flinders Petrie in 1889-90. A number of mummy cases which he found at Gurob proved to be encased in a kind of papier-mâché, consisting of papyri coated over with plaster. The documents were evidently taken at random from a rubbish heap, torn and pasted together, and plastered over just as they came, to make a covering for the mummy. This apparently unpromising material, after it had passed through the hands of Professor Mahaffy, forms practically the starting-point of scientific palæography. Since then almost every year has been abundantly fruitful, and we hardly yet know the full value of the rich harvest gleaned by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt in the winter of 1896 at Oxyrhynchus. With some of the recent discoveries, such as Aristotle's Constitution of Athens, the Odes of Bacchylides, and the Logia of our Lord, the public are familiar, but these are only the more striking discoveries among a vast number of others, all of them of great interest and importance.

Mr. F. G. Kenyon's new book, THE PALÆOGRAPHY OF GREEK PAPYRI (Clarendon Press, 10s. 6d.), is an attempt to formulate and classify the new material. It cannot, on the one hand, pretend to any finality, for new evidence is continually pouring in; nor, on the other hand, does it for many purposes displace such a work as Sir E. Maunde Thompson's "Handbook of Greek and Latin Palæography." That book, with its wealth of illustration from Greek and Latin writers, and its popular exposition of the methods of papyrus writing, and of the contents of the more important documents, remains the chief source of instruction for those who begin to investigate the subject. But even during the few years which have passed since its publication so much has happened that it is no longer a complete statement of the data of the science, and its conclusions in some cases need revision. Mr. Kenyon has chosen a narrower subject and goes into it much more closely. He does not touch the vast subject of vellum writing, which was largely used at least as early as the second century of our era, and gradually displaced the papyrus. He is concerned with Greek papyri only, and may be said to be the first to attempt to formulate with scientific accuracy the laws of their interpretation on the basis of the evidence now available. The period covered by papyrus writing is about a thousand years, from the beginning of the third century before Christ to the Arab conquest of Egypt in 640, and it falls into three distinct divisions, in each of which the writing shows definite characteristics—the Ptolemaic, during which Egypt was governed by the Ptolemies, the Roman, after the conquest of Egypt by Augustus, and the Byzantine, from the time of Diocletian to the Arab conquest. Since Sir E. Maunde Thompson wrote his handbook, some gaps in the continuous history of papyrus writing have been filled up, and in particular much additional evidence has been forthcoming as to the first century B.C., and the transition from Ptolemaic to Roman writing.

Almost the whole body of papyri hitherto recovered comes from Egypt. The papyri found at Herculaneum in the last century form an exception, and Mr. Kenyon discusses a question, which previous writers have, we think, passed over, as to the connexion between Greek writing in Egypt and elsewhere. His conclusion is that the distinction between contemporary Greek papyrus writing in different countries is not likely to be, and, so far as the evidence goes, is not, greater than the distinction to be found between medieval Latin MSS. transcribed in different countries at the same date. He is prepared, therefore, to use the Herculaneum papyri as a help to the classification of those found in Egypt, and fortunately the date of the former can be fixed with some accuracy. The main problem which engages the palæographer in dealing with the mass of material now before him is, of course, the assignment of dates. The documents which chance has preserved for us in one corner of the world do not contribute much to our knowledge of history. The bulk of them consist partly of writings of a literary, scientific, or theological character, partly of notes, accounts, and other documents bearing on official or personal life. To the former it is clearly of the greatest importance that a date should be assigned; and the latter are often of great service in assigning it. It is true that these two classes, the literary and the non-literary, are not, as a rule, written alike; the one represents the careful book hand, the other the casual writing of common people. But there are certain broad similarities between them; and the non-literary papyri, which are many of them business documents, have the especial advantage of being generally dated. Moreover, a knowledge of the non-literary writings is indispensable in the case of papyri written on both sides. Here again, Mr. Kenyon gives the completest and most accurate statement of the rule the palæographer must follow. The papyrus consists of two layers of fibres placed at right angles to each other. The side intended for writing is, of course, that in which the fibres run horizontally (the recto). Speaking generally, when writing appears on the other side (the verso), it is almost certainly later than the writing on the recto, and if one of them is a non-literary writing, of which we know the date, it goes far to settle, approximately, the date of the other. It is not often that the date of a papyrus can be settled by external evidence as in the case of Pap. CCCLIV. in the British Museum—a petition addressed to a certain Prefect of Egypt, whose date we know from other sources. An instance like this forms a starting-point for induction. It at once fixes approximately the date of the earliest extant copy of part of the Odyssey which closely resembles it in character, and guides us in fixing the date of many others. The form of the letters and the style of writing employed are the chief factors in solving the question of date, but there are many things which complicate the reasoning, such as the use of archaic letters—like those used in inscriptions (epigraphic)—by an uneducated person, like the writer of the well-known “Curse of Artemisia,” at Vienna, which, we now know, by other evidence, to have been written long after trained scribes wrote freely and easily upon papyrus.

Through the maze of problems such as these Mr. Kenyon is a very exact guide. He gives us many photographic reproductions of papyri of different periods, with a full account of their characteristics, and draws clearly but cautiously the conclusions which the present state of our knowledge seems to justify. A catalogue of literary papyri is given in an appendix. The book is one which the student who keeps in touch with contemporary palæographic research urgently needed, and its author's sound scholarship renders it in every way worthy to meet the want.

THREE BOOKS ON THE FAR EAST.

The Philippine Islands and Their People. By Dean C. Worcester. 9½ × 6½ in., xix. + 529 pp. London and New York, 1898. Macmillan. 15/-

The New Far East. By Arthur Diósy. Illustrated by Hubota Bersen. 8½ × 5½ in., xvi. + 374 pp. London, 1898. Cassell. 16/-

China in Decay. A Handbook to the Far Eastern Question. By Alexis Krausse. 9 × 5½ in., ix. + 400 pp. London, 1898. Chapman & Hall. 12/-

Of these three volumes the first deserves far the most serious notice. Long before any one ever dreamt of seeing the Stars and Stripes float over the Philippine Islands, Professor Worcester, of the University of Michigan, spent several years in exploring the archipelago in the cause of science. His special branch of study was zoology, and between 1887 and 1893 he and his friends visited the whole of the archipelago, “remaining in each island long enough to get a fairly representative collection of its birds and mammals.” Being at the same time a shrewd and intelligent observer, he improved his opportunities to lay in a large store of information with regard to the habits and customs of the people and the general resources of the country. “At that time,” he remarks, “nothing could have seemed to us more improbable than that the information which we were gathering would ever be of use to our Government or of interest to the general public.” Since then, much has happened, and while one of the party, Dr. Bourns, has been assigned to duty on the staff of the American Commander-in-Chief, Professor Worcester has written for the benefit of his fellow-countrymen and of all those interested in the Far East the story of their sojourn in the islands—a story which forms a very valuable contribution to the world's knowledge of the Philippines.

Professor Worcester carefully eschews politics, though his sagacious and temperate remarks as to the relations of the future rulers of the Philippines with the Church which has been the real ruler of the islands up till now show that he is fully alive to the gravity of the political problems to be solved. The historical retrospect with which he opens has been chiefly borrowed, as he himself frankly states, from Mr. Foreman's excellent book, “The Philippine Islands.” But what he has to say with regard to the rebellion of 1896 is worth quoting, as it was that rebellion which, in a great measure, prepared the way for the recent operations of the American forces:—

I, for one, was not surprised when the news came that several provinces were in rebellion, for during the years 1890-1893, while travelling in the archipelago, I everywhere heard the mutterings that go before a storm. It was the old story; compulsory military service; taxes too heavy to be borne, and imprisonment or deportation with confiscation of property for those who could not pay them; no justice except for those who could afford to buy it; cruel extortion by the friars in the more secluded districts; wives and daughters ruined; the marriage ceremony too costly a luxury for the poor; the dead refused burial without payment of a substantial sum in advance; no opportunity for education; little encouragement for industry and economy, since to acquire wealth meant to become a target for officials and friars alike; these and a hundred other wrongs had goaded natives and half-castes until they were stung to desperation.

His judgment carries all the more weight in that he shows himself singularly free from any personal animus against the Spaniards and takes pleasure in recording the many instances of kindness and friendly assistance rendered to him and his party by Spanish officials as well as residents, though it is quite clear that, had he been so disposed, there were many incidents of a less agreeable nature upon which he might have laid more stress. It is eminently characteristic of the old régime in the Philippine Islands that when the American explorers first arrived there, armed with letters of recommendation to the notorious General Weyler, who was then Governor-General at Manila, they were advised, and, as the event showed, rightly advised, to appeal from his Excellency's non possumus to the good offices of the Archbishop!

Of the immense natural resources with which the archipelago teems Professor Worcester gives in an appendix a detailed enumeration, which is long and varied enough in all conscience to stimulate the enterprise of his fellow-countrymen. But he is by no means inclined to minimize the difficulties that lie before them. According to the Spaniards, seis meses de polvo, seis meses de lodo, seis meses de todo make up the Philippine year, and though not all equally unhealthy the rotation of the seasons seems only to produce a rotation of dangers to the white man's constitution:—

Briefly stated, the facts are as follows:—If one is permanently situated in a good locality, where he can secure suitable food and good drinking water; if he is scrupulously careful as to his diet, avoids excesses of all kinds, keeps out of the sun in the middle of the day, and refrains from severe and long-continued physical exertion—he is likely to remain well, always supposing that he is fortunate enough to escape malarial infection. I knew an old Spaniard who, at the end of a residence of thirty-nine years in the Philippines, was able to boast that he had not been ill a day. He had always been so situated that he could take care of himself, and had done it.

But how is it with the explorer, the engineer, the man who would fell timber, cultivate new ground, or in some other way develop the latent resources of the country? That, as Mr. Kipling so often remarks, is another story. It is likewise a very different story, and after travelling in the provinces for three-and-a-half years I think I may fairly claim to know it.

Another and, perhaps, more unexpected obstacle is the question of good and cheap labour. "The native is a philosopher. He works when obliged to and rests whenever he can get an opportunity. His wants are so few and nature has done so much for him that he finds it possible to rest much of the time." In fact, the native seems more likely to develop into a first-class fighting man than into a first-class labourer, though it must be, of course, rash to generalize with regard to a population of eight millions divided into eighty distinct tribes, each with its own peculiarities, and scattered over 1,200 islands, with a total area about equal to that of the whole of the West Indies. It is of the more savage and unknown tribes of the archipelago that Professor Worcester has most to tell, and his story must appeal as strongly to the lover of adventure and sport as to the student of ethnology. To the former we would recommend the account of how the American explorers tracked and at last killed and for the first time photographed in the flesh the half-mythical timarau, a small but fierce buffalo which abounds in Mindoro, but is apparently only to be found in the thickest jungle of an island significantly designated by the natives as the "white man's grave." Of the warlike tribes amongst whom they ventured the most picturesque perhaps are the Mahomedan Moros of Sulu. A young Sultan who rules, even though merely as a puppet, under so grandiloquent a title as that of Paduca Majasari Malauna Amiril Mauinin Sultan Harun Narrasid, must, in spite of the corrupt Arabic, inevitably bring up memories of the Thousand and One Nights, while the description of the Sultana, who was the real power in the land, vividly recalls that other masterful dowager who holds sway behind the pink walls of the Forbidden City at Peking:—

A Visayan girl by birth, she had been captured by the Moros, and brought to Sulu as a slave. Her beauty had attracted the reigning Sultan, who had fallen in love with her and made her his first wife. She seems not to have been very deeply enamoured of him, however. At all events, she is believed to have accelerated his departure from this life with a large dose of corrosive sublimate. She then married his successor, wearied of him in time, and he, too, died very suddenly. After Harun had been declared Sultan by the Spanish, she sent him an offer of marriage, but he replied that he could not think of accepting it, as he wished to die a natural death. She seemed to have a mania for poisoning people. By some means she learned that we had a stock of corrosive sublimate, and sent to beg some from us. She was a very bright woman, with a decided genius for organization and command, and she planned and carried out a great deal of mischief.

Of the many interesting facts and freaks of natural history with which these pages abound we have only space to quote the following. In the island of Luzon Professor Worcester ascended the still active volcano of Taal and climbed down on to the floor of the great crater:—

There we found something that surprised us greatly. A pair of wagtails had made a nest in a place where the ground was so hot one could hardly bear his hand on it. Instead of building the small, cup-shaped structure which is characteristic of the species, they had heaped up a great pile of dry grass, which must have been gathered outside of the volcano. They were flitting about quite unconcernedly, leaving their four eggs to be hatched by this natural incubator!

The hardships and dangers of all sorts which the professor and his companions encountered and surmounted were neither few nor inconsiderable, but he is evidently one of those who have "heard the East a-calling," and he succeeds without an effort in making the reader share his retrospective enjoyment of experiences which, as he mildly puts it, must often have been distinctly "unpleasant" at the time, but which were well worth undergoing for the sake of the valuable harvest they have yielded to so observant a traveller.

"The New Far East" is too emotional a work to appeal to those who have not personally experienced the charm of Japan, and even those who have may be inclined to resent Mr. Diósy's extravagances of style and manner. He occasionally tries to temper the fervour of his panegyrics with judicious criticism, but he cannot unfortunately either praise or blame without a tendency to rant. He seems to have studied the social life of Koreans and Chinese as well as of Japanese, but, with a considerable show of learning and doubtless much real knowledge, his enthusiasm for Japan lacks the poetic insight of writers like Arthur Knapp or Lafcadio Hearn, and what he has to tell us of the other yellow races is but a pale reflection of Smith's "Chinese Characteristics" and of Mrs. Bishop's admirable work on Korea. His political views with regard to "The New Far East" are rather crudely formed and expressed, though sound enough on the whole. Like many better men, Mr. Diósy is apt to spoil his case by overstating it.

Mr. Alexis Krausse does not appear to have any special qualifications for the task he has undertaken. We doubt even whether he has carefully perused the long list of authorities which he enumerates in "Appendix B." Still, in the earlier chapters of "China in Decay"—i.e., so long as he can draw upon reliable "authorities" for compiling his record of Chinese foreign relations—he is fairly accurate and readable. But when he approaches the more recent phases of the Far Eastern question, and is thrown upon such materials as he can collect from magazine and newspaper literature, the result is not merely superficial and commonplace but absolutely inadequate. For instance, in the chapter entitled "The German Record" no mention whatever is made of Germany's share in the two Anglo-German loans of 1896 and 1898. As Mr. Krausse is equally silent with regard to the Franco-Russian loan of 1895 and altogether ignores the financial situation of the Chinese Empire, he has clearly failed to appreciate one of the most important factors in the international struggle of which Peking has been the centre during the last four years. The Franco-Chinese Convention, concluded at Peking on June 20, 1895, in defiance of British rights and protests, was the first public and visible sign that the days of our unchallenged preponderancy had passed away, yet Mr. Krausse barely alludes to it and does not even take the trouble to look up its exact date for his table of chronological "landmarks." Nor is he always careful to be consistent in the statements which he has compiled from his "authorities." Chang-Chi-Tung figures in one chapter as "an avowed opponent of the English idea," which, if it means anything, means that he is an adversary of progress and reform, whilst in another he is quoted as a type of the few progressive officials "who exhibit a marked desire to introduce foreign ideas into the Chinese arena," and is stated to "have benefited by a Western education"! As a matter of fact, Chang-Chi-Tung is an old conservative of rare personal integrity whose education has been purely Chinese, who hates the idea of foreign ascendancy of any kind in China, but nevertheless realizes the superiority of Western industry and science. Mr. Krausse must really study his "authorities" more carefully and intelligently before he can claim to write "a handbook to the Far Eastern Question."

FOR AUTHORS ONLY.

The Pen and the Book. By Sir Walter Besant. 7½ x 5 in., ix. + 347 pp. London, 1899. Burleigh. 6/-

The greater part of Sir Walter Besant's book deals with the sordid, or commercial, side of literature. This is a branch of the subject which the pugnacious have threshed out in our other columns. Here it is sufficient to glance at Sir Walter Besant's advice to aspirants on the literary side, which, to do him justice, he never confuses with the commercial side, of their vocation.

No one—or hardly any one—is better qualified to advise. Sir Walter Besant has been leader-writer, reviewer, historian, biographer, editor, novelist, and dramatist : and nilil tetigit quod non ornavit is fairly applicable to his case. It remains to be seen whether any of his work is a κρῆμα ἐς δει ; but no one can deny him the title of a good all round man. And he is of those who hold by the old saying that, if a man glorifies his profession, his profession will glorify him. Old soldiers and old sailors may tell us that the service is going to the dogs ; doctors and lawyers may complain that their professions are overcrowded ; manufacturers may tremble at German competition ; and shopkeepers may lament over the cutting of prices by the stores. But there is no analogous pessimism to be detected in Sir Walter Besant. He loves the literary life for its own sake, whether money be made in it or not. He loves it the more because the man who succeeds in it may enjoy "as much social consideration as a Bishop." And he calls us all to it as eloquently, and as earnestly, as the evangelist invites the sinner to forsake the broad and follow the narrow way :—

Come [he writes] if you can : come if you dare. Don't think of making money—there are a thousand chances to one against it ; but if you gain that reasonable measure of success of which I have spoken, you may confidently look forward to leading a happy and a well-filled life : you may influence your generation for good : your mind will be always pleasantly occupied ; you will find the company good, the talk extremely cheerful, and the work always interesting.

That, as the Americans say, is so ; and we are not of those who blame Sir Walter Besant because, as the Americans also put it, he "gives the show away." The fear, expressed in some quarters, that his eloquence will induce all the readers to give up reading and become writers, to the detriment of the general "price per thousand" is not really grave or alarming. For the aspirant is warned that he must not hope to enter upon the calling without "preparation" ; and the preparation suggested for him is a good deal more formidable than that for any of the public examinations which deter the indolent. He must read many books—"he may read all" ; he is expected to "know" his Browning. He must attend lectures on Logic and Rhetoric. He must know the French language—"must have the power of reading and understanding it as well as his own." He must "find time for the study of Painting, of Music, and Statuary." He must "write something every day," particularly practising descriptions of sunsets and the like. He must take "Beyond the Dreams of Avarice" and read it through several times "to find out how it is planned." It is excellent advice—none the less commendable because to follow it involves hard labour. The indolent, we may be sure, will continue to prefer a clerkship, or a commission, or a curacy, or some other calling which, while it offers less delights than those which Sir Walter Besant sees in literature, imposes less penalties on those whose choice it is to let their minds lie fallow.

On the severe practical details of the craft Sir Walter Besant's advice is equally sound. There are, no doubt, those who need his elementary exhortation to "write only on one side of the paper" ; and there certainly are those who require to be warned not to send all their work to one editor, to get their manuscripts type-written, to study the class of articles which appear in the periodicals to which they wish to contribute, to sign their contributions as often as they can, not to sign away, on receipts, rights not conveyed by the original agreement, and not to imagine that a literary agent can work miracles. Take it for all in all, the book is the best manual for the literary beginner that we remember to have seen.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The author of these MEMORIES OF OXFORD (Robinson, 2s. 6d.), M. Bardoux, son of a well-known French senator and man of letters, is becomingly modest in his claim on their behalf. In this bright and interesting little volume he does not pretend to have added any new facts or original remarks on the organization of the Universities. He simply wishes to "analyse the impressions produced on a young Frenchman by the life, studies, and ideas of Oxford students." The fruits of his three months' residence among the undergraduates, whose amusements and whose labours (to some extent) M. Bardoux shared with diligent regularity, are introduced by a preface from the pen of Mrs. Woods, who does no more than justice to the quality of intelligent observation which the book conspicuously displays. But M. Bardoux possesses also the other and less common virtue of sound judgment and liberal breadth of view. He weighs the comparative merits of the French and English University systems with a judicial impartiality which is almost awe-inspiring in a critic, who, when the notes were written, was only in his twentieth year. On the whole, we gather that he prefers the educational methods of his own country, though his adverse criticisms of ours are only gently and considerately worded ; but that a comparison of the social life, the historical associations, and, generally speaking, the whole "atmosphere" of Oxford, with the surroundings and influence of a French University, inspires him with a feeling of envy. With the intellectual aspect of things he finds cause to be dissatisfied at a very early period of his visit. On May 6 he writes :—

While listening to the opening lecture of Mr. Dicey on Constitutional Law I was, for the first time, impressed with the fact that I was listening to a man of eminence. His venerable appearance, the clearness of his lecture, the warmth of his convictions, and the youthful fervour with which he spoke of liberty, completely charmed me. I am compelled to mention that there were scarcely ten students at the lecture of this remarkable man. This absence of intellectual curiosity came as a painful surprise to me. This is the first reservation I find myself obliged to make. Shall I have many others to mention ?

Not many, we are glad to say. A lecture on International Law in connexion with the war between China and Japan left him cold, and his studies in Political Economy failed to interest him. But he heard the Master of Balliol on Plato gladly, and he was much pleased with the debates at the Union. Indeed, the oratorical performance of a brilliant young undergraduate compatriot of his so impressed him, on one occasion, that he pronounced the whole evening to be "a triumph for French thought, resplendent with ideas and genius." He writes on the proctorial system with discretion, and gives an accurate account of the duties of the bull-dogs. If he had to deplore the lack of intellectual curiosity among the young men, he was rather overcome by the excessive intellectuality of Somerville Hall. The lady student who showed him over the building—

Hardly troubled to conceal the disdain my astonishment inspired. . . . As we went up a delightful staircase she asked me about the most famous French geometrician. I muttered the name of M. Poincaré, but acknowledged my ignorance. My guide's disdain became more marked. After showing me one or two rooms . . . she handed me over to the care of one of her friends, who hastened to speak to me about the chief manuscript of the "Chanson de Roland."

Here M. Bardoux fled ; but he lived, we are glad to find, to write a book which is excellently fresh and pleasant reading.

SOME NEW FRENCH BOOKS.

The second volume of the definitive edition of the MÉMOIRES D'OUTRE TOMBE, edited by M. Edmond Biré, has just appeared from the house of Garnier, and includes the period from January, 1792, to June, 1807, that is to say, from Chateaubriand's return to France, after his journey to America, up to his return from Jerusalem. This is the period also of his exile in England, of his campaign with the "Army of Condée," of his secretaryship in Rome. It is noteworthy that, just at this moment, when M. Brunetière is doing his best to resuscitate the seventeenth century standards of reason and conformity, there seems to be a growing admiration in France for Chateaubriand the romanticist, the colourist, the individualist. M. Biré has added in appendices a number of unpublished letters, and his notes are admirable.

Bulwer-Lytton's success in the "Last Days of Pompeii" has not deterred the author of "Ximénès," which was crowned by the French Academy, and of the one-act play, Aristophane et Molière, which was accepted by the company of the Comédie Française, from attempting presentation in French of the life of the little city under the shadow of Vesuvius. In LA DANSEUSE DE POMPEII (Ollendorff) M. Jean Bertheroy has produced a beautiful piece of work, as richly coloured as the mural paintings of the city itself. He works, in fact, in the spirit of Alexandria, painting idylls, "little pictures," full of the sunlight of Magna Græcia, and recounting the loves of a professional danseuse of Pompeii and a sober, mystical youth of good family attached to the temple of Apollo. And there is a psychological truth exemplified in this pagan story; the boy, Hyacinthe, who has taken the Orphic vows, and meets on the slopes of Vesuvius, among the vineyards, the lithe, little Nonia, is tormented unto death by the struggle of his conscience between the physical love and the divine :—

Cette paix d'Apollon, cette sublime harmonie des accords célestes, l'âme inquiète du camille ne pouvait plus la contenir. La débauche, dont l'effleurement dès son enfance lui avait causé de si douloureux reploiemens d'âme, il en avait eu maintenant la révélation brutale; elle était entrée en lui par les yeux, par les narines; désormais jusqu'à la fin de ses jours il en subirait l'écoeurement; et il souhaitait de mourir pour échapper à ce grand dégoût qui lui était venu de toutes les choses terrestres.

The illustrations, by M. Gusman, almost spoil the book. They are unimportant, sometimes even vulgar, comments on pages where words of themselves evoke the true colours so triumphantly as to make the draughtsman's aid a piece of supererogation to be resented by readers of taste. The style has nothing of the simplicity of the French Academic product. The chill, archæologic air which characterises even the best efforts to recall the past of Greece and Rome is transformed here into the very warmth and illusion of life.

M. Fouillée, the psychologist of the French race, in his book on LES ÉTUDES CLASSIQUES ET LA DÉMOCRATIE (Colin, 3f.), vehemently criticises the present University system of education. The faults that he denounces in the Lycées are often heard of in connexion with English public schools; the importance given to grammar and philology to the detriment of a purely literary training, the stultifying effect of the so-called modern training, the general decadence of Latin and Greek studies. He is not content to point out the evil, he offers the remedy in the shape of a complete re-modelling of the Lycées, and the suppression of the modern side. Sometimes, in characteristic French fashion, he digresses into generalizations. Thus in his conclusion, he sums up the errors of the Third Republic :—

Le gouvernement Républicain a commis de grandes fautes. Il a favorisé l'alcoolisme par la loi sur les débits de boissons; il a encouragé la pornographie et la corruption par la loi sur la Presse et par l'application qu'il en a faite; il a compromis les meilleures réformes de l'enseignement primaire en portant atteinte à la dignité des maîtres qu'il a mêlés aux luttes politiques; enfin, il a rabaisé l'élite même de la nation par la création d'un enseignement hostile aux études classiques.

The sequel to this book appears in the Revue Bleue in which M. Fouillée publishes a remarkable criticism of the educational theories of the Socialists, with their system of integral State education. M. Fouillée would, no doubt, adversely criticise the recent decisions of the Union Républicaine in the Senate, and the vote of the Paris Municipal Council, paving the way to a Bill to render ineligible for public office all who have not studied for at least four years in a State lycée.

M. Schlumberger's RENAUD DE CHATILLON (Plon, 7f. 50c.) will present to many people a new personality in the Prince of Antioch, lord of the land beyond the Jordan. He is a very picturesque type of the obscure period of the fourth Crusade. Renaud was born in the small manor house of Chatillon on the river Loing, in the centre of France, the birthplace, some centuries later, of Coligny. He was a second son and poor, and he set out for the Holy Land to make his fortune. By extraordinary luck he became the husband of Constance, widow of Raymond de Poitiers, Prince of Antioch. From a poor Knight he thus rose suddenly to the rank of tyrant of the second city of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, a city which the Seleucid Kings founded, where Saint Paul preached, and which was the birthplace of Chrysostom.

The new Prince was a singular mixture of courage, craftiness, and ferocity. Bold as Richard Cœur de Lion he was as base as King John. One of his first exploits was to seize Bishop Amaury who had spoken ill of him, cause him to be whipped, and to expose him to the rays of a Syrian sun, his bald head covered with honey, a tempting bait for the stings of the wasps and the flies. Evidently Renaud was not a devout son of the Church.

We next find him battling for the Emperor of Constantinople against a certain Armenian chieftain, whom the chroniclers call Thoros, and then, suddenly incensed against his suzerain, fitting out a fleet and setting sail for Cyprus, having concluded with Thoros a hasty truce. In a few days he mastered the island, and carried back his plunder to Antioch. Such an outrage could not be borne with patience; the Emperor gathered an army and marched into the dominions of his unruly vassal, who submitted to the humiliation of publicly confessing his wrong and craving for forgiveness. Renaud had been seven years Prince of Tyre when, while raiding a caravan, he was surprised by the Sultan of Aleppo and led away a prisoner. The Sultan fixed his ransom at one hundred and twenty thousand gold pieces. He had to wait sixteen years before his friends could collect the sum. When he returned to Antioch a free man, he found that Constance had died and left her dominions to Raymond de Poitiers' son. But Renaud's reputation was such that he did not long remain a Prince Lack-land. The King of Jerusalem intrusted him with the keeping of the fortress of Karak, in the land of Moab, beyond Jordan, and he began again his raids on the Sultan's caravans. After a long career of freebooting, and an attempted siege of Mecca, he was taken prisoner by Saladin, after he had captured the Sultan's sister and sent her to Jerusalem. Saladin swore that he would kill the freebooter with his own hand. Renaud was led before Saladin. The latter upbraided him with his ferocity and perfidy. "I myself defend Mahommed now," he cried, and, springing upon him, he plunged a dagger into his breast.

Such was the dramatic end of Renaud's dramatic life. His was a career worthy to have been sung by William Morris—the green banks of the Loing, the palaces and gardens of Antioch, the dark prisons of Aleppo, the lowering walls of Karak, and Saladin's tent, the night after the battle, such were the fantastic scenes in which he played a leading part. M. Schlumberger is a numismatist of European reputation (he speaks with just pride of Renaud's seal—a unique treasure—which he has in his collection), and he studies history only as a pastime from more serious work, yet he is a master in his more pleasant task. There is a philosophy to be drawn from the book; the Crusaders, after all, were not so very different from sixteenth century conquistadors or nineteenth century pioneers; they seem to have had especially in view their worldly advantage. Had it not been for his inborn superstition, Renaud de Chatillon would, it appears, probably have become at one time a Mahomedan.

THEOLOGY.

Mr. John Gordon's THREE CHILDREN OF GALILEE (Jarrold, 3s. 6d.), which has for sub-title "A Life of Christ for Young People," is chiefly noteworthy for its numerous illustrations. Some of these are reproductions from the paintings of the old masters, others are photographic pictures of Eastern scenes and peoples in modern times. For the text there is very little to be said. The occasional quotations from the wonderful English of the Bible narrative show like ornaments of gold work and jewelry on very threadbare stuff. The sentence :—"Now back of the inn in the side of the limestone hill was a cave" would seem to throw some light on the question of the author's nationality.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE REVELATION OF GOD, by the Rev. C. C. Atkinson, D.D. (Manchester, Sherratt and Hughes, 1s. n.), which appears with the imprimatur of the Bishop of Chester, while accepting extreme "critical" conclusions, shows how the history of Israel is distinguished from the history of the surrounding tribes, and how the voice of Israel, speaking by the prophets, was "the direct gift of God, not 'the mere result of their own power of reflection, nor fictions suggested by their own imaginations.'"

Novelty has its uses perhaps. THE TWENTIETH CENTURY NEW TESTAMENT : a Translation into Modern English (Mowbray-house, 1s. 6d.) should certainly be of advantage. It is carefully done, and, judged by the standard which it adopts of current phraseology, it is done in good taste, though it does not always adhere to its principles. "Multitudes," for instance, is hardly in common use. Half-educated people, accustomed to newspaper English, may find the new translation slightly clearer than the old ; but we fear that literary beauty has quite vanished from the text.

SPIRITUAL LETTERS OF EDWARD BOUVERIE PUSEY, edited by the Rev. J. O. Johnston and the Rev. W. C. E. Newbolt (Longmans, 12s. 6d.), is a book which hardly invites criticism. It is only necessary to commend it to all those who respect the name of Dr. Pusey. The letters are exactly such as readers of the "Life" might have anticipated. The editors point out that, while the letters written between 1840 and 1850 "reflect the darkness of that day of trial, through which the Church of England was then passing," a tone of greater confidence is apparent in those which belong to a later and more peaceful period. But they are uniformly serene, hopeful, and tender. Dr. Pusey, of course, does not appear at his best in dealing with the problems of unbelief and the temper of scepticism. He treats doubt too much as a moral disorder. But he handles theological and ecclesiastical subjects with great wisdom and charity, especially in the letters on "Roman Difficulties." His optimism in regard to the claims and position of the English Church is very striking. His favourite thesis—familiar to readers of the "Eirenicon"—was that "there may be suspensions of communion which do not destroy organic or supernatural unity." And in regard to divergencies of belief within the English Church itself he declares that "there is often more difference in language than in belief." It is obvious that Dr. Pusey lamented the growth of a "new school" which was inclined to depart somewhat widely from the principles of the early Tractarianism. He was not in sympathy either with the ultra-ritualism, or with the hard "rigorism" which has in recent times given so much offence. He was greatly pained by "the attitude of the new school to their Bishops." In one of his later sermons, preached at the opening of Keble College Chapel, in 1876, he took occasion to lament the tone and temper of "those organs which professed to speak our mind." He makes a similar complaint of "the so-called High Church organs," in one of his letters. The gentleness and charity of his language in regard to "Evangelicalism" and Dissent is entirely in keeping with his whole character, of which the most prominent feature was a consideration for the prejudices of others. The preface to the volume is full of interest. We are specially grateful to the editors for their brief description of Mr. Gladstone's farewell visit to Dr. Pusey.

ANNUALS.

To Mr. Joseph Jacobs' LITERARY YEAR BOOK (G. Allen, 3s. 6d.) we have already called attention. It is in no sardonic spirit that we quote as peculiarly applicable to Mr. Jacobs' work the first sentence of his book—viz., that such a work "can only reach anything like a final form by degrees and as it were tentatively." Since the Year Book first started, under the editorship, we think, of Mr. F. G. Aflalo (who contributes an article on Sport and Travel Books in 1898 to the present issue), it has certainly continued to improve. We are bound to confess, mortifying though it be to a reviewer, that to suggest any addition to its present contents is rather difficult. Some additions clearly required are made this year. Among these are a notice of the literary "events of the year" 1898 ; a summary of copyright law ; lists of literary agents, apparently a rapidly increasing body ; of "Fiction Syndicates" and Press Agencies ; of Literary Searchers ; of Press Cutting Agencies ; and of Periodicals which deal with literature. There is also a table of royalties, "the favourite method of payment by results," which will enable the inspired bard and the devoted teacher of humanity to calculate their profits to a halfpenny. The calendar with its events for each day would bear some overhauling, and the list of authors is far from perfect ; but it is a great improvement on what it was. The review of books in 1898, too, is sound, and far less "cheap" in style than it was in some previous issues. On the whole, Mr. Jacobs is to be congratulated on his work, which all who follow the profession of letters will find very useful.

A new issue is published of WHITAKER'S TITLED PERSONS (Whitaker, 2s. 6d.), which fulfils the useful functions of a cheap and handy peerage. The editor expresses his regret that he has been unable to avail himself of "the ample details supplied by several of the Companions of Knighthood"—a class of the community who seem to be more communicative than dukes and earls ; and his attitude towards double-barrelled names is hardly more respectful than was Lord Randolph Churchill's. In the alleged interest of the searcher, he treats the first barrel as an ordinary Christian name. For example, "Slater-Booth, see Booth, S-," and "Baillie-Hamilton, see Hamilton, B-."

WHITAKER'S NAVAL AND MILITARY DIRECTORY (Whitaker 5s.) is announced as "considerably enlarged and extended." A special feature of it is an Indian Army List, which furnishes particulars of that meritorious but little known body the Indian Volunteer Corps, of the Hyderabad Contingent, and such strange sounding forces as the Erinpura Irregular Horse, the Meywar Bhil Corps, the Merwara Battalion, the Bhopal Battalion, and the Central India Horse.

DEBRETT'S HOUSE OF COMMONS AND JUDICIAL BENCH (Dean, 7s. 6d.), though it is not among Sir John Lubbock's "hundred best books," is one of those which no lawyer or politician can be without. The number of facts, especially in the Judicial Bench portion of the book, where particulars are now given of every administrator of justice from the Judges of the superior Courts to the vice-admirals of the Coast, is even greater than usual. It is more difficult to place the facts where a man in a hurry will look for them. It is a little surprising not to find the names of Mr. Justice Hawkins and Mr. Gurdon under the list of peers created on January 1, and to find the name of the one and not of the other in the list of peers. Again, we have a somewhat miscellaneous list entitled "Technical Parliamentary expressions, with some brief descriptions of the duties of some higher officers of State." Here we find Election Auditor—is he a Parliamentary expression, or a high officer of State?—but no mention of such distinguished personages as the Comptroller and Auditor-General and the Paymaster-General. The book, however, fills a very useful place, and is much more complete than its title suggests. It contains, for instance, a list of peers and peeresses, and other items which are certainly not included under the "House of Commons and the Judicial Bench."

Among minor works of reference a welcome is due to Walford's House of Commons, Shilling Peerage, Shilling Baronetage, and Shilling Knightage (Chatto and Windus, 1s. each), which contain in small compass all that the general reader wants to know on these subjects.

THE ENGLISHWOMAN'S YEAR BOOK (Black), edited by Miss Emily James, enters upon a new issue in the nineteenth year of its age. Its purpose, as announced in the preface, is to "help us to the perfecting of our own lives in all that makes for the well-being of the community" ; and if it does not succeed in achieving this high end in the case of every reader, at least it will serve as a useful work of reference for those who want to know what women workers are doing, and what there is for them to do. It appears that there is a "good opening for them" as dentists, and that there is one woman stockbroker "who finds the majority of her clients among women and is able to assist many with business advice." We are not told what the result of following her advice has been, and shall look for information on this point next year. In the section of the Year Book which treats of education we read with a sympathetic interest that "cycling tours under the leadership of French professors" are recommended as a part of the curriculum in modern languages. We have no objection to make : but why should French professors (more especially after Fashoda) enjoy a monopoly of this particular amenity of the pedagogic life ?

We have received a new edition (the thirty-sixth) of EVERY MAN HIS OWN LAWYER (Crosby Lockwood, 6s. 8d.), a work which obviously needs constant revision to be of practical use. It is presumably because so many people boldly assume the accuracy of old and superseded editions that the general body of solicitors are rather well disposed towards the book and declare that it makes work for them. Even in the edition before us, there are statements which seem to need qualification. Surely it is not true that "boxing matches are unlawful," absolutely and without reference to the how, the when, and the where.

EARL BRYHTNOTH'S PRAYER.

A. D. DCCCXCI.

[A transcript from the Old English.]

"God, I thank Thee for all the joy I have had in Life!"

I.

Bryhtnoth the Ealdorman,
 Æthelred's Thane,
 Died in the battle :
 Here he lies buried,
 Ely for tomb-place,
 Mass of the Minster
 Piled on the hill-top
 Looking towards Maldon,
 O'er the wan water,
 O'er the wide fenlands,
 Through the wood nesses,
 Out to the sea there,
 Where by the river-bank
 Fought was the battle by Maldon Blackwater.

II.

This is his tomb-place,
 Ely the stately,
 Shining a landmark
 O'er the broad water,
 Gold-bright in sunrise,
 Gold-red in sunset,
 Grey in the waning,
 Kissed by the moonbeams
 Glimmering through mist-cloud
 Magic and matchless,
 Tower of the Lord God—Lord Everlasting,
 Dreaming o'er fenland and upland and seaboard,
 All through the ages, guarding her hero.

III.

Bryhtnoth lies buried
 Here in the Minster.
 Bryhtnoth the Ealdorman,
 Æthelred's Thane,
 Slain by the Northmen,
 Down there by Maldon,
 Maldon Blackwater,
 Where by the Panta flood Dwelt the East Saxon.

IV.

This was his death cry,
 Bryhtnoth the Ealdorman,
 When to the earth at last
 Fell from his failing hand
 Sword of the mighty hilt ;

Nor could he hold it—
 Sharpest of falchions—
 He, weapon-wielder.
 Yet he this word spake,
 Hoar-headed hero :—

" Ælfnoth and Wulfmaer, Ælfere and Maccus,
 Bairns of the Æthelings, fight and go forward,
 Cheer on your comrades, true-hearted gate folk ! "

V.

Could he no longer, then,
 Fast on his feet stand,
 Bryhtnoth the Ealdorman,
 Looked he to Heaven's King,
 Meeter of meeds :
 " Thanks be to Thee, God,
 Wielder of nations,
 Lord everlasting,
 For all the joy of life
 Winsome and wealthful,
 Bairns' love and wife's love,
 Heart-trust of comrades,
 War-weal and hearth-gear
 That I have here below
 Fared for or gotten.
 Now, oh my maker mild
 Most need have I that Thou
 Good-speed my ghost ;
 Yea, that my soul to Thee
 Safely may journey,
 Safe to Thy Kingdom
 Lord of the angels ! "

VI.

Died then Earl Bryhtnoth
 There by the Panta stream.
 Slain in the battle by Maldon Blackwater.
 Monks of the Minster,
 Monks of Saint Ætheldrythe,
 Thanes of the White Christ,
 Down the long water-street,
 Brought him to Ely :
 Shimmering in moonlight
 O'er the wan water

Far in the sedge reeds
 Wailed the wild bittern ;
 High on the wall-tower

VII.

There in the choir place
 Laid they the hero
 Bryhtnoth the Ealdorman,
 Æthelred's Thane :
 Doleful the dirge chant
 Sobbed through the arches :
 Softly the requiem
 Mass for his Need-faring
 Woke the sad echoes,
 Woe tokens wailing,
 In the roof spaces

O ! for to her was woe, sweet Lady Ælfæd,
 As with a weary heart mourned she her loved one.

VIII.

Here he lies buried,
 Mass of the Minster
 Piled on the hill-top—
 This is his tomb-place :
 Bryhtnoth the Ealdorman,
 He who for English folk
 Fought with the Northmen,
 Fied in the battle by Maldon Blackwater.
 Pray for his Need-faring,
 God rest his soul in peace !
 High-hearted hero.
 Take for thine own living
 Prayer of Earl Bryhtnoth :—
 " For all the joy of life
 Winsome and wealthful,
 Bairns' love and wife's love,
 Heart-trust of comrades,
 War-weal and hearth-gear,
 All I have here below
 Fared for or gotten,
 Thanks be to Thee, God,
 Wielder of nations,
 Lord everlasting ! "

Among my Books.

CHARLES JAMES FOX AS A READING MAN.

The "History of James II.," by Charles James Fox,
 "slumbers on my shelves in majestic quarto," as Lord
 Rosebery put it in his speech at Edinburgh the other day ;
 the only tangible result of all his multifarious reading.
 Not that he read to no purpose. The scholarship of Charles James Fox once upon a time availed to put a poet at his ease. The author of "Pleasures of Hope" was invited to dinner at Holland House to meet the Demosthenes of the age, as he styles his noble host's "illustrious uncle." Fox took Campbell's arm and walked with him up and down the room ; at which condescension the poet hardly knew whether he stood on his head or feet. But the good-natured Minister —he was then Secretary of State—began talking about the Æneid, and Campbell recovered his self-possession ; answering, indeed, so coherently that he was straightway invited to visit St. Anne's Hill to discourse more about these matters. "I like Campbell," Mr. Fox said afterwards, "he is so right about Virgil"; and Campbell echoed the compliment.

The Whig Statesman's fondness for the classics, and for literature in general, pleasantly referred to by Lord Rosebery the other day, is not, perhaps, a new topic; but, though it is long ago since Macaulay met people who could not talk about Charles James Fox with tearless eyes, this least questionable side of his character may still excite a mild emotion. John Bernard Trotter, who was Fox's friend and secretary, travelled with him on the Continent, after the Peace of Amiens, and has recorded the books they read on the way to Paris. They seem to have begun with "Joseph Andrews," which amused Mr. Fox vastly, though they agreed—Mrs. Fox no doubt concurring—that vulgarity is "a little too prevalent in Fielding's novels." The novel was laid aside for Æneids VIII. and IX., which in turn gave place to "Tom Jones." When half way through that lively fiction they went back to the Mantuan, and did the Tenth Book of the Æneid. "I rather think," says Trotter, "that the characters of Evander and Pallas were Mr. Fox's favourites, although I must include that of Dido." They were now in Holland, and Æneid XI. beguiled the journey from Delft to Rotterdam. Æneid XII. was finished after they got to Brussels; and then, returning to Tom Jones, they left him happily married to Sophia an hour or two before entering Paris. Much more may be learnt from Trotter as to Fox's literary tastes, and the volume also contains some private letters in which the Minister directs his Secretary's attention to various beauties in the works of both ancient and modern writers.

It has been my good fortune to read Trotter's "Memoirs of the Latter Years of the Right Honble. Charles James Fox" side by side with an elaborate "Commentary" from the pen of Walter Savage Landor. Suppressed before publication, this rare volume, by the kind permission of the Earl of Crewe, who possesses the only copy known to be in existence, is at last to be reprinted. In it Landor not only discusses the public and private character of Fox, but also, more suo, indulges himself in frequent excursions into other by-ways of politics, letters, art, and morals. Here it may be permissible to give some of his comments on Fox as a scholar and critic of literature.

A general idea of their tendency can be gathered from Landor's accessible works. Fox, he said, dipped more than a little into books, though deeper into the dice-box. In the "Commentary" he enters further into particulars. Mr. Pitt, he remarks, had as profound a contempt for literature and literary men as ever was avowed or felt by Attila and Tottila, whereas Mr. Fox was a man of extensive and not superficial reading. At the same time Landor does not altogether like the samples which Trotter gives of the fruit of these studies. He complains that the enthusiasm of Fox outstripped his judgment. Fox preferred Euripides to Sophocles and Æschylus; an opinion, says Landor, which deserves more pity than even the tragedian of pity ever excited. The dialogue of Euripides is in general dull and heavy, the construction of his fable infirm; while the persons of his drama are more intent to show their understanding than their sufferings. This, by-the-by, is from one of those passages in the Commentary which, in an emended form, reappear in the "Imaginary Conversations." Then Fox did not take the Landorian view of Pindar, whose excessive profusion, he remarked to Trotter, "makes him something bordering on tedious." To this Landor retorts that "Pindar never says more than what is proper, nor otherwise than what is best"; which is another pronouncement that found its way into the Conversations. Fox, however, confessed that he never read more than half Pindar's extant works, and Landor was more incensed at his comparison of Ariosto and Metastasio with Homer, Pindar, and Virgil. "Alas!" Landor exclaims, "these are leveling days indeed! Metastasio in company with Pindar and Homer!" In a letter to his secretary, Mr. Fox had written:—"Homer and Ariosto have always been my favourites; there is something so delightful in their wonderful facility, and the apparent absence of all study in their expression, which is almost peculiar to them." How can that be apparent, Landor wants to know, which is absent; and he goes on to say, finely enough, "in poetry there are two kinds of facility, and opposite in their nature: one arises from vigour, the other from negligence. In Homer and Shakespeare, we shall invariably find the best parts remarkable for a facility of expression. As the purest and noblest of the metals is also the most plastic, in like manner whatever is in poetry the noblest and purest takes a form and pressure the most easily and perfectly." Ariosto, he adds, had much of Ovid's ingenuity and something of his negligence; but he was as far below Homer as he was above Spenser. Orlando Furioso, though, was as wearisome as the Faery Queene. "I will never believe that any man has overcome twelve or fifteen thousand lines of allegory without intervals of respite and repose. I was sixteen years in doing it, and I never did anything which I would not rather do again." It struck him as curious that Fox had not noticed in Ariosto's description of the Palace of Atlante a "wonderful type of the French Revolution"; and still more curious that Fox, when speaking of Italian literature, had never conversed about Alfieri, incomparably the greatest poet of the day in Europe.

Landor approved Fox's "sincere veneration" for Chaucer; but then Fox "entertained a sincere veneration for so many that we have reason to suppose he had little discrimination. His secretary has not produced or commemorated one specimen of acute or elegant criticism." What Landor thought about the letter to "Dear Grey" in which Fox examines Chaucer's description of the nightingale does not appear. That little essay, indeed, in elegant criticism was printed, not in Trotter's book but in Lord Holland's introduction to Fox's "History of James II."; but Landor had read both volumes, and himself had something to say about nightingales in another connexion. In regard to the "History," however, he was more interested in Fox's choice of Dryden as a model for style. Lord Holland's account of the matter is as follows:—"Though he frequently commended both Hume and Blackstone's style, and always spoke of Middleton's with admiration, he (Mr. Fox) assured me that he would admit no word into his book which had not the authority of Dryden." Lander disapproved. Dryden, he said, was a careless writer who used any word that came first, and he assuredly left behind him no treasury of expressions which contained anything convertible to an historian's purpose. As for his being a great poet, which was Fox's estimate, there was not throughout his works a single stroke of the sublime or one touch of the pathetic, "the only adequate criteria." In the imaginary conversation between himself and Southey, it may be remembered, Lander in his own person roundly maintains that "Alexander's Feast smells of gin at secondhand, with true Briton fiddlers full of native talent in the orchestra." That may not be quite the happiest illustration of Lander's compressed criticisms; but it explains his divergence from Fox who, it should be noted, had an idea of bringing out an edition of Dryden's works.

STEPHEN WHEELER.

"THE FAITHFUL FOOL."

[By VIOLET HUNT.]

ANNE ELLIOT TO CAPTAIN HARVILLE:

"All the privilege I claim for my own sex (it is not a very enriable one, you need not covet it) is that of loving longest when existence or when hope is gone."

She was sitting in her armchair over the fire, a woman of medium height, medium figure, medium age, medium everything. She lived alone, and she was engaged to be married. She was always at home to tea at five o'clock. I often call. I am her not quite impartial, and candid—over-candid—friend. There are some womanly states of mind that a man cannot understand, but which have the power to make him angry. She allowed me to say what I thought, but nothing I could say could ever alter her and her theory of life, and a very odd, hopeless, impossible theory of life it was, at least to the mind of an ordinary man like myself.

I practically respected these theories, retaining my privilege of cavilling at them and at the subject of them. When I found the armchair opposite hers occupied, as was sometimes the case, I used to pay only a very short call, and depart, leaving the "obsession," as I had grown to call him, in possession, and the recollection of the grateful smile with which she rewarded my intelligent act of self-abnegation pursued me down the grey stone staircase of her little flat, which indeed he scaled so very much less often than I.

He was the only man in the world for her, though she was far from being the only woman in the world for him. But he was kind to her as far as was consistent with the many and intimate calls on his leisure. In his heart were many mansions, and his intellect and his energy were always at the service of the dictates of his heart. He had helped my friend to choose her flat and had given her his invaluable advice in the furnishing of it. The little suite was decked out with his gifts, and her little heart with his phrases. Rare china and choice language were cheap with him, for he was a connoisseur and a littérateur both. He had been engaged to her for years. Engaged to throw her over, as we all knew, but it empowered him to go and see her freely, and she had charm, though she was a plain woman.

I do not think, to do her reason justice, that she was in any doubt as to his intentions with regard to her. I remember a conversation that I had with her one Christmas Eve, which she began, looking straight into the fire and at her pointed shoe, and saying, slightly under her breath,

"I shall never marry."

"Why do you say that?" I asked, merely to say something, for I knew that she was right.

"I say it because I think it."

"But surely—!"

"Oh, yes, I know, I am engaged and all that, but it does not prevent my feeling that my fate is slowly coming upon me! I get more and more of an old maid every year. I am particular and fussy. I like my little ways, I like my fireside, I like my cat, I like my comforts. Philip is always chaffing me about it!"

"Well, of all the—"

"He is very odd, isn't he?" she said fondly. "Never does, or says, anything like anybody else. That is one of his charms!"

"Oh, is it? I was wondering—I always am wondering, I confess—"

"Men are so jealous of each other!" she said, laughing.

"He tells you that, I suppose?"

"Oh dear me, I can tell that for myself. If a man is liked and run after and petted by women, all the men they neglect for him are frantically jealous, without knowing it, bien entendu!"

"Oh, I don't know it, do I? Well, I wish on that theory that some of you would snub him, if it were only to give him a new sensation. But, you none of you have the heart—or the want of heart. Each sticks to her little piece. But will you tell me what is the fun of owning the decimal fraction of a man? You have all pegged out a claim on this particular bit of territory, and you're as thick on it as bees, or whatever it is. You know yourself you are only one of a hundred on the field of his affections!"

"I do know it!" she answered, hurt and reckless. "And what is more, I often tell him so."

"And what does he say?" I sneered.

"He smiles, and puts the question by," she replied, smiling herself.

"And modestly owns to eighty-nine, say? Good God, how can you stand it?"

"How can he help it?"

"Why can't he?" I grumbled.

"Because that sort of man can't, I suppose."

"Then I don't like that sort of man."

"And I do, that's the trouble," she said sadly.

"But come, now, what good is he to you? What joy do you have of him?"

"I love him, and I like to hear him say he loves me, and write it to me."

"He has a lithographed form of letter, and it costs him nothing to say it. But if you were to ask him to prove it?"

"I shouldn't be such a fool, when I know he doesn't—at least not much."

"You are branding him as a liar. How can you love a man whom you can't respect?"

Here came the usual pause—the pause that always occurred when I, in my zeal for her disillusionment had gone too far, and permitted myself to make an unanswerable statement. There were tears in her eyes. I was sorry to hurt her, but I was possessed this evening, of all evenings, with a wild desire to show this pinchbeck villain up, and persuade her to break with him. How could I have been such a fool as to imagine that this lay in my power!

"Surely you can't care for him," I went on. "A charlatan of the emotions, the lover of all the world, a man who has no men friends, but whose whole time is spent in playing fast and loose with a crowd of silly women——"

"It isn't fast, it is only loose!" she said bitterly. "He doesn't take any of us in—not one of us!"

"Oh, no, a man of that kind is incapable of really loving any woman, and in time they come to see it. I see, you would be perfectly wretched if you thought him capable of a grande passion?"

"The thought has not come to me," she replied, evasively, but I knew that that was not true, and that that particular thought was responsible for at least one of the little lines that were growing on her forehead.

"I saw you let Mrs. Leigh kiss you tenderly on the cheek, yesterday! Good God, what more could a trusting, believing woman do?"

"She might hold the other cheek, I suppose. But you don't understand. Why should I hate her?"

"Your rival!"

"One of them," she corrected me, "remember what you said yourself. There is safety in numbers!"

"Don't you even wish her the least little bit of harm?"

"No; why should I? She has done me no injury—except collectively, I might say. It would be like undertaking to prosecute a company to begin to visit Mrs. Leigh—and the others—with my displeasure. Too much trouble! On the contrary, I make it easy to her. I respect her days. If I am calling on her, and he comes in, I go—why should I spoil her little hour! Mine will be to-morrow, perhaps?" She spoke jauntily. She tossed her head. She was quite pleased with her assumption of cynicism.

"Have you your day, then? There are only seven days in the week, not eighty-nine!"

"He comes when he can."

"And what do you do?"

"I try to make it pleasant to him."

"And when he is pleased to go, you say imploringly—'When shall I see you again?'"

"I never should make such a mistake as that. He is perfectly free to come and to go."

"I see. Quite patient, like Moore's sunflower, that 'turns on her god when he sets the same face that she showed when he rose.' Such a commonplace god, too!" I was trying another tack. But really, I have tried them all.

"Commonplace?" That hurt!

"It is rather commonplace, is it not, to be so—generally available?"

She flamed up. "He can't help women falling in love with him."

"He doesn't try. But what on earth do they see in him? He isn't even good-looking!"

"No, he is something better—wicked-looking!" She said this with quiet malice, and looked into my face.

"We can't all achieve that, I admit. No; let us profanely paraphrase Matthew Arnold in analyzing his peculiar charm, and say it is a something, not himself, which makes for conquest. He is getting grey?"

"Yes, he is, rather."

"And no younger?"

"That is true."

"Less attractive generally?"

"Possibly."

"Don't those little considerations weigh with women?"

"I hope so."

"You smile as if you were pleased?"

"Because—don't you see?—it shows me—Oh, you will laugh at me!"

"Not more than I generally do, my dear. Well?"

"I seem to see a kind of hope—perhaps there is a good time coming?"

"What can you mean? Surely it cannot be a pleasure to you to think of the man you love growing senile—dying?"

"No, no!" She shuddered. "Ah, when you speak of it, I see myself—"

"Flying frantically to his bedside, to deposit a farewell kiss on his brow. My dear child, think of the number of women you would meet on the stairs!"

"What do you mean?"

"Do you fondly suppose that you are the only one who would rush to drop a tear on Lubin's—? Why, you would not be able to make your way into the house for bouquets, or breathe for sighs! Then you would all go home, and take to your beds with a pan of charcoal under them, and die for him—in concert!"

"You would oblige me if you would not speak of death in that flippant way any more," she said. "That was not what I meant. I meant that when he is a little older, a little greyer, a little duller, a little sadder, less triumphant, you know, the others will begin to leave him alone. They will begin to tail off, as it were, when he is too spiritless to flirt nicely, when he has grown pessimistic, and bored, and is glad to be quiet, and go out less and stay at home more—"

"With one foot in the grave and the other in a carpet slipper? Poor old Lovelace! I could find it in my heart to pity him myself! And you mixing his gruel!"

"Don't!"

"Will you have some more Matthew Arnold, then?"

"Behold her here, the patient dower,
Who possessed his darker hour!
She is here who had his gloom—"

"Who was that?"

"Iselt of Brittany. She must have been as great a goose as you. No matter! She got what she wanted in the end. So may you."

"Yes," she said, with a temporary irradiation of real beauty on her face. "Yes, when they no longer think him worth a sigh, or a tear, or a bouquet, when they begin to neglect him and leave him out of their parties—when he doesn't have six invitations for one night and his mantelpiece isn't choked with cards—when he has, possibly, grown a little uninteresting, unsociable, slow, dull, stout, even—I speak of all these horrors with bated breath; I can laugh at myself, you see!—in short, when all the flirts and fairweather friends have deserted him, as they are sure to do, then, then the faithful fool will step in, and be there—at his call, at his beck—to soothe him, and love him, and adore him, and have him all to herself, for ever and ever, for the rest of this world, and the whole of the next—"

"I have always maintained that women are the constant sex!" I said, taking up my hat.

Notes.

The annual dinner of Correctors of the Press, which is to be held to-night, draws attention to a most useful set of men, whose obscure services to literature are little realized. Only the small number of people who deal with what is known as an "unread proof" can be aware of the beneficent screen interposed by the corrector of the Press between the sensitive author and a maddening chaos. Probably the subscriptions to the dinner fund which have been forwarded by a number of men of letters, headed by Mr. George Meredith, show that authors are awakening to a sense of this debt. The First Folio of Shakespeare is, as Mr. Sidney Lee pointed out in his lecture last Monday at the London Institution, a sad example of bad printing which needed overhauling by the careful "reader" of to-day. We should not tolerate such a piece of work as the folio of 1623, even if it had been printed in Holland from a manuscript as bad as that of Carlyle or Dean Stanley.

Authors have never learnt to accept misprints with the same equanimity as bad weather, a fall in stocks, and the other misfortunes which are the lot of all mankind. Many of them are inclined to the Manichæan heresy of the author of a sixteenth century pamphlet on the Mass, who included fifteen pages of errata in a volume of a hundred and seventy pages, asserting that the devil in person had made the manuscript illegible, and had obliged the printer to misread it. There is still ready sympathy with any complaint of printers' errors, such as those humorously chronicled by Moore in his "Fudge Family"—

But a week or two since, in my Ode upon Spring,
Which I meant to have made a most beautiful thing,
Where I talked of the "dew-drops from freshly-blown roses,"
The nasty things made it "from freshly-blown noses!"

This kind of joke is fairly hackneyed. It would be more novel and more interesting to compile a catalogue of the happy emendations which the world owes to the corrector of the Press. First among these a study of the corrector's humour might have a certain psychological interest. Professor J. W. Hales has pointed out the proper line for a student to take. He must not consider, as so many people do, that what we lump together as "typographical errors" are all accidental and fortuitous. "Such a view," says Mr. Hales, "reminds one of the way in which the last century critics used to speak of Shakespeare—the critics who gave him no credit for design or selection, but thought that somehow or other he stumbled into greatness." It must have been of set purpose that a corrector irradiated the gloom of a Scots paper with the locomotive which cut a cow "literally into calves," and only the zeal of a Home Ruler can have produced the announcement that Sir Robert Peel, with a party of fiends, was shooting peasants in Ireland. It is hard on the proof-reader that his witty productions should not only be anonymous, but should so often be attributed to chance.

The chief interest of Mr. Sidney Lee's lecture was his announcement of the discovery of another copy of the First Folio belonging to Mr. Sibthorp, of Sudbrooke Holme, Lincoln—a finer and also a taller one, than any other known copy, and containing a contemporary inscription stating that it was a presentation copy. It seems from the arms on the binding to have been given by the printer Jaggard to one Augustus Vincent, of the Herald's College, and there is evidence that Jaggard had at the time a special reason for being friendly to Vincent, and for marking that friendship by this particular gift. Mr. Lee's account of it is as follows. One Ralph Brooke, a colleague of Vincent, said that Shakespeare had no right to the coat of arms granted him in 1599, and also, somewhat in the style of Mr. Slurk attacking Mr. Pott, criticized Jaggard's competence as a printer. Vincent took up the cudgels on behalf of Shakespeare, and Jaggard, who printed the reply, answered Brooke on his own behalf. Brooke does not appear to have hit back, and we can imagine Jaggard and Vincent celebrating their encounter at the Boar's Head, or some ordinary under the shadow of Old St. Paul's where booksellers did congregate, and Vincent standing a bottle of wine to the printer who had given him a copy of "the most valuable contribution to literature that ever issued from a printing office."

Mr. Lee gave the story of the publication of the First Folio, and of the syndicate headed by Jaggard which produced it—a story still partly conjectural, which he was the first to string together from all the available evidence in his "Life of Shakespeare." John Heming and Henry Condell, whose names appear on the First Folio, no doubt belonged to the syndicate. Mr. Lee told his audience who these gentlemen were—a piece of information which, judging from the newspaper reports of his address, would seem to be necessary. One morning paper calls them Heminge and Cordell; another, Heninge and Condell; another Heminge and Coudell; while a fourth lumps these actor-managers with the rest under the phrase "Some other booksellers."

Attention might very well have been drawn, by the way, to the urgent need, which we recently pointed out, of some accessible catalogue of the contents of private Libraries. Copies of the First Folio are eagerly studied for textual and other reasons, and critics have always been in doubt as to how many of the few copies printed are now in existence. All the time, one copy, the most interesting of all, was lying hidden in a private Library in Lincolnshire. Surely it is now sufficiently recognized that such valuable possessions, whether in literature or art, are to some extent in the nature of a trust; that the nation has an interest in them, and should not be denied the advantage of any increase in knowledge or taste which it may derive from them. There is the more reason in this particular case for emphasizing this point of view, since many of the best First Folios have gone, and are still going, to America.

It is generally expected that Mr. G. K. Fortescue will succeed Dr. Garnett as Keeper of Printed Books at the British Museum. The appointment would certainly be very popular, besides being a just recompense for the immense and unremunerative labour which Mr. Fortescue imposed upon himself in compiling his great Subject Index.

"Cavendish's" handbook on whist was, when its writer, Mr. Henry Jones, died the other day, in its twenty-third edition. How eloquently that fact attests its excellence appears when we note the number of its less successful competitors. In Mr. Fortescue's Index, which only covers a period of fifteen years, there are no fewer than seventy-six entries under the heading of "Whist"; and the bibliography of the subject was already considerable at the date at which that index begins.

The first edition of "Cavendish," which appeared in 1862, was only a little tract of eighty pages, containing neither the diagrams nor the introductory chapter which are such useful features of later issues. Its principal claim to originality consisted in giving "a selection of hands played completely through." Before its publication the most notable authority was "Short Whist," by Major A., 1836. This little book, which has a delightful frontispiece, gives a festive account of the origin of Short Whist, which is worth quoting:—

This revolution (compared to which those of 1789 and 1830 were mere things of a day) was occasioned by a worthy Welsh baronet preferring his lobster for supper hot. Four first-rate whist-players—consequently four great men—adjourned from the House of Commons to Brooks's and proposed a rubber while the cook was busy. "The lobster must be hot," said the baronet. "A rubber may last an hour," said another, "and the lobster cold again and spoiled before we have finished." "It is too long," said a third. "Let us cut it short," said a fourth. Carried unanimously. Down they sat and found it very lively to win or lose so much quicker. . . . Next day St. James's-street was in commotion; the Longs and the Shorts formed each a party, and violent was the contention between them.

That the Shorts had it is, of course, matter of history.

Looking further backward, we come to the famous Hoyle, whose "Short Treatise on the Game of Whist" has passed through innumerable editions and been revised to meet the wants of many generations. The first edition (1742) is one of the rarest books in the world, the copy in the Bodleian being the only one that is known to exist. The second edition (1743) exhibits the author—an old gentleman of more than seventy—as a professional player anxious to make money out of the amateurs. He has, he announces:—

Framed an Artificial Memory which takes not off you Attention from your Game; and if required he is ready to communicate it, upon payment of One Guinea.

And also, He will explain any Cases in the Book upon Payment of One Guinea more.

Hoyle's book appears to have been very extensively pirated. In his twelfth edition he announces that he has had to obtain injunctions against nine persons, and will continue to seek injunctions against all those who try to rob him of his rights in his literary property.

A still earlier writer on Whist is Charles Cotton, author of "The Compleat Gamester," 1674. He says:—

Ruff and Honours (alias Slamm) and Whist are Games so commonly known in England, in all Parts thereof, that every Child almost of eight Years old hath a competent Knowledge in that Recreation.

Perhaps that is the reason why Cotton only states the rules vaguely. The intimation, for example, that "he that wins most Tricks is most forward to win the Set" does not carry us very far. Nor is it easy to make much of this account of dummy whist:—

Some play at two-handed or three-handed Whist; if three-handed always two strive to suppress and keep down the rising Man.

Further back than Cotton the rules of the game cannot be traced.

Miss Bailey's skill in indexing is well known. She would be the last person in the world to fall into the error of the indexer of the Gentleman's Magazine, who so arranged his Smiths that it was computed that it would take a man ten days at eight hours a day to be sure of turning up any particular Smith that he wanted. Now Miss Bailey sends us the first number of "Bailey's Index to The Times" (Eyre and Spottiswoode, 3s.), which differs from Mr. Palmer's well-known index in appearing monthly instead of quarterly. The advantage of the plan is that it admits of the use of large and legible type; but there are drawbacks. The bulk of the index threatens quickly to become overwhelming; and the labour of using it in the case of events of the date of which one does not feel very certain will be enormous. One or two of the entries invite criticism. We do not understand, for instance, on what principle of classification Miss Bailey gives us

Alliances:—

Chamberlain's, Mr., Announcement—Lord Kimberley on, 26th, 5 [2].

We would further suggest that the entry Alpine Accidents is inadequate. The name of the mountain should be given. Otherwise the searcher will be driven to waste a good deal of his valuable time and temper.

Our modern magazines are well known to be indefatigable in their endeavours to satisfy the public curiosity concerning popular literary men; their dernier cri finds expression in a campaign which is being organized by a threepenny contemporary. To such men of letters as he considers eminent, or amiable, enough for his purpose the editor has forwarded a pudding basin full of gelatinous matter, with the request that he will have it warmed, press his foot well down into it, and send it back. A cast is to be made from the mould and photographed, and the photograph is to be reproduced in the magazine. Then the general reader will be able to consider whether such a writer has the sort of foot that would be expected from a perusal of his works, or whether the works of a man with this or that sort of foot seem likely to be worth reading. It will be interesting to see how many men of genius will respond to this extraordinary invitation. We hope that most of them will "put their foot down" in a metaphorical rather than a material sense; otherwise it will be hard to see where this sort of impertinence is to stop, or, indeed, why it should stop anywhere at all. The publication of a composite picture, made up of the nose of a realist, the foot of an impressionist, the mouth of an orator, the hand of an historian, and the eye of a poet—a sort of ideal good all round man, in short—strikes us as one development of the idea eminently calculated to stimulate the public interest in literary matters.

It is quite natural for schoolboys to regard poets whose poems they have to learn for "repetition" as so many task-makers who add to the bitterness of life. But this view is not often so frankly expressed as it was in a letter which several Lübeck schoolboys once sent to Herr Geibel, the venerable German poet. This letter has just turned up among the poet's papers and a very amusing composition it is. The boys' complaint was that two of them had been flogged and several others sent down in their class because they could not learn his "Hope of Spring."

"We expect," they went on, "we expect you did not think of such things when you wrote that poem. The Herr Lehrer says it is a very beautiful poem; but there are so many very beautiful poems and we are obliged to learn them. Therefore we beg and entreat you, esteemed Herr Geibel, make no more beautiful poems. And, to make it worse, we have to learn the biography of every poet, what year he was born in, and what year he died in. We write to you because you are the only poet still living, and we wish you a very long life."

It would be interesting to know whether "Karl Beckmann II. Klasse" got any answer to this ingenious appeal.

A well-known modern critic has laid down that the best thing to do, when a new book comes out, is to read an old one. Following this recommendation in the case of Mr. Edward

Lawson's "Guide to Dancing" (Routledge)—an excellent work of its kind—one naturally pulls down a delightful book, published in 1652, under the title of "The Dancing Master, Or plain and easie Rules for the Dancing of Country Dances, with the Tune to each Dance, and to be played on the Treble Violin." The preface alone repays the journey to the shelves. We read:—

The Art of Dancing . . . is a commendable and rare Quality fit for young gentlemen, if civilly and opportunely used. And Plato, that Famous Philosopher, thought it meet that young Ingenious children be taught to Dance. It is a Quality that has been formerly honoured in the Courts of Princes, when performed by the most Noble Heroes of the Times, the Gentlemen of the Innes of Court, whose sweet and airy Activity has crowned their Grand Solemnities with admiration to all Spectators.

The fact that the first dancing manual appeared at a time when the alleged Puritans were in control of the Government supports the view of Puritanism taken by the editor of that ingenious new magazine the Puritan. Note the quaint but explicit directions of the Dancing Master for the first dance upon his list. It runs thus:—

First man shake his own Wo. by the hand, then the 2, then the 3, then your own by one hand then by the other, kisse her twice and turn her. Shake her by the hand, then the 2, then your own by one hand, then by the other; kisse her twice and turn her.

This excellent handbook enjoyed an enormous vogue. It ran through a great number of editions, and was still in demand as late as the reign of George I.; and even now a perusal of its pages might inspire many bright ideas for pleasing novelties in the ballroom.

As to the reading of the third line in "A Lyke-Wake Dirge" Mr. Anderson Graham has written to us again to support his view that, in the line "Fire and Sleet and Candle Light," sleet is a corruption of salt, which is still placed on dead bodies in the North. Mr. Mayhew, it will be remembered, denied that salt was ever pronounced sleet in any local patois, and asserts that in the North it is called "Saut." Mr. Graham points out that "the North" means the North of England:—

Can Mr. Mayhew as much as enumerate the hundreds of dialects spoken within this area? Is there one so Scotch as to say "saut"? I do not believe it. "Saut" is Berwickshire but not Berwick-on-Tweed, it is Coldstream but not Cornhill, Sir Patrick Spens but not the Lyke-Wake Dirge. Sate, set, salt, selt, and sleet are all pronunciations to be heard round about Belford Moor—which, when a child, I used to think was the very whining moor of this same ballad. I write of a patois as familiar to me as is the beautiful soft, west wind that blows on the Cheviots. Moreover, Sir Walter Scott, who frequently visited his friend, Priedeaux Selby, the naturalist, at his residence—not the one on the Till, but near Belford—knew the same local patois. He may have heard as I often did in my youth an old dame send her grandson for a ha'porth o' sleet, and based his conjecture on that.

Collectors of M. Maurice Barrès' works should note the appearance, almost simultaneous, of two small publications which will shortly be out of print and become then as rare as his famous "Huit Jours chez M. Renan" which commands such prices to-day as Mr. Kipling's Indian editions of 1888 are obtaining. The most curious of these pamphlets is a memorial volume on "Stanislas de Guaita" (Chamuel 2f.), the Frenchman who, with the famous Sar Peladan and Dr Papus, has resuscitated occultism, and left immense volumes of curious lore on the subject, although he died at thirty-seven years of age. M. Barrès was his schoolmate at the Nancy lycée, which readers of "Les Deracinés" will recall, and this volume of souvenirs of his old friend throws fresh light on the early training of this writer. The other pamphlet is "Un Amateur d'Ames" (Fasquelle 3f. 50c.), an enlarged version of a characteristic study which appeared five years ago in "Du Sang, de la Volupté et de la Mort." In imitation of the artistic attitude of the late G. Rodenbach in his "Bruges-la-Morte," M. Barrès has here attempted to pluck out the soul as it were of the most suggestive landscapes of Spain, and to describe in finely-chiselled phrases the effect of contact with them upon the temper of an unformed but highly sensitive girl.

The Revue d'Art Dramatique has instituted an enquête sur la critique dramatique française by putting to a number of distinguished playwrights, actors, musicians, and critics three questions—Should dramatic criticisms be written several days after pieces have been produced? Should simple "reports" be sufficient on the day after production? Would it be better to have no criticism at all? Some of the replies are amusing, though most of them discuss the questions in the most serious vein. M. Valabrègue, the witty farce writer and part author of La Poupée, is briefly sensible. He replies "Non" to each. M. Jules Lemaître is nearly as curt as M. Valabrègue. "I. Je crois que ça vaudrait mieux. II. Si. III. Comment?" On the whole the question of criticism is left very much where it was. Some critics, as it is, do wait several days before they pronounce judgment. Others give their opinions at once—and the public does not quarrel with either. It is all very well for some of the interrogés to declare loftily that they do not want any criticism at all. People who are interested in the drama demand some notice of new pieces, and, as M. Ferdinand Hérold slyly insinuates, there are many who make reading about a play a substitute for going to see it, and who are glad to be able to talk about it as if they had been.

Literary Berlin has this week been celebrating the seventieth birthday of one of the most brilliant of living novelists. Friedrich Spielhagen was born at Magdeburg on the 24th February, 1829, and, although little known elsewhere, has been famous in Germany for forty years or more. He began his literary career in the early fifties with a series of excellent translations and critical essays. The translations included what are still among the best German versions of Emerson's "English Characteristics" and Roscoe's "Lorenzo di Medici." But the work which established his reputation was "Problematische Naturen." This powerful socialistic novel was published in 1860, and was followed in 1861 by "Durch Nacht zum Licht," and in 1863 by "Die von Hohenstein." The latter treats of the revolutionary movement of 1848, and was the first of a series of brilliant political romances from the same hand. A list of his novels would almost fill a column. Yet he has also produced a good deal of very charming verse, a volume or two of essays, and a couple of plays, and has found time in the course of his career to edit three important newspapers. His latest work is his Autobiography, in which he gives an interesting account of his experiences in England, Paris, Italy, and Switzerland, and of his life in Berlin, where he has resided since 1862, and where his birthday is to be celebrated to-morrow by a banquet which most of the other leading literary lights of Germany will attend to do him honour.

Berlin is pre-eminently the city of literary theatrical enterprise and a new society has been lately formed there to give a series of Festspiele matinales at which certain plays, both ancient and modern, not often or never before seen on the ordinary stage are to be sumptuously mounted and ideally performed, only the most distinguished professional and lay talent being enlisted. Two comedies of Aristophanes, von Kleist's Amphitryon, Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida, and Die letzten Menschen, by Wolfgang Kirchbach are announced. On the committee of the Festspiele figures every name of note in Berlin literary circles.

Ernst von Wildenbruch, who represents the Schiller tradition in the German drama, has published a long confession of faith and Apologia. He claims to have found the German drama sunk to the mere imitation of French plays of intrigue, and to have broken the spell which prevented the production of more elevated works. He used the drama to celebrate the historical glories of Germany, and accuses the younger writers of indifference to patriotism and contempt for patriotic manifestations. What is more to the point, he declares that "This whole naturalistic movement was a movement on paper. The naturalistic dramatists had no notion of the deepest wishes and needs of their people." The German people, he says, put the educated class right, and by their passive opposition the flood of naturalism has actually been brought to a stand, and the whole movement is now practically set aside.

According to a Viennese, who lately recorded his impressions of some London theatres in an article in Die Zeit, our stage at the present moment is intellectually almost beneath contempt. That the nation "which gave birth to Shakespeare should succumb to a Dumas epidemic in an age that has produced Ibsen" fills him with pitying wonder, and of the performances of individual actors he is equally contemptuous, Mr. Forbes Robertson's Hamlet being the only exception.

* * * * *

Another writer, in Das Neue Jahrhundert, seems even more convinced that the British drama has reached its nadir. "London," he says, "buys more books than any city in Europe, yet regards the theatre as a mere social pastime. It is a digestive after long, heavy dinners, a convenient rendezvous for racing men, stockbrokers, and diamond-decked professional beauties." He speaks with contempt of "shallow drawing-room pieces at the Criterion, carpet romances at the Haymarket, and sugary trash at the Prince of Wales's." The Berliner, unlike the Viennese, does not even allow us the credit of Mr. Forbes Robertson. Perhaps because Mr. Forbes Robertson has visited Berlin.

A feature of interest in the Russian Journal Journalow will be the appearance in its pages of "Turgenev's" hitherto unpublished correspondence with Madame Viardot-Garcia. The history of these letters is remarkable. In 1870 they were lost or stolen owing to the lady's family having to leave Baden-Baden in haste on the declaration of war. Nothing further was heard of them till two years ago, when a Russian littérateur picked them up in the shop of a secondhand dealer in Berlin. Madame Viardot now consents to their publication under her own editorship. Turgenev regarded the estate of the Viardots, Courtavenelle, in Rosay-en-Brie, as the cradle of his muse, for it was there that, after a difference with his mother which deprived him of the necessities of life, he took refuge and produced in the winter of 1847-48 his "Diary of a Sportsman."

Messrs. Sotheran and Co., of Piccadilly, send us the catalogue of a very fine and extensive collection of Autograph Letters and Manuscripts, foreign as well as English. A long letter in Shelley's handwriting, dated Chamouni, July 22nd, written in a marked characteristic style, forms a portion of the MS. of his "Six Weeks Tour," and is partly unpublished. There are also letters of Burns, Byron, Coleridge, Scott, Dickens, and many other celebrities, including Armande Béjart, the wife of Molière, and Adrienne Lacoureur, the French actress, both of which, the former especially, are very rare.

A catalogue of books just issued by Mr. Richard Cameron, of St. David-street, Edinburgh, contains some curious entries at a very moderate price; notably several works devoted to curling and other sports, the "Secret History of Queen Elizabeth," published at Cologne in 1695, and "The Story of Lady Flora Hastings." Mr. J. T. Goldie, of 13, Park-lane, Leeds, also sends us a miscellaneous catalogue, which contains Lady Charlotte Schreiber's two works on Fans, Skelton's "History of the Royal House of Stuart," and the scarce Boston edition of the Rubáiyat of Omar Khayyám with Vedder's designs.

With the object of providing a central organ in which studies of papyri, or articles on kindred subjects, may be published or recorded, it is proposed to publish, early this year, in Breslau, the first part of "Archiv für Papyrusforschung und verwandte Gebiete." The editor, Herr Ulrich Wilcken, will be assisted by the leading authority on the subject in each European city; Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt will represent Oxford; Mr. Kenyon, London; Professor Mahaffy, Dublin; Lombroso, Rome, and so forth. The periodical is to be divided into three sections; in the first, longer original articles or texts will be published; in the second, shorter articles; while the third will consist of records of excavations and discoveries, reviews, and news.

American Letter.

MR. REMINGTON'S WILD MEN.

The wilderness has been withdrawing itself for a century before the civilized world more and more swiftly, and our half of the civilized world has pressed it so hard that it has almost vanished into the Western sea. The wild man as he once was has in fact altogether ceased to be; and unless the spirit of humanity, which has prompted our late conquests, is to go gunning for him, with a peddler's pack on its shoulders, in the tropical fastnesses of the Philippines, I do not know where he will be found in our territories outside of literature. Even in literature he is not the wild man he once was, though it is doubtful if he ever was as we see him in the literature of the past. Literature now pursues him to the Reservation, where in his unbroken leisure as the ward of the nation he is said to be multiplying. But he is now the creature of circumstances that deprive him of the romantic charm he wore in old-fashioned fiction; the snapshot blue-prints of the up-to-date Indian, as we find them in modern fiction, are no more like the studies of savages in Cooper's historical pictures than the college-slangy American girl of to-day is like the large-languaged heroines of his romances. The New aboriginal, if I may so call him without offence, is a savage who has in some measure come to know on which side his bread is buttered; he submits more or less to the conditions which he does not understand; he is beginning to hold his land in severalty, even if he does not cultivate it; he probably believes that without competition, which is the soul of monopoly, his individuality would perish; and when he sallies forth to slay the cattle of the Beef Trust which his grateful conquerors supply him, he probably has his own views of the protective tariff, though he has as yet kept them to himself.

The wild man of Mr. Remington, as we see him in the group of sketches called "Sundown Leflare," a little antedates this New aboriginal, and he seems to be all the wilder for the mixture of the tame man in him. Leflare's mother was Indian and his father was French, and he has been scout, guide, hunter, whatever you will, for the militant Americans against the savages of a period just a little past. His nature is a dim turmoil of the motives, superstitions, doubts, and fears of both the races blent in him; and without being consciously cruel he has the ferocity of a wild beast, penetrated with some gleams of religion and even of humour, or of a shrewdness that looks like it. At the safe distance of print, Leflare is always not less than delightful, whether we know him in his faith in the thunder-myth of the Great Medicine Horse; or in his heroic defiance of famine, foe, and blizzard in carrying an army order; or in what comes nearest being his grand passion, his passion for the aquaw he steals from her husband; or in his financial operations at cards with a partner whom he knows only as "the store-clothes man;" or in that region of his Higher Self, where he vaguely and shyly reveals the origin and effect of that personal medicine by which he has magically prospered through many perils. The incidents and ideas are imparted in his own parlance, which is as personal as his medicine, and which has for me a preciousness not easily to be evidenced or even suggested to others. Taken simply for what he is, a wild figure, sculturesquely shown on every side, but mystically unknowable to himself as well as to the spectator, he seems to me a great achievement: as great as the finest of Mr. Remington's essays in the graphic or the plastic arts.

I do not at all suppose that he is fiction; on the contrary, I imagine him to be studied from life; but he is none the less, he is all the more, an achievement for that reason; and for that reason I am exempted from comparing him to their disadvantage with all former inventions in his sort. His simplicity puts their sophistication to shame, and one feels again in his presence how knowing nature is, after all. In one's pleasure one almost forgets how much one owes to the artist who puts his figure before one with such admirable, such almost absolute, detachment. It is, in its supremacy, quite in the line of much other achievement of Mr. Remington's in the several arts with which he seems to find himself at home. Sundown Leflare has in fact been growing through his earlier books, through "Pony Tracks" and through "Crooked Trails," which treat of the same life as the present book, and he merely emerges here with a completer definition. In his realization there is something of the gift to which we owe all those vividly actual pictures of the spare, sinewy, powerful savages, soldiers, and settlers of the plains, now for many years familiar to the readers of the illustrated magazines and newspapers; and there is something of the gift which more lately made itself felt in the group of a frontiersman breaking a mustang, not less actual than the pictures, which the artist named "The Bronco Buster." Amidst the poverty of American motive in American sculpture this was perhaps too arrogantly opulent, and perhaps it exhausted Mr. Remington's resources; at any rate, he has given us nothing that I know of in sculpture since; though his graphic and literary fertility is increasingly great.

It is in literature that he interests me just now. I am not going to pretend that he is a great writer. On the technical side he is faulty enough; he is slovenly, nearly always, but not always; he is newspaperly, he is slangy, he is often whatever one would not wish him to be in structure and conduct; but somehow he is able to give us the life he has seen as we must believe he saw it; and that, after, all is the great matter. So many writers seem to have seen nothing, or if they have seen anything, are so skilled in persuading the reader to the contrary, that when we come upon a writer who is almost not a writer, and yet who knows how to bring us face to face with his facts, we ought to be glad of him.

HORACE WALPOLE AND LORD CHESTERFIELD.

There is at present in the market a treasure which ought assuredly to find a home in the British Museum. This is Horace Walpole's copy of Chesterfield's Miscellaneous Works, enriched with a large number of notes in his own handwriting. The ample margins of the two quarto volumes afforded Walpole full scope for the favourite occupation of his later years. In many instances the whole of the lower part of the page is covered with fine writing, in the neat and beautiful hand which retained its firmness and clearness to the end; and occasionally the annotations, for want of space below, have turned the corner and invaded the right-hand margin as well. These notes, which form a running commentary on Chesterfield's memoirs and letters, and furnish the clue to many of the allusions in the text, were written in 1777 (for several of them are dated), the year in which the volumes were published, and have been printed by the Philobiblon Society.

The following account of Sir Paul Methuen is a good specimen of the racy observations with which the margins of the two volumes abound:—

Ld. Chesterfield's reputation for wit was early established by the ruin of a man that had very undeservedly been much admired. This was Sr. Paul Methuen, a dull, formal, romantic braggadochio, who, returning from Spain with reputation for having concluded the treaty of Madrid, passed for the finest gentleman of the age, by telling extravagant stories of [his] own valour, and gallantry, and generosity, though he was sordidly penurious. He had crossed over to Africa, vaunted of having killed lions, and of flinging a fine ruby into the sea, because the lady he was walking with would not accept it. Young Ld. Stanhope soon saw through this fictitious knight-errant, and took all opportunities of turning him into ridicule. When he cited the number of lions he had killed, Ld. Stanhope (Chest.) said :—" Fie ! Sr. Paul, that was errant poaching." Sr. Paul was not so dull, but he felt how much he suffered from such an antagonist—and being brutal too, determined to be revenged. The occasion that did not present itself, but that he seized, was on being called out in a coffee-house where he was playing at billiards with Ld. Chest. Sr. Paul said, " I was called out by a person who asked me who it could be I was playing with, whose head is bigger than his body, and his nose bigger than his head " ! The description had some foundation in truth—but Ld. Ch., not at all disconcerted, replied with equal wit, irony, and coolness, " Oh ! Sr. Paul, you are famous for encountering monsters ! " Sr. Paul attempted no more to demolish such an adversary with such coarse weapons.

With this brutality, he affected great softness and gallantry, and one day as he went into Ld. Townshend's, a basketwoman offered him a glass of gin. He took it, made her a bow, and drank it. Being asked how he could, he replied, " the lady gave it to me." He was one of those that quarrelled with the court and went into opposition against Sr. R. W., though really disgusted at the Queen, who loved to laugh at affected characters, and did not do it so delicately as Ld. Chest. Yet he went to court, pretended an esteem for Sr. R. and was always teased by the Queen on his reading romances. He was even invited for her to private parties when the King was at Hanover. At those times she often dined with Lady Walpole at Chelsea, and Sr. Paul was always asked, and dined with Sr. R. (for no man sat down to table with the Queen, but conversed with her in the evening at her cards). The last time he was asked, the Queen said, " Well, Sr. Paul, what romance are you reading now ? " He said, " Oh ! Madame, I am tired of them, I have read them all so often ; and I am now got to a very silly study." " What is that ? " said the Queen. " The History," replied he, " of the Kings and Queens of England." He was asked to meet her no more.

Another interesting note relates to the intrigues of the Duchess of Kendal to get Sir Robert Walpole replaced by Lord Bolingbroke in the King's confidence, and gives an amusing picture of George I. carousing at Richmond. These matters had been touched upon in a letter to Sir Horace Mann, written twenty years before. Walpole writes in his Chesterfield :—

The Dss. of Kendal, who did not love Sr. R. W., certainly did introduce Ld. Bol. to George 1st a little before the King's last journey. Ld. Bol. made a long harangue to His Majesty, who said very little ; and Ld. Bol., who had been very apprehensive of not making a sufficient impression, had prepared and left with the K. the substance of what he had said in writing. That paper the King gave to Sr. R. W. as soon as he saw him—a clear proof that the King did not intend to sacrifice the latter to the former, tho Ld. B. persuaded himself, or at least persuaded others, that he was to be Minister on the King's return ; and his friend Earl Berkeley, who conveyed the King to Holland, treated Lord Townshend, who accompanied his Master, as a falling Minister. Sr. R. W. was to his death in possession of Ld. Bolinbroke's memorial. Here is another presumption that the K. did not intend to remove Sr. R. W. He had just made his son Ld. Walpole Ranger of Richmond, and the King used to shoot there and began the Stone Lodge there. While the Ranger's lodge was preparing, Sr. R. hired a small house on Richmond Hill, and the King dined there with him after shooting, and one day got drunk with Punch. The Dss. of Kendal, fearing such moments would give the Minister better opportunities of ingratiating himself with the King, sent General Ilton and another of the Germans with his Majesty the next time he dined with Sr. R. with orders to prevent the King's drinking, which on their interposing to prevent, the King flew into a passion, and called them several gross names in German—and the last thing he said to Sr. R. before he went abroad, was to order him to have the Stone Lodge finished against his return, which did not look as if he parted from his Minister in displeasure. On the publication of these memoirs, I recollected these circumstances, and asked Mr. Th. Townshend Senr., son of Ld. Townshend, about them, and he confirmed my account.—HON. WALPOLE.

I have since consulted Mr. Carey Mildmay of Merks in Essex (now aged about 87 in 1777), he was the intimate friend of Ld. Bol. He told me Ld. Bolinbroke had certainly flattered himself with such hopes, but that he, Mr. Mildmay, had never seen reason to believe that George 1st would make Ld. Bol. his Minister. I had this conversation with Mr. Mildmay at Ld. Dacre's in Bruton Street, March 22d, 1777.—H. W.

FICTION.

THE MANDARIN (Hutchinson, 6s.), by Carlton Dawe, is a well-written sensational story. The persons who figure in it are few, the most important of them being Ting-Foo, a capital specimen of the " heathen Chinese," though he lives at the mission-house and professes Christianity. Cruel and unscrupulous, Ting-Foo nevertheless succeeds in winning our sympathies by his fidelity to the young Englishman who has saved his life. The portrait could not have been drawn by any one who had not an intimate acquaintance with the Chinese character. In his resourcefulness Ting-Foo recalls some of Charles Reade's creations. No matter what may be the combination against him, he is always able to find a way out. When the hero and heroine escaped from the burning mission-house and finally left the Flowery Land behind them, they were right, if only as a matter of policy, to take Ah Sing—we mean Ting-Foo—with them.

The crossing of the Alps by Hannibal and the first steps of his incursion into Italy give the background of ANEROESTES THE GAUL (Unwin, 6s.), by Edgar Maurice Smith. Mr. Smith has hardly succeeded in producing a convincing study of the times. His Numidians, Celtiberians, and the rest are barbarous enough, it is true. The fighting, though given in unnecessary detail, is done with some spirit ; and the characters of Hannibal and his lieutenants are drawn with care and an eye to contrast. But it is impossible to take more than a tepid interest in the fortunes of Anercestes and his captive maiden. Those writers are few indeed who can impart a sense of reality into their reconstruction of such far-off times, and we fear that Mr. Smith is not one of the elect. The style of his writing is inflated, and he tries to display in every sentence his knowledge of the period. An acquaintance with " antiquities " is very well, but it is not sufficient warrant for embarking upon a story of the Punic War. The main idea of the book is original, but the story concludes unsatisfactorily, and in a manner that looks as if the writer himself had grown rather tired of his work. For some inscrutable reason Mr. Smith persistently mis-spells the word testudines.

The name of William Carleton, once known to fame as the " Irish Walter Scott," is barely remembered now in this country, except among those who happen to have read his " Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry." One of his most successful books, THE BLACK PROPHECY, which the author himself considered his best novel, has just been reprinted by Lawrence and Bullen (3s. 6d.), with an introduction by Mr. D. J. O'Donoghue, and illustrations by Mr. J. B. Yeats. Written during the progress of the great famine of 1847, the narrative is woven round the earlier catastrophes of 1817 and 1822. Like all Carleton's works, " The Black Prophet " displays the most intimate acquaintance with the nature of the peasantry, and it has the additional advantage of being almost entirely free from sectarian animosity. It is a powerful story, and its republication should do something to revive the popularity of one of Ireland's greatest novelists.

Miss Mary Hartier shows in her short novel CHAPEL FOLK (James Clarke, 3s. 6d.) that she knows how to tell a story with fluency and skill, but her subject matter is hardly engrossing. The son of a man who had recently become rich and loved the things of this world became a dissenting minister in the west of England where he meets Grace, " the tall, slim, and beautiful " daughter of one of his deacons, and these two are happy ever after. The pictures of the good-hearted chapel folk are well drawn ; the West Country dialect, for once, is truthfully conveyed ; the mild interest of the story is sustained to the end. There is some gentle humour, but nothing very analytical or unexpected. Once, in reading, we thought we had come across a queer touch of character showing that even the hero was not quite perfect. On page 2, the minister is spoken of as " a tall man, looking even younger than his twenty-eight years " ; on page 11, in answer to a deacon's inquiry he says, without a blush, " I am twenty-six." But this seems to mean nothing more subtle than a printer's error.

A DELIVERANCE, by Allan Monkhouse (Lane, 3s. 6d.), is in many ways a remarkable book. It is spun-out, depressing, and introspective to the verge of wearisomeness. But it has a power and integrity and a human interest which will not let one put it down in disgust. It is a valuation of the eternal conflict of the dual nature in man; the warring of the self that aspires with the self that enjoys. In this case a physical disease complicates the struggle. Harry Searls is dying by inches; but two women's lives are mixed up with his. One of them simply represents the attraction of the senses, and in her absence he more than half loathes her; the other is high-minded and intellectual, and stirred by a deep love for him that will not endure to see him sink below himself. For long she saves him from his lower nature; but as his death approaches, her strength and courage weary him with the strain of emulation they induce. "It's wearisome to a degraded brute like me to have these useless, hopeless ideals paraded constantly," says the dying man; and it is to the woman who represents no effort, but only weakness like his own, to whom he clings. For those who have the patience to follow the author to the end, the story will be pregnant with meaning.

It is not easy to praise THE LADY OF CRISWOLD (Greening, 2s. 6d.), by Leonard Outram. Its sensationalism may perhaps please some readers, but it is thoroughly artificial. The plot turns on the fact that Lord Criswold marries a girl who is mad. Though aware of her condition, he yields to the threats of her unnatural mother and her equally unnatural brother. We refuse to believe in such a story. If it is based on anything that ever happened, the author has written fact like fiction. He is not without ability, but in this book it has no outlet.

The Rev. E. A. Sheehan has written, under the guise of a story, a defence of Christianity, from the Roman Catholic standpoint, against the attacks of "Spinozists and Cartesians, Kantians and Fichteans, Hegelians of the right, Hegelians of the left, Baconians and Voltaireans, Pantheists of the shape of Emerson, higher Pantheists, Spencerians, swearers by Schopenhauer, Idealists, Materialists, Sceptics"—rather a formidable task for one man to undertake in a single volume. Still, there would be no objection to it if the conditions were fair, but the opponents set up by Mr. Sheehan are all dummies that tumble at a breath. As a tract THE TRIUMPH OF FAILURE (Burns and Oates, 6s.) might pass muster, for it is clever in its way, but as a novel it is curiously formless, the plot (such as it is) perpetually disappearing beneath the surface, to reappear again, rather to the reader's bewilderment, some considerable distance further on. The atmosphere of the whole is Irish, and the author an Irishman, and in one way the plot is suggestive. The hero enters a lodging-house, and, because the landlady does not instantly welcome him with open arms, loses his temper; he asks for employment at a big shop, giving as his qualification some knowledge of classics, and, when he does not get it, calls the manager "a miserable cad" and is thrown out; he finds, with angry amazement, that the directors support their manager, and is straightway convinced that the whole world is leagued against him, till the affection of a child sets him on his feet again. The book, in fact, throws light upon some phases of Irish history.

THE LOST PROVINCES, by Louis Tracy (Pearson, 6s.), is one of those novels, of which there have been a good many of late, in which the attempt is made to forecast the future course of history. The story, however, was held back for serial publication, and history in the meantime took the liberty of progressing in a direction diametrically opposite to that contemplated by the story-teller. According to Mr. Tracy, Germany picks a quarrel with France and is beaten; while England, though neutral so far as the actual fighting goes, does what she can indirectly to help France and hamper Germany. The contingency might have seemed reasonable three years ago; but a good deal of water—Nile water, in fact—has flowed under the bridge since then. This robs the romance of some of its interest; but the book is none the less a good one of its kind. Some of the fighting is graphically described; and Le Breton's ride—an adventure conceived on the lines of Sheridan's famous raid in the American Civil War—holds the attention well. The book is padded with murder, kidnapping, and similar sensations; but this can be skipped.

With the passage of time Mr. F. Anstey becomes more and more direct and elementary in his imaginative work. LOVE AMONG THE LIONS (Dent, 2s.) reaches the highest state of simplicity. It is a little story of a young "tea-taster" in the City who loves a rather silly lady, living in Canonbury-square. She has "Spanish blood," which is supposed to account for her desire for advertisement and her wish to be married in a lion's cage. But the manner of developing the tale has something of the charm of the author of "Vice Versa," as, for instance, when the hero, who tells the story, says of the houses in Canonbury-square:—

"Some have balconies and verandahs which make it difficult to believe that one has not met them, like their occupiers, at some watering place in the summer."

There are many happy touches of observed character and, for those who like a simple and amusing narrative, with a little complication and a happy ending, "Love Among the Lions" will be satisfying. The book is rather poorly illustrated.

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

THE QUEEN'S STORY-BOOK (Constable and Co., 6s.) is a very good companion volume to Mr. Laurence Gomme's "King's Story-book," issued in 1897. It is described as a collection of historical stories from English romantic literature in illustration of the reigns of English Monarchs from the Conquest to Queen Victoria. The chosen authors include Thackeray, Harrison Ainsworth, G. P. R. James, Bulwer Lytton, Sir Walter Scott, and Mary Shelley, and certainly the result is a collection of fine and telling prose that "grown-ups" will appreciate as much as their juniors. In fact, if the book has a drawback it is that its title and appearance might lead it to be bought for the nursery only. Some of the extracts, too, are decidedly strong meat for babes. There are many illustrations, the print is very fair, and the binding attractive.

KING ALFRED'S VIKING, by Charles Whistler (T. Nelson and Sons, 2s. 6d.), is a very handsome book for the money, well printed and effectively bound. The contents are spirited and readable, and very conscientiously supported by fact wherever that is possible. Mr. Whistler has studied his period and woven his history and his fiction carefully together in this "story of the first English fleet."

AT SEA UNDER DRAKE, by Charles Eden (Skeffington, 6s.), is a rousing tale of "the gentlemen adventurers and sturdy mariners who banded together to harass the Spaniards . . . men who lived clean and honest lives, and who worshipped God. . . ." In other words, it is one more picture of Drake's expedition to the Spanish Main, and on the whole a good and complete one. The book is large and handsome, with illustrations by Mr. Arthur Ellis. The frontispiece is particularly lively, showing two duels, with a sword-point appearing through the back of one of the duellists. We are glad to hear that the next volume in the series will deal with the defeat of the Spanish Armada by Lord Howard of Effingham, though there is nothing in this book to tell us to what "series" Mr. Eden refers.

UNCLE ISAAC'S MONEY, by Emily Finnemore (S.P.C.K., 3s. 6d.), is a tale of avarice and fraud, not too heavily dwelt on, and furnished with plenty of comic relief. The sayings of Hanny Sawyer will amuse readers of most ages, and there is some pathos about the uncouth courtship of Solomon. The book has some fair illustrations by W. S. Stacey, of which the frontispiece is the best.

THE GIRLS OF ST. WODE'S, by L. T. Meade (Chambers, 5s.), is a readable story of girls' life at college; it is a novel in embryo, although the book ends before the giddy world has had time to intrude. Belle is an amusing caricature—not much more—and little Leslie is an attractive young person, as presented by both the author and the artist, Mr. W. Rainey. Girls will enjoy the story.

IN HIS SERVICE, by S. L. G. H. (S.P.C.K., 2s.), has the definitely religious tone that its title leads one to expect, but is not too goody-goody, and, altogether, has merit of a quiet kind and makes pleasant reading.

THE PRINCESS ILSE, by Marie Petersen, well translated by A. M. Deane (Leadenhall Press, 2s. 6d.), is a legend of the Harz Mountains, delicate, charming, poetical, and a little sentimental.

THE SECRETS OF THE NIGHT, translated by F. Ethel Hynam (Elliot Stock), is the first volume in a series of European folk-tales. It is a collection of Estonian tales told simply enough to interest children, yet possessing a value also for the student of folk-lore. Many of the stories are poetical as well as curious, but the illustrations to the volume leave much to be desired.

Correspondence.

THE CONSOLATIONS OF TRUTH.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Dr. Gairdner, in order to explain the consolation of truth, advances a theory in last week's Literature that we know truth from falsehood by a sense of harmony which gives the mind satisfaction. But there is consolation in falsehood and fiction as well as in truth and fact. There are assertions which are satisfactory though false, and there are truths which bring the reverse of satisfaction to the mind. Why does a doctor falsely give hope where there is no hope? Simply to satisfy his patient or his patient's relatives. What satisfaction is there in knowing the worst when you are told the truth that you have cancer in the stomach, and expect to die a disgusting death? None, absolutely none. Nor does the substitution of truth for doubt take away half the sting of an evil, as Dr. Gairdner supposes; on the contrary, a man often bears with an evil because he only half believes in it. We cannot know truth by a sense of satisfaction when satisfaction is absent. How, then, do we know it?

Man has two ways of knowing reality, sense and reasoning from sense; and, in consequence, has the power of arriving at true judgments. Sensory judgments are true when they agree with any reality which is directly perceived by sense; for example, it is true, though unsatisfactory, to judge that I am ill when I really feel ill, and false to judge that I am well, however consoling. Rational judgments are true when they agree with any reality which is logically inferred by reason in many degrees of indirectness from sense, whether with mathematical or with moral certainty. For example, it is true and satisfactory to judge that the Cunard Company has, after all, never lost a ship, and it is equally true to judge that the Mohegan was wrecked on the Manacles by steering a wrong course, although here there is nothing but humiliation to be got out of this truth. In short, known truth is the agreement of our judgments with the realities which we perceive by sense and infer by reason, whether this harmony gives the mind satisfaction or not.

Truth is usually, but not universally, satisfactory. Hence we desire to know it more often than not; and we always desire to know it when we expect that it will satisfy us, either as a means or as an end. We value it for its utility because knowledge gives power, and we value it for its own sake because, as Aristotle says, all men desire knowledge by nature. Man lives by the truth and loves the truth itself. He usually pursues it as usually satisfactory. But we must be careful not to exaggerate this pursuit of it. On the one hand, man's desire of the truth is not identical nor even coincident with his knowledge. Truth is often forced upon him quite involuntarily, and it makes no difference to his knowledge of it whether an involuntary truth is or is not palatable; whether, for example, one hears of an unexpected legacy, or finds that one owes one's tailor £50 instead of £20. There are then involuntary and painful truths which we discover without desire, and know without satisfaction. On the other hand, the desire of the truth is itself limited. Even when we pursue the truth as satisfactory, we sometimes know it without satisfaction. Although we usually desire to know it as usually satisfactory, it sometimes turns out contrary to expectation, as when Bluebeard's wife unlocked the cupboard and found the skeletons of her predecessors. Moreover, we do not always desire to know it at all. One frequently says "Don't tell me," or, "I don't want to know," when one expects that the knowledge of the truth will give no satisfaction to the mind. "Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise." Man stands at a disadvantage in the face of the greatness of nature. It is not for him to choose facts, nor when he will discover them, nor whether they will satisfy him. He is lucky enough if, on the whole, he is satisfied. By sense and reason he is able to know the truth, whether he is satisfied or not, and often he knows it involuntarily, painfully, without any desire to know it beforehand, or any satisfaction to be found in it afterwards, nay, sometimes against his expectation and desire, and when he would much rather have remained in blissful ignorance. He has to assent, to acquiesce, to stop thinking when convinced of the truth of a conclusion; but conviction is not consolation, and to come to a conclusion is not necessarily to become happy. The knowledge of the truth is an intellectual consequence of sense and reason, independent of the practical satisfaction of the mind.

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully,

"THE PEN AND THE BOOK."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have read the correspondence upon the above subject which has appeared in your columns with interest, the more so, perhaps, as it has a tendency to resolve itself into more or less violent attacks upon publishers as a class—rather than upon the dealings of the individual "black sheep" amongst them—and equally unwise defence of them as a class.

It may be presumed that they are neither all angels nor—the other things. I yield to no one in my admiration for Sir Walter Besant and the excellent work he has accomplished in the way of placing literary property upon a clearer and firmer basis. And a close perusal of his facts and figures, taken in conjunction with my own fairly wide experience, has never shown me that his definite statements can be successfully combated. Some authors, alas! who owe him most, and gladly avail themselves of the data he has been the means of furnishing to "make good bargains" on their own behalf, are singularly short-memoried when the apportionment of the credit of their success comes to be made.

I take it that both parties in the present dispute are concerned too much with generalities. On the one hand we have certain correspondents attempting to prove that all publishers are rogues; and, on the other hand, certain others loudly proclaiming that they are philanthropists pure and simple, who seldom make money (the declarations of Somerset House on their deaths to the contrary); and this contention goes hand in hand with many publishers proclaiming their losses, and thus that they are singularly inapt business men. It may be taken for granted that publishers as a whole are not less intelligent in business matters than other men, and that in the past (before the days of the Society of Authors and Sir Walter) they were as "sharp"—with a few honourable exceptions—as the typical Old Bailey lawyer of ancient times.

The point at issue seems to me a very simple one. Publishers have a perfect right to make a good bargain. Authors have an equally perfect right to know with exactness how the terms offered will work out. It is this confusion of issues by the publisher which has given to this question an importance it would otherwise lack. I have read the letter of Mr. E. H. Cooper with attention, because his statement of considerable dealings with some half-dozen firms shows that he has either been singularly fortunate, or, which is possible, unusually astute. He certainly does not need the assistance or advice of the Society of Authors, and it is not intended for such fortunate individuals as he. As to his statement "I find that my experiences are those of all my acquaintances, without exception" (the italics are mine), we are bound to accept the assertion, although one is tempted to ask the names of the publishing firms which Mr. Cooper would lead one to suppose are so obliging that authors (if as astute as he himself) have merely to state their demands to have them complied with. The fact that none of Mr. Cooper's friends have any difficulty or dispute whatever with their publishers is almost incredible, and your correspondent's ignorance as to the status of the members of the Society is extraordinary, if not merely a fin de siècle pose. There certainly are a few members quite capable of saying something on this subject, and something worth hearing. And Sir Walter Besant's protégés—I should not myself apply that description to members of the Society—have a very solid existence in fact, although your correspondent seems to doubt their very existence. Mr. Cooper's letter in reality amounts to nothing, as his experience has admittedly been of the most one-sided nature.

I have had dealings with rather more firms than he, as my work covers a larger field. And the results have been much as might be expected. In three cases I have been treated straightforwardly. That is to say, I have not had either to complain of my bargains or the manner in which the contracts, so far as the publishers were concerned, have been carried out. In the five other cases I have had the greatest difficulty (though three of the firms are well known and long established) in getting accurate or promptly rendered accounts such as one has a right to expect from partners with a controlling interest in a transaction. In two cases I have not succeeded in getting the money due to me until my solicitor's letter brought the offenders to a sense of their position. In one instance I detected fraudulent accounts, in another I found many more copies had been printed of the work than were accounted for to me when royalty was reckoned. This experience may at all events be taken as a set-off against Mr. Cooper's, and I venture to think that it more nearly approximates to the "usual thing," than that he personally details.

Let it be granted once and for all that the publisher—

- (1) Is a business man who is anxious to do as well as possible for himself.
- (2) Is not a philanthropist. All statements to the contrary notwithstanding.
- (3) Is not incapable of framing an agreement in which he has not devoted his chief attention to the author's interests. (Why should he?)
- (4) Sometimes makes a profit on the books he issues.
- (5) Sometimes submits unsatisfactory and one-sided agreements.
- (6) Sometimes takes secret profits.

That the Author is not always—

- (1) A paying speculation. (But this is a risk encountered in other businesses besides that of publisher).
- (2) A person well enough "up" in the details of printing, binding, advertising, and publishing matters generally to protect his own interests. (Hence the raison d'être of the Society of Authors).

—and the war between publishers and their authors could be easily put an end to.

The letter of "A Publisher," with which Mr. Herbert Spencer has dealt fully and conclusively, may well be left where the latter leaves it, except for me to add that I have had proposals to publish on commission from two houses of old repute and untarnished reputation. It can, of course, only answer in the author's case where there can be absolute trust placed in the firms employed to carry out the work.

I would recommend Mr. Cooper to write for information regarding the draft agreements recently proposed by the Publishers themselves. Which agreements few would hesitate to stigmatize as unfair.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

Feb. 1899.

"ONE WHO KNOWS."

MR. SPENCER AND MR. CROZIER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In answer to Mr. Spencer's letter in which he quotes yet another passage from his writings to prove that he is not a Materialist, and asks me whether I think the passage in question could be written by a man who was, I would only say that I have dealt exhaustively with that very passage in pages 179-194 of my "Religion of the Future," and in pages 63-64 of my "Civilization and Progress"; and to these pages I must now with all deference refer him, as it would be quite impossible to reproduce their substance within the limits of a letter. One word only I will here permit myself, and that is, that the nature of a man's philosophy is to be judged not from the name he gives it, but from the nature of the First Principle from which its conclusions are deduced; and that Mr. Spencer deduces all the phenomena of the World and of Life from a fixed quantity of Force, which acts mechanically through the ordinary laws of Motion, he would be himself the last to deny. If that is not a materialistic system of philosophy, then the word for me has lost its meaning. His system, indeed, could not be more materialistic had it been deduced from the Law of Gravitation itself!

JOHN BEATTIE CROZIER.

AN OLD MISQUOTATION.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—When Christopher North, brought down to date in the thousandth number of "Blackwood," drops into Latin with Rem acu tetigisti, the Shepherd gives a timely caution "Whisht, Mr. North; for ony sake keep awa' frae the Lait'n." The caution is taken in good part and for a time remembered. But as the night wears on there comes a pleasant joke on Mr. Gladstone as the last statesman of eminence to quote Latin in public, ultimus Romanorum; then a harmless use of parcus cultor et infrequens; then the beloved of Colonel Newcome, ingenuas didicisse fideliter artes—the speaker prudently pulling up short of the point at which that gallant and amiable cavalry officer came to grief. After this prudence fails, and on ground a little less familiar, the cropper that the Shepherd seems to have anticipated occurs:—Uno avulso non deficit alter.

It was not for the Shepherd to tell Mr. North that this was the motto of a Parisian dentist—the only doubtful point being whether he went on to the next line and added aureus—and that if he had intended to quote Virgil he would have had to be content with Primo. The Shepherd could only repeat in tones of sadness rather than reproach:—"O man, man, can ye no' keep clear o' the Lait'n?"

There is a possible explanation. The quotation may have been made under the influence of one older than Maga who reappears in No. M, and who in other days misquoted similarly. Gibbon, after mentioning that his younger brothers received the same Christian name as he, in order (in the event of his death) to retain the name Edward in the family, wound up with Uno avulso non deficit alter. But Gibbon himself may have been still under the influence of that tutor of whom he records that he remembered that he had a salary to receive and only forgot that he had a duty to perform.

AUSTRALIAN PRIMITIVENESS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In my review of Messrs. Spencer and Gillen's "Natives of Central Australia," I find that I have made an oversight. I take it almost or quite for granted that kindred reckoned in the male line is less primitive than reckoning in the female line. This leaves out of account the foot-note to p. 36 in the book, where the authors argue that, under conditions of "Group Marriage," reckoning in the male line is just as easy as reckoning in the female line, and just as likely to have been adopted first. I see objections to this theory, but I ought to have recognized its existence.

Faithfully yours,

THE REVIEWER.

THE THREE-DECKED PULPIT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In Mr. Alfred Cochrane's very happy lines headed "A Non-Combatant," and appearing in last week's Literature, he makes mention of the "Three-Decked Pulpit," that fast-vanishing tower of strength in the Church.

Can Mr. Cochrane, or any other of your readers, refer me to the origin of the phrase? I have lit upon it once or twice in recently published writings, but would fain discover its birth-place.

Yours faithfully,

February 20.

A LONDON RUSTIC.

Authors and Publishers.

For family reasons no complete life has been hitherto published either of Horace or of James Smith, the witty brothers who made "one of the luckiest hits in literature" with the "Rejected Addresses," which still, after nearly a century, remain the happiest collection of parodies in the language. The life of the two brothers is being written by Mr. Arthur Beavan for Messrs. Hurst and Blackett. Horace was a stockbroker. "Is it not odd," Shelley once said of him, "that the only truly generous person I ever knew who had money enough to be generous with should be a stockbroker? He writes poetry and pastoral dramas, and yet knows how to make money and does make it, and is still generous." James, the elder of the pair, wrote little after the "Rejected Addresses," determined to leave off a winner. He was a very good talker, and the skits he wrote for Charles Mathews drew from the actor the remark that "he was the only man who could write clever nonsense."

The next volume of the "Wolseley" Series, edited for Messrs. Kegan Paul by Captain James, will be "Cromwell as a Soldier," by Major Baldock. Presumably it will cover Cromwell's army administration as well as his actual leadership in the field. Carlyle's "Cromwell" is also to be issued shortly in a new edition by Messrs. Methuen, with notes and additions which will make the reader acquainted with the fresh lights that have been thrown upon the Protector's times and character since Carlyle wrote. Mr. S. R. Gardiner's monograph on Cromwell is also announced by Messrs. Goupil.

Climbing books seem to be popular just now. There have been a good many already published during the autumn and winter, and Mr. Fisher Unwin announces two more. One is the climbing reminiscences of Mr. W. Norman Néruda, who was killed last September in the Dolomites during an attempted ascent of the Fünffingerspitze, one of the most difficult and dangerous ascents in the Austrian Tyrol. Mr. Néruda, who was a son of Lady Hallé, was a member of both the English and the Austrian Alpine Clubs, and a climber of great experience. At the time of his death he was making arrangements for an expedition to the Himalayas.

Another Alpine book intended for publication in the Spring is "The Early Mountaineers," by Mr. Francis Gribble. It covers the history of climbing, so far as the Alps, the Pyrenees, and the Apennines are concerned, from the attempts on the Roche Melon, related by a Latin chronicler of the time of the Norman conquest, to the Oberland ascents of the Meyers at the beginning of the present century. Among the climbers whose exploits are narrated are included Conrad Gesner, Scheuchzer, Petrarch, Leonardo da Vinci, Marc-Théodule Bourrit, Jean André de Luc, Father Placidus à Spescha, Count Morozzo, Razio Delfico, M. de Candale, Bishop of Aire in Gascony, and Ramond de Carbonnière. The illustrations are taken from old prints and various old mountaineering tracts, such as Gesner's "Descriptio Montis Fracti," and the Procès Verbal of the ascent of Mont Aiguille in 1492 are reproduced in the original language.

Apropos of the steady popularity of Alpine books, it seems worth while to point out that there are several interesting ones which are out of print, and might advantageously be reprinted. King's "Italian Valleys" and Mr. Girdlestone's "High Alps Without Guides" are two instances. Mr. Justice Wills' "Wanderings among the High Alps"—containing the description of what is generally accounted the first sporting climb—is a third; and others will readily suggest themselves to every student of the subject.

Sir Edward Grey is now joining the ranks of author-Parliamentarians. His book on angling will be the opening volume of the Haddon Library, which the Marquess of Granby and Mr. George A. B. Dewar are editing for Messrs. Dent, and it will appear during March. It is to deal with fly-fishing for trout, sea trout, and salmon in various parts of the country, from the Hampshire chalk streams to the Shetland voes. It will not be a technical or purely practical work, although it will contain hints and suggestions in regard to both dry and wet fly-fishing, tackle, stocking rivers, and other matters of importance to anglers. Sir Edward was a keen angler for trout before he went to Winchester, but it was at that place that he first gained an insight into the really scientific side of trout fishing, and the book will no doubt tell us a good deal about the large and well-educated trout of the Itchen. This book is to be illustrated by Mr. William Hyde, Miss Jessie Macgregor, and other artists, and the edition de luxe will be strictly limited to 150 copies. The second volume of the Haddon Library series of country life books will be Dean Hole's book on gardens, and the third Mr. George A. B. Dewar's on wild life and sport in Hampshire.

* * * *

More than 100,000 copies have already been ordered of the sixpenny edition of "With Kitchener to Khartum." After the first orders of the booksellers have been supplied this edition will not be further reprinted. The book which Mr. G. W. Stevens is writing on his experiences in India will be published, like all his previous works, by Messrs. Blackwood.

* * * *

Mr. Burleigh is publishing for Mr. J. C. Bailey a volume of Essays dealing with eight of the great English letter writers. Some of them have already appeared in the Quarterly, the Fortnightly, and elsewhere, while others now appear for the first time. The title of the book is "Studies in some Famous Letters."

* * * *

The Rev. Charles Taylor, whose published works vary from one on Geometrical Conics of 1863 to the account of the first ascent of Monte Rosa from Italy, has in hand, for the Clarendon Press, an essay on the Oxyrhynchus Logia, discovered by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt, founded on a lecture given at Oxford; for the Cambridge University Press he is preparing some Palimpsests from the Genizah of Old Cairo, including a Fragment of Origen's "Hexapla," and also, in conjunction with Professor Schechter, a work to be entitled "The Wisdom of Ben Sira," portions of the Hebrew of Ecclesiasticus found in the Cairo Genizah Collection lately presented to Cambridge University by the editors.

The Principal of the London College of Music, Dr. Frederick J. Karn, is now writing a series of Text Books on the several subjects of musical theory—counterpoint, harmony, musical form, and so forth. With Mr. G. Augustus Holmes, Dr. Karn has prepared a book on musical history, which will shortly be published by Messrs. Weekes, who are also bringing out a series of the classical pianoforte works with special annotations by the same authors.

Mr. Rowland Ward announces "The Great and Small Game of Africa," as a companion volume to "Deer of all Lands" and "Wild Oxen, Sheep, and Goats of all Lands." The editor is Mr. H. A. Bryden, and nearly all the letterpress will be contributed by well-known sportsmen, including Sir Harry Johnston and Mr. F. C. Selous. The book, will be printed on art paper, in quarto form, and a subscription edition not exceeding 500 copies, will be issued at £5 5s.

The Dean of Ely's new volume of verse will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin shortly. The title will be "Bryhtnoth's Prayer and other Poems." The title-piece of the book appears in our issue of to-day.

A book by Mr. G. Firth Scott will shortly be published by Messrs. Sampson Low entitled "The Romance of Australian Exploring." Mr. Firth Scott is at present engaged on a story, typically Australian, dealing with bush and mining life.

Mr. Kipling (of whose illness we are sorry to hear) is becoming popular in Paris. We have already referred to the efforts of M. Robert d'Humières and M. Louis Fabulet to reveal him to French readers. And now his "Light that Failed" is being translated by Mme. Charles Laurent, and will be published this summer by the Figaro.

The Professor of English History in the University of Minnesota, Mr. Richard Burton, is preparing for the press a book on the English language, called "The Mother Tongue: Its Trials and Triumphs." Professor Burton will also have ready for autumn publication his third volume of poems.

Professor Mark Baldwin, of Princeton University, is issuing, through Messrs. Macmillan, a second edition of his "Social and Ethical Interpretations," the work which was awarded the gold medal of the Royal Academy of Denmark last year. It is also appearing in French and German. Professor Baldwin's little work the "Story of the Mind," written for the Useful Story Series, and recently issued in London by Messrs. Newnes, has already appeared on the American side from the press of Messrs. Appleton. Messrs. Macmillan now announce that the "Dictionary of Philosophy and Psychology," which they are preparing under the editorship of Professor Baldwin, with the help of an international corps of contributors, is nearing completion, and that the first of the three proposed volumes will probably appear before the end of the year. Professor Baldwin spent most of last summer in England and Scotland making final arrangements for the articles to be written by British authorities.

Mr. Fisher Unwin announces the first volume of "The Works of Frederick Nietzsche," containing "The Genealogy of Morals" and Mr. Gray's translation of the "Poems." Meanwhile, Mr. William Reeves is publishing another English version of the First Part of Nietzsche's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Mr. Thomas Common, who boldly calls Nietzsche "the most important philosophical writer of the century." The following extract from his preface may give the reader some idea of Mr. Thomas Common's philosophical attitude:—

The fact is that almost any page of Nietzsche's writings is worth more than dozens of volumes of the ethical trash, such as Muirhead's "Elements of Ethics" and Seth's "Study of Ethical Principles," which are thrust into the hands of unfortunate students at the universities. The former writer has studied the half-crazy Berkeley and his stupid followers so long that he thinks the world is a dream and not a reality, except when his self-interest is concerned; and as for the latter work, the first page of it is suggestive of its author as a big, goody-good boy, tied to his mother's apron-strings; while his ignorance of what goes on outside his own clique corroborates the truth of the impression. Nietzsche's ethics, however, are not the ethics for boys, nor for old women, nor for dreamers either; they are the ethics for full-grown men, for noble, strong, wide-awake men, who shape the world's destiny. Too many of the professional philosophers nowadays are cowardly, cringing sneaks, mere hucksters, who retail pseudo-philosophy to suit the demands of the ignorant and vulgar parvenus, like the Hooleys, Barnatos, Liptons, Rockafellers (sic), &c., who endow colleges that they may have their degraded, prejudices flattered, and thus have an easy conscience. Professional philosophy is at present quite out of touch with the best thought of the age. It will not be always so, however. A true system of philosophy will triumph ere long.

Dr. Edmund J. James, of the University of Chicago, for ten years on the editorial staff of the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, first as editor-in-chief and later as assistant, has retired from the editorial board. His removal from the University of Pennsylvania to the University of Chicago made it impossible for him to continue in the active control of the Annals, which, under his management, has won for itself a prominent place among the special journals devoted to economics and politics. Fifteen years ago there was no journal published in English comparable to such German periodicals as Hildebrand's Jahrbücher der National Oekonomie und Statistik, or even the French Journal des Economistes. Now we have not only the English Economic Journal (London), but the quarterly Journal of Economics (Cambridge, Mass.), Political Science Quarterly (New York), Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science (Philadelphia), and Journal of Political Economy (Chicago), each of which has attained a large circulation.

"The Index to the Names in the Mahabharata," by Dr. S. Sørensen, the prospectus of which has been issued by Messrs. Williams and Norgate, will not only contain references to all the names in the Mahabharata—resembling in this respect the indices of FitzEdward Hall to Wilson's translation of the Vishnu-Purana, of Professor Oldenberg's to Vinaya Pitaka, and others equally well known—but a short explanation in each case, showing the nature of the reference.

A volume of Translations in Italian Verse, after D. G. Rossetti, is being published in Florence. It will include translations of "The Last Confession," "Sister Helena," "The Staff and Scip," and some lyrics and sonnets from the "House of Life." The translations are by Mr. Antonio Agresti, son-in-law of Mr. W. M. Rossetti, who also provides an introductory essay on English Painting and the Life and Work of D. G. Rossetti.

Miss Beatrice Harraden's new story will be ready in April; the title is taken from a passage in the Psalms—it will be called "The Fowler."

Mr. George Moore has on several occasions rewritten his works, and he is now engaged in revising "Evelyn Innes."

E. Livingston Prescott's new novel, "Helot and Hero," is announced for March 14th. It is semi-military, and will form a companion volume to "Scarlet and Steel," now in its fourth edition. The scene of the closing chapters is the North-West frontier of India. Simpkin, Marshall are the publishers.

In Mr. Morley Roberts' new novel, "A Son of Empire," which Messrs. Hutchinson are publishing, the two chief characters in the book are supposed to be portraits of Sir Richard and Lady Burton.

Senkiwicz has just completed a new novel entitled "The Knight of the Sacred Cross." It deals with Napoleon's Russian Campaign.

We understand that the proprietor of the Pall Mall Magazine has commissioned Mr. William Archer to go to the United States to write a series of articles on the stage in America.

M. Edouard Rod left Havre last Saturday, the 18th, for New York. He is to deliver a course of eight lectures at Harvard on French dramatic poetry. He will also visit Columbia and Yale.

M. Pierre Louys has gone to Algeria to finish a study of Arab manners. The title of the new volume which will not be ready before April will be "Orientale."

A translation of Walter Pater's "Imaginary Portraits," with an introduction by Mr. Arthur Symonds, has just been brought out by the Mercure de France. The same house has just brought out new volumes of verse by M. Emile Verhaeren and M. de Regnier.

The next number of the Contemporary will contain an article by Mr. W. J. Stillman on the Peace question, which should be of importance as being informed by his confidential relations for some years past with political personages of the highest position on the continent and his intimacy with Austrian politics for forty years.

Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish next Monday the account of the destruction of the Maine, as told by her captain, Charles D. Sigsbee. He will also publish, early in April, a collection of Australian stories and sketches, entitled "By Creek and Gully," edited by Mrs. Fisher, formerly of Rockhampton, Queensland. Among the contributors to this volume will be most of the well-known Australian writers in London, including Mr. Louis Becke, Mr. H. B. Marriott Watson, Mr. E. W. Hornung, Mr. Douglas Sladen, Mr. Hume Nisbet, Mr. and Mrs. Patchett Martin, Mrs. Campbell Praed, and Mrs. Mannington Caffyn ("Iota").

Among Mr. Fisher Unwin's other announcements are "A Literary History of Ireland," by Dr. Douglas Hyde; "The Welsh People: their Origin, Language, and History," edited by Professor Rhys and Mr. D. B. Jones, Q.C.; "Napoleon's Invasion of Russia," by Mr. H. B. George; and "Fifty Years of the Republic in South Africa," 1795-1845, by Dr. C. J. Voigt.

Among the books in active preparation at the Clarendon Press are Part I. of "The Peshitto Version of the Gospels," edited by G. H. Gwilliam; "Sancti Irenaei Novum Testamentum," edited by Dr. Sanday; An Introduction, by Dr. Francis Paget, to "The Fifth Book of Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity"; the last two volumes (III. and IV.) of Mr. W. L. Newman's edition of "The Politics of Aristotle"; "Homer, Odyssey XIII.-XXIV.," by the Provost of Oriel; and "Xenophon, Hellenica," by Mr. G. E. Underhill. In the series of Oxford Classical Texts, "Æschylus," by Mr. A. Sidgwick; "Thucydides," vol. I., by Mr. H. Stuart Jones; and "Plato," vol. I., by Mr. J. Burnet.

They also announce "Letters of Ricardo to Trower," edited by

Mr. James Bonar and Mr. J. H. Hollander; the second series of Dr. Moore's "Studies in Dante"; "A Summary Catalogue of Bodleian MSS.," vol. V., by Mr. F. Madan; "The Complete Works of John Gower," edited by Mr. G. C. Macaulay; "The Plays and Poems of Robert Greene," edited by Mr. J. C. Collins; "Milton's Poetical Works," edited by Mr. H. C. Beeching; and "Dryden's Critical Essays," edited by Professor W. P. Ker. "Modern Land Law," by Mr. E. Jenks; "Italy and Her Invaders," by Dr. Thomas Hodgkin, vol. VII. (completing the work); and vols. VII. and VIII. of the late Mr. Thorold Rogers' "History of Agriculture and Prices."

In the series of Anecdota Oxoniensia we are to have Firdausi's "Yūsuf and Zalikhā," edited by Mr. H. Ethé; Bale's "Index Britanniae Scriptorum," edited by Mr. R. L. Poole and Mary Bateson; and "Old English Glosses," edited by A. S. Napier, are in preparation.

A novel by Mrs. Hobhouse, author of "An Unknown Quantity," is being published by Messrs. Skeffington. It will bear the title "Warp and Weft," and will tell a story of life among the Scotto-Irish peasantry of Ulster.

Sir George Trevelyan has accepted an invitation to dine with the members of the Authors' Club on Monday, March 27. The chair will be taken by Lord Monkswell.

Messrs. W. Thacker and Co. ask us to state that Hunter's Gazetteer is to be had from them only, as they have purchased the stock from Mr. Quaritch.

FORM IN POETRY.

The most interesting event in pure literature this winter has unquestionably been the publication of Mr. Hardy's "Wessex Poems." We have already noticed this volume in the usual course, but it presents certain features which suggest to us considerations of a particular kind. These poems were an entirely unexpected apparition. Their author is one of the five or six living writers of prose who may be said to have entered into their rest, to have risen into an eminence unassailable by the fluctuations of fashion. The poems were received, at the first moment, with the curiosity due to the freak of a man of genius, as though Mr. George Meredith were to invite his friends to inspect a small collection of his bronze medallions, or Mr. Swinburne to take the place of Mr. Paderewski at the piano. But it was immediately found that the "Wessex Poems" were independently good of their kind, and characteristic of Mr. Hardy's individuality to a remarkable degree. They were very moving, entertaining, satisfactory compositions as poetry. Only there was something wrong with them, or unusual about them—a puzzling quality. What was this? The reviewers, in a chorus, have decided that it was "want of form."

This does not seem very luminous; and we turn again to "Beneath a knap where flown" and to "Friends Beyond" to see how far this formula helps us to understand what is wanting in these very delightful pieces. Perhaps it does help us as much as any other formula, although it needs to be defined. Here is no example of that positive inability to write well in verse which has marked several great prose writers, such as in Carlyle and Hume; nor of that still more curious ability to write once or twice well, and never to regain the careless rapture, as in Berkeley and Chateaubriand. The phenomenon is other. In Mr. Hardy we have a copious poet, with a strongly-marked and appropriate accent of his own, composing (so to speak) professionally in verse, able to amuse and move us along lines strictly parallel with his prose, and yet lacking something. This is not a case like George Eliot's, where the essence of the writer's style evaporates in the restraint of verse. Never was Mr. Hardy more intensely and exclusively himself than in "My Cicely." Yet is this a complete success? Much as we admire it, we cannot say that it is.

And by Weatherbury Castle, and thence Through Casterbridge bore I
To tomb her whose light, in my deeming, Extinguished had He, is not quite satisfactory. Why? Simply and solely because the form is grotesque. Here is the colour of poetry but not its sound, its essence but not its shape.

A French critic, whose dictum it is impossible to accept, has said that a perfect poem must appeal to all the five senses at once, that it must be "sapide—odorante—sonore—visible—tangible." It is difficult to believe that this gentleman is a sincere seeker after truth. But it is quite true that there is something synthetic about completed verse, that it must reflect several facets of the ideal Beauty. Perhaps it is a little less fantastic to say that it must present us with a mosaic of beautiful qualities, and that these in their combination are what we call "form." There must be an appeal to the eye and to the ear, an idealization of reality in music, a realization of the ideal in plasticity. And all these qualities, with those of the intellect and the character intermingled with them, must be harmonized and balanced. There must not be serried, emphatic speech at the expense of melody; there must not be sensation at the expense of reflection. Perhaps we begin to see why the "Wessex Poems," with characteristics which raise them above a hundred volumes of excellent verse, are not entirely satisfactory. They are lop-sided; they bulge or collapse where they should present a globular perfection. It is interesting that Mr. Hardy should have waited until now before he published them, since he could have found at no moment in forty years a more apt occasion than this for their appearance. And it is this to which we desire, without praise or blame, to draw the attention of our readers. This is a moment when form is less considered in English poetry than it has been, perhaps, since the opening of the Early Victorian period. At the close of each impassioned poetical movement there comes a time when form is no longer valued, when it is even scorned and reviled. After the Elizabethans came the degradation of verse which made the "short, sharp shock" of the classical couplet absolutely necessary. After the great romantic age of Byron and Wordsworth came the love for shapeless lyrical dramas of the "Festus" class. Perfection of form, when it is no longer informed by passion, is a source of weariness, and writers try to secure sensation by steadily neglecting executive adroitness.

When Poe, no mediocre judge, first read the Tennyson of 1833, he said that the writer of these lyrics was not only a great poet, but the greatest who had ever lived. Wiseacres have shaken their heads for generations over this violent dictum, which (of course) was not meant to be taken literally. But what Poe, himself a writer exquisitely sensitive to form, meant was that Tennyson's poems showed a combination of the qualities which go to make up the harmony of poetic utterance, of its kind unparalleled in English literature. It is probable that he was right in thinking so, and we may admit it without dreaming of endorsing his stated position. Tennyson was not the greatest poet who ever lived, but—and this is now apt to be somewhat overlooked—he possessed the qualities of poetic form in more perfect balance than any other. What Tennyson wanted, as we begin to see, was heat; he never quite burns. But if all his melody, and colour, and tenderness, and stateliness, and delicacy had been run up to a slightly higher temperature throughout, he would have been the greatest of poets. He did not race, to change the simile, quite hard enough, but he was in the centre of the course. The dominance of Tennyson drew the attention of the younger poets to the necessity of cultivating form. He seemed to have very little influence on the genius of Rossetti, of Matthew Arnold, and of Mr. Swinburne, yet his presence there, like a beacon, warned them of the reefs which await a neglect of colour, of lucidity, of music. The little group of poets which followed that generation—poets now greatly out of fashion, but, doubtless, destined to rediscovery—gave almost excessive attention, like their contemporaries, the Parnassians in France, to the mint and anise and cummin of form. Their rhymes and cadences were impeccable; they chose their words like jewels; and the vintage was sometimes rather thin in their fantastic Venetian glass. To this day, Mr. Austin Dobson, the most notable member of the group, is so remarkable for the perfection of his form, that some of his pieces—for instance, the little set of dramas in lyric, called "Proverbs in Porcelain"—could not conceivably be improved by the transposition of a single word. This is the culmination of poetic art, when it regards form as the essential thing.

Our new poets have marked the course of an interesting reaction. Mr. William Watson, who belongs by age to the end of the generation just described, has carried away from it an academic precision in form, without any preoccupation with its refinements. He is transitional. But by those still younger than he we find the "rules"—the formulas of art—more and more disregarded, and poems now receive appreciation for their vigour, or their intensity, or for their human interest, which would, twenty-five years ago, have been universally reprimanded as ragged. Through all the age of strict cultivation of form Robert Browning flourished, a sturdy and unconscious heretic; but Browning is a curious specimen of genius, difficult to class, because he possessed form in several directions, and could occasionally display it in those others in which he was rashly supposed to be deficient. The truth about Browning is that, occupied and entertained by the substance of what he was saying, he very rarely troubled himself about the form. He is the one exception in which it is not ridiculous to say, in the old saw, "He would have done better had he taken more pains." We have the impression that Mr. Hardy has taken immense pains, as every artist should. But he does not possess that plasticity which, to take a lighter example, Mr. Gilbert eminently displays in the best of his comic ballads and operas. The Bunthorne and Grosvenor duet in Patience, "Conceive me if you can," may not be a very lofty piece of imaginative art, but it displays in their quintessence the qualities which Mr. Hardy's verse lacks, the absolute mastery over diction, the ear that never makes a mistake, the knack which simply courts impossibilities for the sake of overcoming them at a touch. It seems only right that in the face of a volume of verse so violent and rugged as "Wessex Poems" we should protest that this is not the more excellent way of writing poetry. At the same time, every man must preserve his individuality, if he has one to preserve, as Mr. Hardy most assuredly has; and we have no reason to suppose that it is the desire of the author of "The Peasant's Confession" to found a school or issue a propaganda. On the contrary, it is far more likely that he has put forth his Wessex verses with extreme simplicity and modesty, not asking himself in what relation they stand to other people's poetry. As a matter of fact, the "Wessex Poems" will probably enjoy a double fate. They will supply to lovers of emotional narrative verse several poetic tales which they will lay up in memory among their treasures; and in time to come, professors of literary history, when observing the retrogression of an imaginative period, and when speaking of Lydgate, of Donne, of the Spasmodists here, of the Symbolists in France, will mention Mr. Hardy also as a signal example of the temporary success of a violent protest against the cultivation of form in verse.

We review elsewhere, as a first instalment, two books by an American and an Englishman on the campaign in Cuba. This is only the beginning of what promises to be a voluminous literature of the war, which comes as a godsend to the American book world. It needed the fillip which the actualities of war and adventure—seldom absent from our own publishers' lists—can alone supply. But the numerous American officers, who are as ready to wield the pen as the sword, and to write their own account of their achievements, are certainly "something fresh." Possibly they have yielded to the blandishments of publishers only in order to secure, like Cæsar, an accurate, authoritative account of their campaigns; and the only further step to be taken is for commanders to be their own newspaper correspondents. Lord Kitchener is credited with the remark that he meant to be the only general who had not written a book. The thought represents, we fancy, a prejudice which will deter English commanders from imitating their American brethren. But there is no saying to what the rage for publicity may lead officers in charge of our frequent minor campaigns, and we may yet see Sir Walter Besant installed at the War Office to advise on royalties and sales of copyright.

The most striking feature in the bookselling world at the present moment is not the discovery of a new poet, not the appearance of a novel for which the world has been waiting twenty years, or of the sensational record of travel real or fictitious, but the unprecedented sale of a religious tract written by the pastor of a church at Topeka, Kansas. There are one or two very curious things about the publication and the success of "In His Steps: or, What would Jesus do?" (Ward, Lock.) One is its extraordinary origin, which supplies rather an alarming precedent. Instead of completing it and then publishing it in the ordinary way, Mr. Sheldon, the writer, tried it on his congregation first, and read it out to them on successive Sunday evenings—presumably in the place of a sermon. Another fact which will, we fancy, have some bearing on the vexed question of international copyright is that the book, having been published and won a large sale in America, has been caught up in England and told out to the public in an immense number of editions—seventeen, we believe, of which eleven appeared in one week—religious and secular publishers competing keenly with each other in the enterprise.

But the mere novelist, who would fain make a hit himself, may well invite the Topeka minister to tell his secret. The secret is not, as a matter of fact, easily communicable. The book has some literary merit; so have other, though not all, modern novels. Its success is due partly to its sincerity and its enthusiasm—qualities not so easily acquired. But the subject and its treatment have a much larger share in its success. Such books as "Robert Elsmere" and "John Ward, Preacher" taught us long ago that, if it can but strike just the one right note, nothing can secure a greater vogue than the religious novel. If it can cut boldly and deeply into the heart of some living problem—and to do this requires some enthusiasm—such a book can soon run into many editions. The gospel of "In His Steps" is, broadly, Christian Socialism; and its popularity is, we confess, a rather surprising witness to the vitality of interest in social questions. But what is still more significant is that a book of this kind, selling at every book store here and in America, reveals no trace even of the existence of the agnostic, and recognizes no "difficulties" but those of conduct.

The death of Baron Reuter recalls an epoch in the history of newspapers which chroniclers of our social life have too much ignored. The full reports of Parliamentary debates which began at the end of the last century, the introduction of steam printing in 1814, the reduction of the stamp duty in 1836, the beginning of the cheap press ten years later—none of these changes was more fruitful than the opening in 1851 of a little office at the Royal Exchange called Reuter's Office. A few papers which were able to afford it had their own correspondents in different capitals. Reuter established agents everywhere who fed with news every paper in the Kingdom. Just as the London penny-a-liner can only earn a living by "manifolding" his copy and sending it to half-a-dozen or more papers at the same time, so Reuter made his fortune by sending the same news to every newspaper that was willing to pay the low rates he asked for it. Reuter began in England, and the whole system of press agencies has flourished in England, because England has a free Press; and Reuter has played no small share in consolidating the Empire, and in enabling a democratic country to conduct a foreign policy, through the simple means of providing its public with full and accurate information.

The recent policy adopted by the literary and intellectual adherents of the Ligue de la Patrie Française suggests the inquiry, Which branch of letters affords the best training for the literary man who aspires to a political life? Criticism—as we admit with regret in a journal devoted to criticism—has not turned out men capable of retaining the courage of their convictions in the presence of the police. When the police began arresting, MM. Brunetière and Jules Lemaitre—erstwhile so truculent—proceeded, at once, to repudiate their fellow Leaguers: a course which indicates somewhat too marked a preference for the better part of valour. Poetry, as represented by M. François Coppée, hardly comes better out of the ordeal. M. Coppée, we understand, has reconsidered his position, and decided with the rapidity of genius that he is unsuited to a political career. Melodrama, in the person of M. Paul Déroulède, the playwright, has done a little better; but the one man of letters who has really stuck to his guns seems to be M. Quesnay de Beaurepaire, who has withdrawn nothing and apologized for nothing, and, at the hour of writing, is still threatening revelations which will compromise the few Dreyfusards whom he has not already exposed. M. Quesnay de Beaurepaire's precise place in literature, however, is that of a writer of short stories which Browning's adjective "scabrous" perhaps most appropriately qualifies. Are we to conclude that this is the kind of literary exercise that makes most powerfully for strength and stability of character among our neighbours?

Reviews.

Periods of European Literature: the Fourteenth Century. By F. J. Snell. 7½ × 5¼ in., xi. + 428 pp. London, 1899. Blackwood. 5/- n.

It is difficult to know how better to describe this volume than to say that it is the rough scaffolding of a large work. If a literary architect were engaged in composing an exhaustive monograph on the literature of Europe in the fourteenth century, he would set about it by constructing, for his own private eye, some such temporary structure of note-books as this. A sense of the inadequacy of the materials at his disposition, or rather of the hopeless lack of space, seems to have struck Mr. Snell when he could no longer draw back. He says, with modesty, "the writer entered on the undertaking, not only with much trepidation, but with some amount of misapprehension. When at last the real nature of the enterprise dawned upon him, he was already too deeply committed to withdraw from it." These are not hopeful words to meet the reader on the threshold of a book, but they are absolutely justified by the result. Mr. Snell seems to have considerable learning and some taste, but he has not produced a book which can be called satisfactory.

There are only two ways in which a history of literature in the fourteenth century, in 400 small pages, could have been made serviceable, and neither has commended itself to Mr. Snell. He might have compiled a work, mainly of bibliography, stuffed close with dates and facts; or he might have written an essay on the subject, broad and luminous, the parts moulded together by distance. He has, unfortunately, slipped between these two stools; his book is too discursive to be referred to as an authority, and it is too didactic and scrappy to be read with enjoyment. It is neither science nor literature, but something amorphous, lying between the two, a framework destined never to be filled in, and of itself not in any high or positive degree valuable. He has been unwilling to incur the accusation of ignorance by leaving anything unmentioned, and so we loiter over the "Hervararsaga" and the "Disciplina clericalis," while there is no room to put the truth plainly about Chaucer. We shall be accused of underrating the difficulty of the task; but what was Dr. Johnson's answer to the lady who excused her daughter's musical exercise on the same grounds?

Where Mr. Snell is best equipped is in Italian, and of Italian poetry he seems to have made close and independent studies. His chapter on Dante is the best in the book, and suggests that if Mr. Snell confines himself to tasks less hopeless than the one to which he has the misfortune to be chained on this occasion, he may do excellent work. The key of the century lies in the hand of Dante, and Mr. Snell is so far well equipped that he knows his "Divina Commedia" well. We can but reflect—and this would have been a useful theme for the writer of a broad essay on Mr. Snell's subject—what it is which constitutes the change of attitude towards the fourteenth century in critical opinion during the last hundred or hundred and fifty years. The eighteenth century detested the fourteenth; it could away with neither its architecture nor its painting, its poetry nor its prose. Mr. Snell quotes, almost without comment, Voltaire's curious depreciation in "Le Dictionnaire Philosophique."

He had no space at his command, of course, to go further into this question, but Voltaire's language about "le Dante," as he calls him, is worthy of closer consideration. We are wrong if we suppose that he thrusts the Italian poet contemptuously away; he felt him to be a force, but one profoundly inimical. In the "Essai sur les mœurs" he concedes that the "Commedia" is "un poème bizarre, mais brillant de beautés naturelles." He is less happily advised when he says, "Dante pourra entrer dans la bibliothèque des curieux: il ne sera jamais lu. On ne vole toujours un tome de l'Arioste, on ne m'a jamais volé un Dante." He would be astonished nowadays to find Dante far more eagerly and constantly read than Ariosto, and even, no doubt, than Voltaire himself. He might blush to learn that he had been so careless a reader as to confound the chivalrous Lancelot (Lancilotto) with the jealous husband of Francesca di Rimini (Lanciotto). He does "score," perhaps—if "scoring" in this connexion be worth while—when he says that for Virgil to describe himself to Dante as a Lombard is like making Homer call himself a Turk.

In a recent monograph on "Voltaire et l'Italie" M. Eugène Bouvy has started an ingenious theory as to the instinctive dislike of the eighteenth to the fourteenth century. He attributes it to an inevitable antipathy for the mysterious in the minds of men brought up in the principles of Descartes and of Locke. The elements which composed the imagination of the great writers in whom the Middle Ages closed were magnificent, but they were arbitrary and disorganized. What the Cartesian school had taught its pupils was to love lucidity, regularity, and reason; to such scholars the poems and legends of the fourteenth century, like its churches and its dark enthusiasms, would seem merely obscure and distressing, unworthy of the attention of a philosopher. In nothing have we changed so much as in the width of our intellectual sympathies. On the causes of this change, in its direct bearing on the fourteenth century, Mr. Snell might have written an interesting chapter. But his is unfortunately one of those cases in which you cannot see the wood for the trees.

An immense ground is covered by Mr. Snell's framework. He passes from Sweden to Wales and from Holland to Sicily with an equal confidence. He says that he is "exceedingly backward in Icelandic," yet he shows no lack of fluency in dealing with the fornsögur, and although his "Welsh is even more elementary," he shrinks not from a criticism of the Bards. We do not mean to be disagreeable in mentioning these facts, but the truth is that no man living is learned enough to express an independent opinion on all the languages and all the literatures over which Mr. Snell magisterially flits. It is quite obvious that such a book as this must be in a measure a mere compilation, and the reader asks, Where does the second or third hand information begin or end? To this there is no reply, and, for our own part, we are inclined to believe that Mr. Snell does injustice to his actual acquirements by pretending to be such a perfect Mezzofanti of languages and dialects.

We feel that we are ungracious, but the truth must be said. We hope to hear from Mr. Snell again, and we are confident that, with a theme better suited to his powers, he will produce what we shall read with instruction and perhaps with pleasure. But it would be untrue to pretend that the work before us is satisfactory. It is, in the first place, not interesting. We have facts, conclusions, dates, but we have neither thought nor the result of thought. If we are told that we forget how small a book this is, and of how wide a subject it treats, we reply that there lies the art of the practised writer. The late Mr. Freeman published a "History of the World" on a much smaller scale than Mr. Snell's present book, and it was a success. We may go further and say that it remains a little masterpiece. But then it was illuminated with knowledge, and the treatment was a triumph of breadth and proportion. In the second place, style is pre-eminently needed to give life to a book of this class. Mr. Snell is too ready to pay out the clichés of criticism, the old worn epithets. He has dreadful little vulgarisms—"as your milliner might define it"—when he is talking of the style of Petrarch! He has a positive talent for culminating in the wrong phrase, and leads up a just discrimination of the "Paradiso" to the word "rhapsody," when what he means is obviously "rapture." These and other blemishes are unquestionably the result of inexperience, and Mr. Snell, when he has realized that human erudition has its limits, will doubtless settle down to some modester task than chronicling the literature of the Tower of Babel.

FIGHTING IN THE WEST INDIES.

No doubt it was due to the later intervention and, for Englishmen, of course, the closer personal interest of the Sudanese campaign that the war between the United States and Spain has in this country been so far unfruitful of reprinted journalistic narratives from the pens of eye-witnesses. Mr. Richard Harding Davis laid us under a certain obligation by his account of the Diamond Jubilee; but to his glorified reporting in THE CUBAN AND PORTO RICAN CAMPAIGNS (Heinemann, 7s. 6d. n.) most Englishmen will prefer the plain unvarnished tale contained in THE WAR IN CUBA (Smith, Elder, 6s.). Its author, Mr. J. B. Atkins, acted as special correspondent of the Manchester Guardian at the Western seat of war, and in that capacity visited successively Florida, Cuba, and Puerto Rico. His purpose, as described by him in the preface, was to "supplement rather than convey news of the war," and, "no doubt," he adds, "that purpose makes itself apparent in the following pages." If Mr. Atkins means by this that he does not confine himself to a bare recital of military and other events, but writes of them with the pen of the "descriptive" special correspondent, the somewhat mysterious sentence is explained. The author does not describe with considerable fullness of detail as well as narrate; but he is descriptive in the best and most businesslike sense of the word. That is to say, he writes throughout like a man whose one object is to make the reader see things as he saw them himself, and that he is undeniably picturesque is due not to any conscious effort after fine writing, but simply to a gift of keen and close observation served by a considerable faculty of literary expression. Mr. Atkins' account of the battle of San Juan, and in general of the operations before Santiago de Cuba, is an excellent piece of workmanship, and enables us to realize more fully than ever before the terrible narrowness of the margin which separated the eventual success of the American arms not merely from failure but from positive disaster. When at 4 p.m. on July 14 the messengers were despatched from the camp of the besiegers announcing that Santiago had surrendered, the balance was actually trembling. The "victorious army, unlike a victorious army, waited with painful anxiety for the decision of the Spaniards":—

Every one knew what loss of life an assault would mean; the only alternative was a long siege, and already the soldiers were dropping right and left in the trenches with sickness. Therefore it is not necessary to disguise the relief with which the whole army heard of the surrender.

This goes far to confirm the view held by competent military critics of the situation, that if the garrison had simply maintained a passive resistance for a few days longer the invading army would have had actually to evacuate the island.

The first thing that astonished Mr. Atkins in the camp at Tampa, where every one lay waiting wearily for orders, was the close comradeship between a San Francisco regiment and the editor of its local paper. The soldiers considered it as the proper channel for tidings about their families, and the colonel used it to send messages to his friends at home, such as the following:—"We are all very well, and we shall give a good account of ourselves. . . . Your paper has sunk into the hearts of the regiment"; and the happy representative of the paper at the front could only reply, "That's mighty good of you, Colonel, mighty good, I'm awful glad about it." Another characteristic touch is the size of the men. Fine they were at the first glance, but "after you had met a strapping fellow at every turn, at every moment of the day for a week," the conviction of their strength and size became a lasting one. They had the right spirit too, and their cavalymen could not only ride but really manage horses, though nearly all were little more than raw recruits. Nor did the camp lack its vivid contrasts, for within a few hundred yards of the regiments who had come to fight, and were resolved at least to learn, was the Cuban Headquarters, where the cigar makers of New York and other cities wore what clothes they liked, paraded with a shiny black bag slung across their shoulders, and boasted, as their only apparent equipment for the war, an immunity from yellow-fever. Further on among the pinos was hidden the camp fire of Mr. W. A. Chanler, the African explorer, who "did not believe in comfort," and placed the experience of a picked dozen of adventurers at the disposal of his Government to use as might be convenient. All these incongruous units were slowly welded together by days of continuous drill among the steaming pinos and the orange-coloured dust, until at last the order came to sail for Cuba. It ran as follows:—"Those who are not on board by daylight will be left behind. Leave your tents standing." But the only result of so much "hustling" was that the army of invasion lay off Port Tampa cooped up in transports, and frightened by the ghosts of Spanish warships, for five more boiling days.

By the evening of June 15, the long straggling line of vessels had started. Every night over fifteen miles of dancing water the Americans lay open to an attack so earnestly expected that men resented its absence from the scheme of Spanish strategy. Only one man was lost, and he died of pneumonia. Even when the troops were being landed, and by some inconceivable error the transport which carried Mr. Atkins was ordered to steer between the "Texas" and the Spanish forts, not a shot was fired, and the audacious procession went on unprotected, until the orders came for a general landing at Siboney.

Proceedings equally casual continued on the mainland. The first trace of the enemy Mr. Atkins appears to have discovered was a letter to the officer in command at Siboney giving instructions how to annihilate the Americans, and the reply, which began—"I shall not have the least difficulty in repelling—" and which had been interrupted by the hasty retreat of the writer. The first fighting at Guasimas had taken place already, and Mr. R. H. Davis gives a good deal of space to its description, corroborating the impression of slackness in the whole affair by saying that out of the six different transports he examined, "on none did I find a captain who was, in his attitude towards the Government, anything but insolent, un-American, and mutinous."

The first exaggerated accounts of the fight of the famous regiment of Rough Riders were to the effect that they had been trapped into an ambush and shot to pieces. Landed by the glare of searchlights which lit up the darkness of Siboney Beach, and shouting with delight to be on Cuban soil and out of their detested "prison-hulks," they had moved inland at five in the morning without their horses. After advancing for about an hour and a half through the brushwood of the ridge above, they were met by a hot fire in a lane blocked by grape-vines and tangled bushes. They promptly attacked more than four times their own number intrenched behind rifle pits in a mountain pass. One of the first wounded was a correspondent, who was met lower down by Mr. Atkins. Though he was shot through the spine, he still lives, and was actually able to dictate a long account of the engagement, "and was then carried five miles to the base, singing when he was out of his senses, and smoking cigarettes when he was not."

The fighting along the lane at the Battle of San Juan, as described by Mr. Atkins, does nothing but intensify previous impressions of this astonishing campaign. The infantry were ordered to storm a position up the steep side of a hill, without any artillery to help them. They did it, simply because, in General Wheeler's words, "it was safer to go on than to go back." They won the heights above the city, and they held them, and two thousand was the total reported in wounded, dead, and missing. The 71st New York Regiment had not behaved well, chiefly owing to their officers; and when Mr. Sylvester Scovel said so, his paper stultified itself by announcing that its correspondent had lied. Both Mr. Davis and Mr. Atkins confirm this report independently; but their testimony, after all, only shows that no volunteer regiment is worth a line of regulars when it comes to such a hot fight as the storming of San Juan Hill.

The most picturesque incident in the beleaguering of Santiago, which followed, was the return of Hobson after the sinking of the Merrimac; and it would have been well for that young man's repute in less impulsive countries if he had retired into obscurity after that magnificent greeting from his comrades. The curious part of the whole thing is that both in Cuba and in Puertorico the Fleet might very well have managed the whole business by itself. The loss incurred by the army was almost entirely unnecessary, and there is an irony in the fact that the soldiers who never left American soil suffered more severely than the army of invasion. The mismanagement of Commissary-General Eagan and his kind was far more deadly than the rifle-pits of Spain. But the fighting trained up men for the far harder task of keeping what had to be taken from the Spaniards.

The war will be productive of a flood of memoirs and descriptions, and of these Mr. Davis' book may be taken as a fairly typical example. The Civil War was fairly worked to death, and the defeat of Spain has set upon the Union of North and South the final seal of blood shed in a common cause.

THE "POOR DEAN OF ST. PATRICKS."

Unpublished Letters of Swift. Ed. by George Birkbeck Hill, D.O.L., LL.D. 9x5½ in., xxvii. + 269 pp. London, 1899. Unwin. 12/-

In the preface to the only volume of the "Life of Swift" he lived to publish, Mr. John Forster, in 1875, wrote that through the Rev. Edward Berwick, the son of Scott's friend, he succeeded "in getting access to the correspondence of Swift with his friend Knightley Chetwode, of Woodbrooke, during the seventeen years (1714-1731) which followed his appointment to the Deanery of St. Patrick's." Forster calls these letters "the richest addition to the correspondence of this most masterly of English letter-writers since it was first collected." The collection was transcribed by Mr. Edward Wilmot Chetwode, the then owner, and Forster himself visited Woodbrooke to collate the copies with the originals so carefully preserved and guarded. The letters were never used, and after Forster's death they were returned to Woodbrooke. How Dr. Birkbeck Hill obtained possession of them he does not say, but under his editorial care most of them have already appeared in the Atlantic Monthly in the last four issues of the year 1897. The complete series, however, is now for the first time published; and, accompanied as they are by the editor's very elaborate annotations, they form an imposing volume.

Considering the importance attached to this collection both by the Chetwode family and Forster, and (to judge from the care he has expended) by Dr. Hill himself, we must confess to some disappointment. A very careful perusal of the letters leaves us hardly better informed than we were by means of the already existing mass of correspondence collected by Scott in 1824. Of the fifty-seven letters here printed, fifty-three are from Swift to Chetwode, and one to Mrs. Chetwode. All of them deal mainly with Chetwode's own affairs—his prosecution for Jacobitism, his separation from his wife, the affairs of his son, his request for a loan (which Swift refused to grant), his building operations, and, finally, his quarrel with Swift. Of Swift himself we have the well-known complaints of deafness, dizziness, and pains in the head; the same references to petty worries about servants, buildings, and the affairs of the Deanery, of which we have often read in his letters to other friends—but little else of importance. Here and there, it is true, events fully dealt with by Swift's biographers receive an added touch by a casual mention, such as the struggle against Wood and his half-pence, the printing of the poem, "Cadenus and Vanessa," the publication of "Gulliver's Travels," and the impeachment of the Duke of Ormond and the Earl of Oxford. But even these, if we except the letter on "Cadenus and Vanessa," are of no great value. This is very strange; for the years over which these letters extend were, perhaps, the most eventful in the whole of Swift's chequered career. It was a period on which he entered with a heart soured by disappointments and filled with bitter indignation; but the final years, if they found him still nursing his saeva indignatio, were yet years replete with a harvest of great work done for Ireland and for the humanity he despised. To Chetwode he wrote, "I detest the world because I am growing wholly unfit for it"; but the people of Dublin set a juster value on his fitness. It was also the period which witnessed his determined championship of his beloved Church as against Dissent, and it found him struggling for the rights of the people as against an arbitrary and unscrupulous Government. Finally, it was the period which rang with the fame of the wit and the genius of the author of "Gulliver's Travels."

Chetwode, however, from the little that is known of him, does not seem to have been the man to touch with a "spirit touch" the heart of Swift, or compel an intimate intercourse. One gathers that his temper and disposition were such as would resent pretty smartly any imputation against his honour and parts; and without the compensating attributes of learning and genius (to use the word in its last-century sense) these qualities were not of the kind to make for a close friendship with a man of Swift's nature. He was a country gentleman, with a pride in his genteel acquaintances and good connexion; and as such Swift treated him. This may help to explain one's disappointment at the results of the correspondence between them.

Apart, however, from this general estimate of these letters, there are a few references interesting in themselves. The opening paragraph of the very first letter reveals, almost pathetically, Swift's new position after the death of Anne:—

"The Person who brought me your Letter delivered it in such a manner, that I was at Court again, and that the Bearer wanted a Place: and when I received it I had my answer ready to give him after I'erusall, that I would do him what service I could. But I was easy when I saw your hand at the Bottom, and then I recollected I was in Irel^d, that the Queen was dead, the Ministry changed, and I was onely the poor Dean of St. Patricks."

"Onely the poor Dean of St. Patricks!" To this day, however, Ireland knows of only one Dean. The visitor to Dublin will be shown the Cathedral as "The Dean's Church."

Chetwode seems to have been in the habit of writing on scented note-paper. Swift's comment on this is characteristic:—"Your Perfumed Paper hath been ready to give me an Apoplexy; either leave off these Refinements or we will send you to live on a mountain in Connaught."

The earlier letters, written as they were, during the days of anxious suspense following on the downfall of Oxford and Bolingbroke, confirm our knowledge of Swift's fear about his own safety. Writing to Chetwode, under date June 28, 1716, he says:—

"Yesterday's post brought us an Acc^t that the D— of O— [Duke of Ormond] is voted to be impeached for high Treason. You see the Plot thickens: I know not the present Disposition of People in Engl^d but I do not find myself disposed to be sorry at this news. However in general my Spirits are disturbed, and I want to be out of this Town. A Whig of this Country now in Engl^d has written to his Friends that the Leaders there talk of sending for me to be examined upon these Impeachments. . . . I went Yesterday to the Courts on purpose to show I was not run away. I had warning given me to beware of a fellow that stood by while some of us were talking. It seems there is a Trade going of carrying stories to the Gover^t, and many honest Folks turn the Penny by it. I cannot yet leave this Place but will as soon as possible."

Letter XLIV. is uncommonly interesting. It relates to the printing and writing of "Cadenus and Vanessa," and is dated from London, in the year in which "Gulliver's Travels" was published:—

"As to the Poem you mention, I know several Copyes of it have been given about, and Ld. L^t told me he had one. It was written at Windsor near 14 years ago, and dated. It was a Task performed on a Frolick among some Ladyes, and she it was addresst to dyed some time ago in Dublin, and on her Death the Copy shewn by her Exe^{cutor}. I am very indifferent what is done with it, for printing cannot make it more common than it is: and for my own part, I forget what is in it, but believe it to be only a cavalier Business, and they who will not give allowances may chuse, and if they intend it maliciously, they will be disappointed, for it was what I expected, long before I left Irel^d. Therefore what you advise me about printing it myself is impossible, for I never saw it since I writ it, neither if I had would I use shifts or Arts, let People think of me as they please. Neither do I believe the gravest character is answerable for a Private humerous thing which by an accident inevitable and the Baseness of particular Malice is made publick. I have borne a great deal more, and those who will like me less, upon seeing me capable of having writ such a Trifle so many years ago, may think as they please, neither is it agreeable to me to be troubled with such Accounts, when there is no Remedy, and onely gives me the ungratefull Task of reflecting on the Baseness of Mankind, which I knew sufficiently before."

To Tickell, three months later, Swift wrote in much the same strain. The poem, although written in 1712 or 1713, was, according to Sir Henry Craik, revised in 1719. If it be so, how reconcile the biographer's assertion with the statement here made:—"I never saw it since I writ it"? What Swift here calls a "cavalier Business" has been taken by several writers to imply something more serious than that: and even Dr. Birkbeck Hill believes the intimacy between Swift and Esther Vanhomrigh to have been a guilty one. If, as we are led to surmise, the learned editor follows Horace Walpole in his reasoning on this matter, we cannot compliment him on a very strong leader. The passage in Swift's letter to Vanessa, to which Dr. Hill refers, fails to arouse in us the least suspicion of guilt; and, until stronger evidence be forthcoming, we must demur to an accusation which would make of Swift a mean-spirited libertine. There is much in Vanessa's life which compels our sympathy. There is much also in Swift's relationship with her on which those least tainted with prejudice may find foundation for censure; but that censure which includes the charge of guilty intimacy is the outcome of an inability to appreciate the true character either of Swift or Vanessa.

We must compliment Dr. Birkbeck Hill on his very full annotations. They should prove extremely helpful to readers unacquainted with the details of Swift's life. At the same time, we cannot help feeling that the volume is overweighted with them. A smaller book, giving the letters the chief prominence, would have sufficed.

In the note to Letter XXV., Dr. Hill is not quite accurate in saying that Swift "only once directly owned any piece of writing as his." We presume from the anecdote which follows that reference is made to "A Discourse of the Contests and Dissensions between the Nobles and Commons of Athens and Rome." In 1712, however, Swift published his "Proposals for Improving the English Tongue," in a letter to the Lord High Treasurer, and this pamphlet was actually printed with his name attached—the only publication of his, we believe, so distinguished by him.

A FIELD FOR THE ETHNOLOGIST.

In the Land of the Pigmies. By Capt. Guy Burrows. 9 x 6 in., xxx. + 200 pp. London, 1899. Pearson. 21/-

It is certainly a pity that all travellers do not have preliminary conversations with the secretaries of three learned societies before they leave England. For, if the author of this book had conversed with some one at the Zoological, Geographical, and Ethnological Societies, he would certainly have produced a book of greater value. And if (as seems likely) travellers of all kinds cannot be induced to apply to those who can direct their observations, these societies might at least send, to all chief centres in such places as the Congo Free State, leaflets which briefly indicate all that is mostly in need of elucidation in their respective branches of study.

It seems that Captain Burrows, who is one of a number of adventurous Englishmen employed in the King of the Belgians' Congo Estate, had many opportunities of studying the Akka, or Pigmies. But, in spite of the title, there is but one brief chapter dealing with these curious survivals, and in that chapter there is not one reference to any of their marriage or family customs. It is doubtful whether he mentions any fact concerning them which will be new to those who have read the literature covering the Welle district, unless it be their custom of making a conventional offering of no value to those from whom they "convey" their bananas, in order that it shall not be said they steal. But it cannot be doubted that there is much to learn about their family relations; and the paragraph in which the author states that they have no ties of family affection might very well have been developed, with more illustrative facts.

Captain Burrows has not shirked the question of cannibalism among the tribes in whose country he was stationed. Nevertheless, though he is evidently interested in the practice of eating human flesh, he throws no light on its origin. If this is undoubtedly one of the obscurest problems for the ethnologist, the fact may be due, as he partly suggests, to so many travellers entirely refusing to notice or record what must have occurred under their very eyes. Such a slurring over unpleasant details is due to a lack of the scientific spirit, and cannot be too strongly deprecated. Most writers who have considered the subject seem to arrive at the conclusion that the practice is due to a depraved habit—that it is, in fact, a distinctly backward step in civilization. That such a view should have many supporters is not wonderful when we consider the horror the higher races have for cannibalism. It is with difficulty that one imagines a state of society in which it could have been of advantage. Nevertheless, it has most of the marks of a survival. It is curious that a theory, suggested some years ago, has received little or no consideration. It refers the origin of the habit to the era of the simians from whom mankind sprang when they were becoming men, and attributes their rise to the fact of their discovering that compact nitrogenous food of flesh was infinitely more useful to them than fruits, eggs, and insects. To obtain this food they combined. This led to a state of active and organised war, and as a result, the more unintelligent were swept out of existence, and from it also arose slavery. For, though these ape-men ate their prisoners, they kept them to eat, and finally bred them. There is at any rate some suggestiveness in this theory.

The charges of inhumanity brought against so many of the Congo Free State Officials are once or twice referred to by Captain Burrows, and after relating with approval a kindly deed performed by one of them he remarks that this "illustrates the untruth of the stories of inhumanity with which the Congo officers are so frequently charged." How the proof that one man was kind to a poor captive against whom he had no possible grievance can prove anything but that this particular gentleman was not altogether a brute we fail to see. Mr. Stanley in his introduction to this volume endeavours to put a humanitarian aspect on the exploiting of the Congo. His admission of the "cruelly severe labour" forty thousand carriers were perforce engaged in appears to be the slip of a rather careless advocate. Though rigid rules for the treatment of natives cannot be laid down by the Society for the Protection of Aborigines, there is little doubt that the Belgians, and Germans too, lack the necessary experience for finding a middle course between pampering and ill-treating them.

The march of the "jigger" or chigoe across the African Continent is noticed by Captain Burrows, and in this he confirms M. Lionel Decle. It was lately reported to have arrived at Beira.

A BOOK OF ESSAYS.

Genius Loci. Notes on Places. By Vernon Lee. 7 x 4 1/2 in., 211 pp. London, 1899. Grant Richards. 5/- n.

It is rather a curious coincidence that the lady who writes under the name of Vernon Lee should have chosen for this little collection of essays a title bearing so much resemblance to that of the recently published volume by Mrs. Meynell. "Genius Loci" is at least more appropriate to this book than was "The Spirit of Place" to the dainty conceits of the other. "Vernon Lee" is a practised traveller, and discourses pleasantly of many out-of-the-way places—of Fribourg, for example, and Detwang, and Touraine, and the great marble quarries of Monte Altes—simo. The "Genius Loci" is to her a divinity, deserving of worship. Places are capable, in her eyes, of inspiring friendship. "Quite irrespective of their inhabitants, and virtually of their written history, they can touch us like living creatures." There are one or two places, she adds, where one may live habitually, and yet never lose the sense of delight, wonder, and gratitude. The valleys of Tuscany have thrown this glamour over the heart of "Vernon Lee."

There are twenty tiny essays in this small volume. In some respects work of this kind gains by brevity. A book of essays is emphatically a book to be read at odd times, and carefully; to work conscientiously through a whole collection at once too often induces a sense of weariness, and it is easy enough to grow tired even of a single essay. The author is wise who guards against the possibility of such a catastrophe. These notes on places are like small water-colour sketches, touched in with a careful hand, but not with a too pedantic accuracy. Here and there may be found the saving grace of a clumsy construction, and an awkward phrase. But they are delicately done, and with an eye to the picturesque. Here is the opening of "The Lakes of Mantua":—

It was the Lakes, the deliciousness of water and sedge seen from the railway on a blazing June day, that made me stop at Mantua for the first time; and the thought of them that drew me back to Mantua this summer. They surround the city on three sides, being formed by the Mincio on the way from Lake Garda to the Po, shallow lakes spilt on the great Lombard Plain. They are clear, rippled, fringed with reed, islanded with water lilies, and in them wave the longest, greenest weeds. Here and there a tawny sail of a boat comes up from Venice; children are bathing under the Castle towers; at a narrow point is a long covered stone bridge, where the water rushes through mills, and one has glimpses into cool, dark places smelling of grist.

This is prettily described in soft, smoothly-flowing English. "Vernon Lee" contents herself, for the most part, with description; she does not analyse too carefully the thoughts inspired by her favourite halting-places. And yet the book is something more than a mere guide-book; or, at the least, it is a guide-book glorified by a tender appreciation of the localities described. In fine, the essays are worth more than a hurried reading; to those who have travelled over the same ground they should be very welcome. They are not superlatively good, but they are not the aggressively clever work of a superior woman.

ART.

The Later Work of Titian. By Claude Phillips. 10½ x 7 in. London, 1898. Seeley. 3/6

In telling the story of the later life and work of Titian, Mr. Claude Phillips has accomplished what for him must have been an easy task. Titian is throughout in full view, and the record of his activity is so ample and perfect that there is no occasion to reconstruct him, and no temptation to invent him. But if the task of the writer has been simple, that of the critic must be simpler still. As no question of fact is, or in the nature of the case can be, in dispute, it remains for us to indicate as briefly as may be the very few points at which we feel disposed to part company with the author in his line of interpretation.

At the outset we think that to agitate the question whether Aretino's evil communications did or did not corrupt Titian's good manners is to show a certain lack of the historic sense of proportion. Aretino, whatever else he may not have been, was undoubtedly a man of genius; and as regards Titian's intercourse with him, it may be sufficient to note in the first place that genius is apt to acquaint those who possess it with strange bed-fellows; while, in the second place, it has a power of assimilating, unhurt, elements that would sadly disturb the delicate equilibrium of moral mediocrity. The strange thing is not that Titian overlooked Aretino's bad principles of conduct; but that he was blind to Sansovino's bad principles of art. Again we are in no sympathy at present with any attempt to show that Titian took a lower, because he may have taken a closer, view of woman than Giorgione. The results of Wickhoff's researches should be a warning to critics not to talk too eloquently about Giorgione before they know. The subject of the so-called Venus at Dresden is still uncertain; that is to say, it has not yet been determined whether in this case, too, Giorgione was merely illustrating a literary theme or creating afresh in the image of his own sentiment and conviction. In any case, it is too early to lay it down that Titian did worse, when he may only for other reasons have done otherwise. Lastly, to assert that in portraiture Giorgione went deeper than Titian seems to us to be more than unjust; it is a little ungrateful. Even Rembrandt only seems to go deeper because he kept with so solemn an iteration to the rule of experience—to its suffering, its illusion, and its decay—passing by the exceptional "happy souls that long to live." The fact of the matter is that we shall never know what Giorgione might have done, if he had lived to share Titian's opportunities. From the little that remains of his work it is abundantly clear that at the outset he must have been drawn to another side, if not to the opposite pole, of experience, to dreaming instead of to thinking, to self-indulgence instead of to self-assertion. All this has a beauty of its own; but it is mainly the beauty of promise, which leaves half the field to the guesswork of the imagination. His conceptions, for all their charm, were as partial and provisional as his power of expressing them was immature; and it is nothing short of a profanation to couple and contrast his essays of precocious youth with the giant achievements of the art, deep, delicate, and deliberate, of Titian. In this contention there is nothing new. It is a notorious fact that Rubens, Vandyck, and Velasquez studied Titian with patient and passionate enthusiasm, and it is further to be noted that their works tell little, if anything, of Giorgione. It is the same with Reynolds. He would, as he said, have given all he possessed for a genuine Titian in good preservation; while for that which Titian could not teach him he seems to have gone to Correggio and Rembrandt. We present these facts simply for what they may be worth, not presuming to lay stress upon them at a time like the present, when it seems to be assumed that those who produce pictures are ipso facto disqualified from judging them, when critics have arrived so far as to imitate the boldness of the Prætorian guard in the decadence of the Roman empire. Once the retainers and ministers of the Sovereigns, they have come to put the empire itself up to popular appreciation.

We regret that Mr. Phillips has been unable to find time and space for dealing systematically and in detail with the drawings of Titian, for no problem is more difficult or more in need of caution and competence in the handling than that of Venetian drawings. Little, in fact, is known of Venetian art except in its results. Reynolds wasted his substance and risked the durability of his fame in the attempt to recover the secret of Venetian colouring, and it is a secret still. But, in general, it seems that the Venetians had less occasion or inclination to draw, in the restricted or popular sense of the word, than their Florentine contemporaries. They preferred to deal summarily with an impression as a whole, instead of analysing its components with the help of boundary lines. Anyhow, if Vasari is to be trusted, Michelangelo detected in Titian's work the outcome of a method and habit radically different from his own. The result has been not that fewer drawings are assigned in collections to the great Venetians than to the great Florentines—buyers and sellers are not so easily daunted as a rule—but that in the case of the Venetians it is specially difficult to reach a firm starting-point for genuine criticism. We are glad to see that Mr. Phillips restores to Titian two of the finest of the drawings, of which Morelli in the large exercise of his authority to set up and set down had temporarily deprived him. One is the landscape with the mysterious veiled female figure at Chatsworth, which it is difficult to believe that the second-rate hand of a Campagnola could have executed. The other is the so-called "Landscape with the pedlar" in the same collection.

RAPHAEL, by H. Knackfuss, translated by Campbell Dodgson (Grevel, 4s. n.), is an excellent example of a useful class of publication. It is the first of a series of "Monographs on Artists," projected by Messrs. Velhagen and Klasing, of Leipzig, to be written by various authors, and issued under the supervision of Professor Knackfuss, of the Royal Academy of Arts in Cassel. Considered as a life of the painter, it is wonderfully compendious and accurate, while the sequence of his works has never been more lucidly set forth. As might have been expected from its German provenance, the work shows an anti-Morellian bias, which occasionally is responsible for some startling opinions, as when Professor Knackfuss assures us that the attribution to Raphael of the Donna Velata in the Pitti "not only lacks proof but probability." He does not explain whether he means that it is the work of an assistant, or that it is a copy, or that it has no relation to the painter. The monograph is copiously illustrated, there being in fact 128 illustrations to 132 pages of text. The most interesting are reproductions of drawings from the Albertina, the Wicar Collection at Lille, the Taylorian and elsewhere, and of the Madonnas of the painter's early Perugian period, now at Berlin and St. Petersburg. The translation into English of the monograph was wisely entrusted to Mr. Campbell Dodgson, of the Print Department in the British Museum, who has fulfilled his task with both spirit and thoroughness. Indeed, the policy of "thorough" has been so fully carried out that even Latin and Italian quotations have not escaped translation. Thus Cardinal Bembo's epitaph on his gifted friend appears in this guise :—

Nature, while Raphael lived, must fear defeat ;
He died ; she too prepared her death to meet.

It is difficult to imagine anybody's preferring this distich to the familiar original :—

Ille hic est Raphael, timuit, quo sospite, vinci
Rerum magna parens, et, moriente, mori.

ANTIPODEAN BOOKS.

Spinifex and Sand : A Narrative of Five Years' Pioneer-ing and Exploration in Western Australia. By the Hon. David W. Carnegie. 8½ x 5½ in., xvi. + 454 pp. London, 1898. Pearson. 21/-

In the big map which is bound up in Mr. Albert F. Calvert's excellent book on the exploration of Australia there is, in the top left hand corner, a large blank space with no names printed on it except that of the Tropic of Capricorn. The space is bounded on the north by a blue line, indicating Warburton's route in 1874, and on the south by a red line indicating Giles' route in 1876 ; the intervening territory had never been trodden by any white man's foot until Mr. Carnegie traversed it from south to north and then again from north to south in the years 1896 and 1897. His journey took him thirteen months, of which ten-and-a-half were actually occupied in travelling, and the total distance covered was a little over three thousand miles. But though Mr. Carnegie travelled far, he discovered practically nothing, for the good reason that there was nothing to discover. The terra incognita, whose secrets he wrested from it, consisted entirely of desert, hideous and apparently irreclaimable. Every now and again his narrative breaks out into picturesque description ; but all the descriptions resemble each other closely. One may be quoted, as an example of all, to show the curious what manner of place is this great West Australian desert :—

"Downs," I think is the only term that describes properly the configuration of the country. "The great Undulating Desert of Gravel" would meet all requirements should it be thought worthy of a name. In this cheerless and waterless region we marched from August 22 until September 17, seeing no lakes, nor creeks, nor mountains, no hills even prominent enough to deserve a name except on three occasions. Day after day over open, tree-less expanses, covered only by the never-ending spinifex, and strewn everywhere with pebbles and stones of ferruginous sand-stone, as if some mighty giant had sown the ground with seed in the hope of raising a rich crop of hills. The spinifex here cannot grow its coarse, tall blades of grass—the top growth is absent, and only round stools of spines remain ; well was it named Porcupine Grass.

Occasional clumps of mulga break the even line of the horizon, and, in the valleys, thickets or belts of bloodwood are seen. . . . As for animal life—well, one forgets that life exists, until occasionally reminded of the fact by a bounding spinifex rat.

In this horrible country the one interest in life that never ceases is the quest for water, failing to find which the traveller must lie down and die. Mr. Carnegie's method of discovering it was simplicity itself. He went on the theory that the black fellows knew, and that if they were unwilling to tell they must be made to do so. He took them prisoners, therefore, as required, ordered them to find water, and, if they showed reluctance, deprived them of food and drink until they did his bidding. Certain humanitarians have criticized him for this, and accused him of cruelty to savages, but perhaps they are humanitarians who have never known what it is to be really thirsty.

Mr. Carnegie is not a literary man, and makes no attempt to practice literary airs and graces. His book is a straightforward account of a courageous undertaking, and nothing more. It is not his fault that his discoveries have a purely negative value, and he is under no illusions as to the possibilities of the new country which he has opened up. His words on this head may be quoted in conclusion :—

It is possible that between the Lake Darlot goldfield and the 25th parallel of latitude isolated areas of auriferous country may be found, though nothing that we saw proves this to be likely. . . . It is also possible that a travelling route for stock may be formed from South Australia along the 26th parallel. . . . Failing either the finding of gold or the formation of a stock route from oasis to oasis, I can see no use whatever to which this part of the interior can be put.

Through New Guinea and other Cannibal Countries. By H. Cayley Webster. 9½ x 6¼ in., xviii. + 387 pp. London, 1898. Unwin. 21/-

After certain recent stories of Antipodean travel the wondering English public may find this volume tame and disappointing. Truth may be stranger than fiction, but as a rule it is not, which is perhaps why the majority of persons read chiefly novels. Yet Captain Webster takes us not only through German and British New Guinea, but to many a fair South Sea isle peopled by savage man-eaters and fierce fighters ; and, moreover, his handsomely got-up book is embellished with a very large number of photographs of dark-skinned savages in their habit—or rather want of habit—as they live.

"Through New Guinea" is evidently a faithful record of adventurous scientific travel, extending over three years in the South Seas. But the author is hardly gifted with the magic pen of a Stevenson. Somehow Captain Webster, considering his personal exploits, the wide extension of his voyages, and his hairbreadth escapes from savage treachery, seems hardly to have made the best literary use of his experiences. Still there are many interesting glimpses, not only into the teeming savagery of the South Seas, but into that unceasing irresistible European aggression and rivalry in which Englishmen are destined to play the dominant part.

Probably no outside question in recent years provoked such a bitterly hostile feeling in our Australian colonies as the German occupation of New Guinea, though Captain Webster's narrative of the present condition of the German half of that huge island does not lead us to infer that the Teutonic colonization is at all likely to prove a permanent success. But we must remember that German—and, in fact, all foreign—methods of colonization are diametrically opposed and hostile to our own. Captain Webster, referring to an important group of islands where the Germans and English (as in New Guinea) divide the sovereignty, observes :—

Of the traders at present in the group I met nearly all, and found them a very generous-hearted, hard-working, and self-sacrificing body of men, but they have all one common grievance. It appears that the Solomon Islands under the British Protectorate are open for purposes of trading to all vessels of any nationality whatsoever, while that portion of the group annexed by the German Empire is open only to Germans, or to foreigners on payment of an annual licence, £12 10s. But, as in this case the British subject, or whoever he may be, is not allowed to employ a native to work ashore, it is impossible to do any successful trade.

This holds true of religion as well as of trade. The German missionaries—Catholic and Protestant—get their orders and have their "sphere" marked out by the Berlin authorities, and with regard to their converts "they are obliged by law to be taught to read and write in German." It is such facts as these which caused our Australian fellow-subjects to view the triumph of Bismarck over Lord Derby and Lord Granville in the matter of New Guinea with such disfavour, and which would lead them to help in sweeping the seas of the French in New Caledonia if an opportunity arose, as seemed not altogether improbable during the recent Fashoda incident. The politician as well as the traveller and naturalist will find much to interest him in Captain Webster's pages.

The Founding of South Australia. By Edwin Hodder. 7½ x 5 in., 239 pp. Sampson Low. 6/-

This is really a brief "Life" of Robert Gouger, "First Colonial Secretary" of South Australia, based on the journals and family papers of that now forgotten pioneer colonist, who was an early but unfaithful disciple of Edward Gibbon Wakefield. We are indebted to Mr. Hodder for previous works on the settlement and foundation of South Australia, which in time to come may have considerable interest to some future historian.

The colony of South Australia was founded by a number of well-to-do English philanthropists and political reformers, "wire-pulled" and manoeuvred by Gibbon Wakefield, whose intellectual activity and journalistic ability were extraordinary. Like most "amateurs," these gentlemen when they actually took in hand the practical work of colonizing made rather a mess of it, and, in fact, did little but quarrel among themselves. Thus we find Gouger at fierce war with Captain Hindmarsh, the first Governor whom he had appointed. Hindmarsh, as well as his successor, Gawler, and Gouger himself, were all "recalled." In fact, until the late Sir George Grey took over the Government of South Australia, there was nothing but bankruptcy and general confusion in the community. Still this brief, but by no means brilliant, memoir of Robert Gouger is in one sense an addition to Anglo-Australian history; for until Mr. Hodder took the matter up it is not too much to say that his hero's name had entirely faded from the memory of men. Mr. Hodder laments that no memorial of Gouger exists in South Australia; but colonists, like other people, prefer to ignore and forget their past failures. When Australians have found time to erect statues to the men who were the real discoverers and actual founders of the present Commonwealth—to such men as Captain Flinders and Sir George Grey, for instance—then perhaps they may turn a languid antiquarian attention to the Gougers, Hindmarshes, and Gawlers of early South Australia.

When Mr. Semon threw all his notebooks concerning a two years' zoological trip in the bush of North Queensland and the Malayan Archipelago into one capacious volume he owed it to the reader to choose a less misleading title than IN THE AUSTRALIAN BUSH (Macmillan, 21s.). It is true our embryo-hunting naturalist has put into the first half of the book every fact, of any importance or of none, that he picked up while collecting the Ceratodus on the Burnett River, but his facts, truly enough observed in most cases, concerning cattle-mustering and the habits and customs of hospitable Queensland squatters, have neither the interest of novelty nor of brilliant writing. The reader who enjoys what is light and familiar will rebel against the embryos of the lung-fish, and he to whom the Echidna is of much importance will consider Mr. Semon's excursions into the personal characteristics of unknown people of English parentage nothing but pragmatical padding. Had the book been revised and cut down to a half it would have passed as the painstaking record of a naturalist's wanderings, told with some simplicity, if without the charm characterizing the few masters in this branch of literature. But Darwin and Mr. Wallace, to say nothing of the authors of "Nicaragua" and "The Naturalist in La Plata," have much to answer for. The book is too encyclopædic. No man can know so much as Mr. Semon seems to know, not even a German. His views as to exogamy are, we think, not particularly valuable. To say that exogamy replaced endogamy because so low a race as those composing the Australian hordes observed the evil effects of close endogamic marriages is to attribute statistical intelligence to people who, for the most part, count "one," "two," "many." Scarcity of women and marriage by capture are surely the root facts in the complex systems of exogamy in Australia as elsewhere. Mr. Semon does not seem to have read or observed with regard to the slaughter of totem animals that it is not an entire tribe which refuses to eat a particular totem animal, but only the men of that totem. For instance, a man may, if he is an "Emu," eat a Kangaroo, but his wife may not if she is of the "Kangaroo totem." Nevertheless, to a reader with time and patience and a talent for omission, "In the Australian Bush" will perhaps not come amiss. The writer is always amiable, if sometimes naïve, and, in his own specialty, has gathered much learning.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE STARS.

The New Manual of Astrology. By W. Gorn Old. 8½ x 5½ in., xvi. + 255 pp. London, 1898. Redway. 10/6

One among several distinctions of greater importance by which the occult sciences are separated from recognized knowledge is the fact that we must seldom look to their professors for the best justification of them. In the days of Ebenezer Sibly, who flourished in the last century, certain texts of Scripture were thought to countenance astrology, and the truth of the celestial science was thus incontestably proved for the author of its "Complete Illustration." Nor did the subject fare better at a later period, when it was argued by "Eliphas Levi" that, as nothing is indifferent in Nature, "a pebble more or less on a road may crush or alter profoundly the fortunes of the greatest men, or even of the greatest empires," and that hence "the position of a particular star cannot be indifferent to the destinies of the child when he enters by the fact of his birth into the universal harmony of the sidereal world." While it is true that it may not be indifferent, it does not follow that the nature of the influence can be defined or its extent calculated. We shall see presently how far the latest expositor of the subject, Mr. W. Gorn Old, has improved on preceding apologies in his "New Manual of Astrology."

Astrology is just now the most popular of the occult sciences, for the obvious reason that there is no mystery in its methods, it pretends to a practical result, and its precise rules do not overtax the individual judgment. From this point of view it is the most exact of the inexact sciences. The interest is made evident, not only by Mr. Old's serious-looking treatise, but by numbers of smaller handbooks, to which fresh additions are made almost annually, and still further by the existence of more than one periodical devoted to the subject. In America, where all the old books on occult matters have for years past been bought eagerly by collectors, it has grown into "a movement," with its high priest as well as its proper organ, the whole not unmixed with that adventurous element which has made the New World so fruitful in spurious occult enthusiasms.

Astrology has been distinguished by old writers into two chief branches, natural and judicial: the first is weather prediction and belongs to the observatory; the second is the art of discerning future events by the position of the planets, and is subdivided into genethliacal, the science of nativities, and horary, which deals with questions of the moment. Philosophically speaking, the judicial part claims to estimate the influence of the universe upon man. It is founded on the occult doctrine of the solidarity of things, the recognition of a secret affinity between our visible existence and that of the "superior worlds." Historically, however, it can be referred to the old notion that the stars are animate beings. A variety of this is the mediæval doctrine of planetary spirits, who were supposed to guide the movements of the wandering spheres. Thence the Abbot Trithemius built up his curious system of world-government by a succession of angelic intelligences, and connected with it a number of prophetic observations of the vague kinds which still admit of verification in astrological almanacs.

When the French astronomer, Bailly, said that astrology was not the foolish mother of a wise daughter, but the distracted or criminal child of a sagacious parent, the astrologers replied that their science was the true soul of astronomy, that its claims were a part of the greater claim of occultism to the existence of a knowledge perpetuated secretly from antiquity. Outside the charmed circle of initiation the statement may also be accepted, but not for the same reasons. Astrology, like the other occult sciences, has failed to justify its pretension. If it be not the art of displaying preternatural wisdom after the event, it is at least true that its budget of historic predictions rests on no real evidence, while for most modern instances we have only the word of the astrologers. It has shown itself entirely unable to prove, either by the reason of things or by the facts of experience, a special influence attaching to special planetary positions. It told us, after the occurrence, that the horoscope of Mr. Barney Barnato had always indicated the manner of his death, but it is invariably denied the triumph of making such a statement beforehand. Otherwise, Mr. A. J. Balfour would perhaps be disposed to withdraw his objection that "a prima-facie case has not been made out for astrology." An attempt to devise such a case was made some years ago by a writer in the University Magazine, but the subject remains where Mr. Balfour placed it. At the same time its literature, which is large, has undeniable points of interest. The occult sciences are curiously methodized and inwrought. It would be useful to trace historically the connexion of astrology with the rest of its groups of weird sisters; to learn something of its diverse readings and its rival codes, of the existence of which the modern believer is for the most part in happy ignorance. Astrology was one of the pseudo-sciences which late Kabalism took into its heart of hearts, producing astounding developments, of which Basnage has something to tell us in his "Histoire des Juifs," and over which Gaffarel lingers lovingly in his "Unheard-of Curiosities."

Of these byways Mr. Old knows something, and he might have done better service had he offered us a history of astrology instead of a new technical manual which impresses us merely with the great labour that it has involved. He not only traverses ground familiar to the expert, but develops at some length a discovery of his own concerning the pre-natal epoch and the law of sex, by which we gather that astrology is now in a position to forecast empirically the sex of the unborn child. Mr. Old has more claim on our attention when he exhibits in his fourth book the connexion between Western and Hindu astrology, and, touching once on the historical aspect, suggests that the famous "Tetrabiblos" of Ptolemy shows traces of Indian influence. This is good work of its kind, and makes us judge leniently the author's attempt to justify the truth of his science. Professor Oliver Lodge, it appears, once speculated, as others have done before him, that the future as well as the past may be actually existent, and that both may therefore have an influence on personal actions. Mr. Old finds in this notion the whole of astrology, but, like Eliphas Levi before him, he does not see that while it may help us to discern a possible influence, it gives no ground by which to locate or compute it. Lovers of things occult have, however, robust imaginations which can bridge most gaps in evidence. Yet some lay readers, though not deceived by the reasoning, may be inclined to concede with the late R. A. Proctor that "of all the errors into which men have fallen in their desire to penetrate into futurity, astrology is the most respectable, we may even say the most reasonable."

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The best of the "Illustrated English Poems" (Dent, 3s. 6d. n.), edited by Mr. Ernest Rhys, has appeared in SONGS FROM THE PLAYS OF SHAKESPEARE, illustrated by Mr. Paul Woodroffe, whose drawings, well executed and enclosed in appropriate borders, seem to us conceived in exactly the right spirit. Mr. H. L. Richardson's illustrations to the DESERTED VILLAGE are not without merit, especially in the matter of figure drawing, though the composition is not always happy, while Mr. Lawrence Housman, who takes Shelley's SENSITIVE PLANT, though he unquestionably catches much of the Shelleyan spirit and traces with taste and skill "the sinuous paths of lawn and moss," produces human figures which are sometimes simply grotesque. One curious example shows a head and shoulders above the top of a bridge with a pair of legs showing through the arch below, which not even the most ardent admirer of the impossible and elongated human figures some artists affect could accept as belonging to the body above. One of the pictures has unfortunately been reproduced upside down.

WESTERN FLANDERS (The Unicorn Press, £2 2s. n.) contains ten etchings by Mr. William Strang, with letterpress by Mr. Laurence Binyon. The etchings have all the charm which one has learnt to associate with Mr. Strang's name; the letterpress is worthy of the etchings. It is not so much "written up to" the illustrations which it accompanies as written in attune with them. Sometimes, indeed, the connexion between picture and letterpress is not on the surface obvious; and the writing is always something more than a mere description or explanation of its attendant picture. Now it is a short story, now a set of verses, now a memory of a legend, now an essay in literary criticism. But it is always something good, and something, at all events in tone and sentiment, appropriate. Author and artist, in short, are to be congratulated upon the harmony with which they have worked together and encouraged to continue their collaboration. In these days of loose, hurried writing and cheap process blocks, good and careful work such as theirs is too rare not to be welcomed warmly when it is met. And as they have not, by any means, exhausted Flanders, they have not far to go in the quest for a new subject for a second book.

FLASHLIGHTS ON NATURE, by Grant Allen (Newnes, 6s.). This work, which consists of a series of articles that appeared in a monthly magazine, is not to be accepted as a serious, scientific excursion into the field of the author's "first love"; but rather as a variation of the profitable labours of an "incidental novelist." Its "popular" raison d'être is obvious from the titles and sub-titles. There is nothing novel in the book, neither are any of the still obscure phenomena of lowly life dealt with in a critical spirit. It has this advantage, however—it is not misleading, and people who prefer their science served up in this way will find it entertaining. The principal charm of the book, and even, from a purely scientific point of view, its chief value, consists of the numerous and very beautiful illustrations by Mr. Frederick Enoch. These are drawn with great fidelity, firmness, and delicacy, and they have been admirably "processed."

EARLY ITALIAN LOVE STORIES (Longmans, 15s. n.) is the title given to a collection of translations, twelve in number, made by Miss Una Taylor. The volume possesses all the essential qualities of a gift-book. It is large enough to look well on the drawing-room table, but light enough to hold in the hand. The illustrations by Mr. Henry J. Ford are of a very high order of merit. The Italian authors, examples of whose work are here introduced to English readers, are Boccaccio, Masuccio Salernitano, Giraldis Cintio, Sebastiano Erizzo, Gio. F. Straparola, and Matteo Bandello. The selection has been made with a certain, if not a sufficient, regard to the exigencies of the young person, and the task of translation has been gracefully performed, and without too rigid adherence to the text. The difficulty of making such stories acceptable to the modern reader is clearly understood and stated by Miss Taylor in her introduction.

The gulf between us and the old Italian fiction writers is of life no less than of language. Outside their mere burlesques, of a levity without restraint, the loves, hates, griefs, despairs, and sins of their graver inventions lie, more often than not, outside the range of later day experience and possibly beyond the pale of its sympathy.

It follows that the modern reader cannot find even Boccaccio convincing. Yet he and all the other Italian writers whom Miss Una Taylor has introduced to us are interesting in her smooth and simple versions of their narratives.

PROSE E TRAGEDIE SCELTE DI SILVIO PELLICO, CON PROEMIO DI FRANCESCO D'OVIDIO (Milan, 1898, Ulrico Hoepli, one lira). This excellent reprint of Silvio Pellico's chief works—Le Mie Prigioni; I doveri degli Uomini; Francesca da Rimini; and Eufemio di Messina—is another proof of the intelligent enterprise of the firm of Ulrico Hoepli. Silvio Pellico, like Manzoni, has got somewhat out of date in Italy; yet, as Professor D'Ovidio aptly says of "Le Mie Prigioni" in the valuable introduction to this edition—

It is a chef-d'œuvre of Italian prose, so poor then (at the time of its publication in 1832) and none too rich even now, in well-written books of interest. Up to the sixth decade of the present century, if a girl or boy or a stranger asked what Italian book they might best read, the answer was Manzoni's "Promessi Sposi" and Pellico's "Mie Prigioni." It was difficult to suggest others. Nowadays the list would be somewhat longer, but those two are still at its head—that is, if we are sincere about the matter. There is a clearness of form as well adapted to the intelligence of a child as to the impatience of more expert readers. Simplicity was not then a common virtue of Italian prose, which to-day is being corrupted anew, as though the conquest of a natural and sincere style of writing by the genius of Manzoni and Leopardi and the candour of Pellico had been a thing of little price. The style of "Le Mie Prigioni" is almost stainless, and the language has few wrinkles. Some affectation and a light breath of provincialism, but that is all.

The tragedy, "Francesca da Rimini," with which Madame Ristori made her mark at Paris, is worth re-reading though its literary interest is below that of the "Prigioni." Lovers of simple Italian, whose taste has not been vitiated by D'Annunzian morbidity, will find within the covers of this little volume a source of constant pleasure.

THE ROCK VILLAGES OF THE RIVIERA, by William Scott (Black, 7s. 6d.), deals in reality with only a small section of the Italian Riviera from Ventimiglia to Bordighera, and a few of the villages up the valleys that here run down to the coast. Ventimiglia itself, known to English tourists chiefly for its vexatious douane at the Italian frontier, but really one of the most interesting and picturesque of the old hill fortresses of Italy—"Tot congesta manu præruptis oppida saxis"—seems in former times to have exercised, under the overlordship of Genoa, political control over certain neighbouring villages known as the "Otto Luoghi di Ventimiglia," "eight places of or belonging to Ventimiglia;" and Mr. Scott has collected a good deal of information from the municipal records of bygone times, illustrating his letterpress with picturesque drawings of these old places, piled on steep slopes for purposes of defence against robber nobles or marauding pirates. The "Otto Luoghi," some of which are now accessible to carriages from Bordighera, are Camporosso, on the way to Dolce Acqua in the Nervia Valley; Vallecrosia, San Biaggio, and Soldano in the next valley eastward; Borghetto, Vallebona, and Sasso, behind Bordighera; and Bordighera itself. It may not be generally known that Bordighera was bombarded by the English in the present century. In 1811 two guns mounted on Capo d'Ampeglio for defence against pirates were discharged by the zealous defenders upon an unoffending English vessel, which promptly withdrew from range, but shortly afterwards appeared two English men-of-war, and opened fire upon the town. An apology was hastily tendered, and the mayor invited to dine on board the English ship. In pre-telegraphic days things could happen unnoticed that might now be a casus belli, or, at any rate, the occasion of much diplomatic uneasiness. Mr. Scott has compiled an interesting, if somewhat slight, record of local history.

JEROME CARDAN, by W. G. Waters (Lawrence and Bullen, 7s. 6d.), is an admirable study of a most singular man. Even in an age when multifarious gifts were often combined in one individual to a degree which we can only regard with astonishment in these days of universal education, Cardan stands out as a remarkable example of many-sided intellectual activity. He was a scholar, a thinker, a linguist, a musician, a most voluminous writer on many subjects, ethical, literary, and scientific; he was a great controversialist, and a great teacher; he took up nothing without illuminating it in some degree; above all, he was at once the most famous mathematician and the leading medical practitioner of his day.

Where [says Naudé, an unfavourable biographer], where shall we find any one who had mastered so many sciences by himself, who had plumbed so deeply the abysses of learning, and had written such ample commentaries on the subjects he studied? Assuredly in philosophy, in metaphysics, in history, in politics, in morals, as well as in the more abstruse fields of learning, nothing that was worth consideration escaped his notice.

The most striking thing about Cardan's mental equipment is the combination of mathematical genius with medical accomplishment. In this respect he was quite unique. There seems to be something antagonistic or incompatible in the qualities requisite for marked success in these two fields of intellectual activity; the one demands the faculty of moving easily among abstractions, the other depends essentially on observation of the concrete and devotion to detail. Cardan's mastery of both is no doubt largely explained by the state of medical science in his day. When he began to study in 1519, and for long after, it was not science at all, but dogma and sheer quackery. The scientific foundations of the art were not laid until afterwards by the work of Vesalius in anatomy and Harvey in physiology. Nevertheless Cardan showed a real bent for observation far beyond most of his contemporaries, and his brilliantly original and successful treatment of Archbishop Hamilton, chiefly by dieting, reveals the shrewd penetration of the true physician. For a man to have had such an accurate eye for the bedside, who was, at the same time, the father of modern algebra, is an amazing proof of versatility.

The details of Cardan's personality and career are not less interesting than the record of his varied labours. With all his philosophy, his knowledge of the world, and sound sense, he was highly emotional and a prey to innumerable superstitions. His autobiography, on which Mr. Waters has drawn with great skill and judgment, reminds one strongly of Benvenuto Cellini. With the same brutal but fascinating candour, he reveals his weakness no less than his strength—his naïve egotism, his quarrelsome humour, his fantastic fears, his passionate griefs, unmanly repinings, and indomitable will. It is a most human picture, full of strong lights and shades, eloquent of truth. The manner in which Mr. Waters has done his work deserves nothing but praise. It is thoughtful, judicious, sober, well-proportioned, and well written.

THE STORY OF THE OXFORD MOVEMENT, by Mr. G. H. F. Nye (Bemrose, 3s. 6d.), which has just been published, and which has been, we believe, immediately sold out, is the work of a writer who has done a great deal of good work in exposing fallacies about the Church. The particular object he has in view on this occasion is to show that the Oxford reformers were men of high character and avowedly hostile to Romanizing practices. As an historian of the movement Mr. Nye is out of his depth. His book is a quite superficial sketch of the growth of Tractarianism, consisting mostly of quotations from Dean Church's book and other sources, and not leaving it always plain where the quotation ends and Mr. Nye begins. We all know nowadays that the Tractarians were avowedly anti-Roman, and we do not see the use—unless, indeed, Mr. Nye's audience is a quite uneducated one—of such remarks as that "Dean Church has left it on record that 'there was no Romanism in them nor anything that showed a tendency to it.'" Still less is any one likely to be convinced by such evidence as the following on the number of secessions to Rome :—

If we accept a statement made in a London paper [the Whitehall Review], the number of clergymen who joined the Church of Rome between 1833 and 1878, in forty-five years, numbered only 385, many of whom had been far from being what are known as "advanced" men. It is indeed possible that the number is even less than that here given, a number which the writer has made no attempt to verify.

It is, of course, also possible that the number is even more, not less, than that here given. Mr. Nye has "made no attempt" to help us to decide this question. There are appendices on the general position of the Church inserted with the laudable object of dealing again with some of the fallacies before mentioned, such as the prevalent opinion that the Bishops are paid out of the taxes. On the question of the "Continuity of the Church" we may perhaps advise Mr. Nye to consult Prof. Maitland's "Roman Canon Law in the Church of England" before quoting the Bishop of Southwell's authority that "it is a delusion that the Church of England was ever Roman, or ever acknowledged as a Church any subjection to the Pope." This book may, perhaps, enlighten persons who are beginning to inquire into the Church history of this century, but it will hardly convince a non-Anglican. The fact is that the Anglican movement is at an entirely different stage both in doctrine and practice from that which it had reached fifty years ago, and whether the early Tractarians were Romanizers or not is now a question of quite remote historical importance.

TRAVEL.

The cyclist posing as a man of letters cuts, as a rule, a sorry figure. There are what he would call "side-slips" in his grammar, and he is a master of that particular kind of "new humour" which consists in serving up old jokes with unwavering confidence in their power to raise a laugh. To this rule, however, the case of Mr. John Foster Fraser furnishes a notable exception. He was a man of letters before he became a cyclist; he only learnt to ride the bicycle, we believe, because it had occurred to him that it would be a good idea to go round the world on one. He went by way of Vienna, Budapest, Rumania, the Crimea, the Caucasus, Armenia, Persia, India, Burma, China, Japan, and the United States, covering 19,237 miles in all, and now tells his story in ROUND THE WORLD ON A WHEEL (Methuen, 6s.). He writes modestly, but with a graphic pen, making light of peril and discomfort, and giving the most charming little thumb-nail sketches of the many places of interest that he hurried through. The style is somewhat "slangy," but the book is one to which an unconventional style was best adapted. In places it reminds us of the peculiar impressionism of Mr. G. W. Steevens; though, as Mr. Foster Fraser was on his tour at the time when Mr. Steevens was winning his fame, this can scarcely have been the source of his inspiration. The book is not to be included among "important" works of travel; the author's preface makes it clear that he does not wish it to be so regarded. But it is a book to which the old cliché about "no dull page" can be unreservedly applied; and it gives a better dioramic view of the world—or at least of those parts of the world which the author visited—than do many far more pretentious volumes.

There are still plenty of virgin summits in Norway, and Mr. Cecil Slingsby knows which they are. He indicated a certain number of them to Mr. E. C. Oppenheim and Mr. Gerald Arbuthnot, who straightway went and climbed as many as they could. Mr. Oppenheim's book, NEW CLIMBS IN NORWAY (Unwin, 7s. 6d.), is the result. It narrates a number of ascents in the Sondmore district, and, though both the adventures and the descriptions of them are commonplace, it will be welcomed because it provisionally covers the ground. A book on the Sondmore district does, indeed, exist, but it is protected from the attentions of the general reader by that formidable cheval de frise, the Norwegian language. The headquarters from which the Sondmore mountains are attacked is Oie, and some one will be sure to thank us if we quote Mr. Oppenheim's brief note on the accommodation to be found there :—

We had thought [he writes] to find an isolated inn, cut off from the vanities of civilization, and we discovered a flourishing establishment, on the very high road of the tourist route, and about as isolated as the Grand Hotel at the foot of the Rhone Glacier. There are certain differences, however, which make all the difference in the world. The prices are as primitive as can be wished, the landlady as kindly and obliging as only a Norwegian can be, and of the tourists we saw nothing except for one brief instant on periodical occasions, when they were landed at the pier like a drove of cattle, hustled into carriages, and despatched with all speed to Hellerylt, the next stage on their monotonous and stereotyped journey.

FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

THE CATALOGUE OF THE LIBRARY OF SYON MONASTERY (Cambridge University Press, 15s.) is a record of an extensive collection of books formed in Monastic times, of which only six volumes can now be traced. All the rest have vanished. Syon House was established near Twickenham in 1415, but the monks migrated to Isleworth eleven years later, when the new house was built on the site now occupied by the mansion of the Duke of Northumberland. It was here that the library grew till it contained nearly 1,500 volumes, the titles of which are preserved to us in the Manuscript Catalogue to be seen in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. Miss Mary Bateson has now printed this catalogue for the first time, and by means of foot-notes identified, as to editions, &c., a considerable number of the books. The labour necessary to accomplish this must have been very great; the patience requisite almost endless, for Monkish cataloguers possessed scarcely any of the virtues of the modern bibliographer. An interesting introduction occupies the first seventeen pages and various elaborate indices fill the last sixty. The loss of the Syon Library has, as usual, to be ascribed to the zeal of the Reformation Commissioners. It is perhaps unnecessary to say that Syon House above mentioned had no connexion whatever with the better known Sion College, which was founded at the beginning of the seventeenth century.

BOOK AUCTIONS IN ENGLAND (Elliot Stock, 4s. 6d.) is happy in its author, for there is probably no one who could write with the same authority on this subject as Mr. John Lawler, who, on behalf, at one time, of Puttick's and now of Sotheby's, has compiled the catalogues of most of the important libraries which have been sold by auction in England during the last twenty years, including the Sunderland, Gennadius, and Ashburnham collections, three giant libraries, which will be referred to in after years when the literary activity of the nineteenth century is reviewed at large. Mr. Lawler's book treats of auctions held in England between the years 1676 and 1700 inclusive, and he has managed within the compass of two hundred pages to comment on considerably more than a hundred dispersions which are of interest now as illustrating the wide difference in the aspirations of book-men at different periods. Books had been sold by auction on the Continent prior, probably, to the year 1604, when the Elzevirs disposed in this way, at Leyden, of the library of the learned George Dousa, but in England the record commences in October, 1676, with Dr. Lazarus Seaman's ponderous volumes containing the writings of the Fathers and Biblical expositors, which were then dispersed again to the four quarters from whence they came. It is interesting to note the kind of books which were then in vogue and to compare them with the literature of our own day. It is as though giants carrying weaver's beams had given place to light-armoured and nimble rivals. And the prices of books then and now! At Seaman's sale the Homer of 1488 went for 9s.; the Crawford copy in 1887 for £135, and so on, even such a disparity as this being by no means exceptional, but rather the reverse, for at many of the sales volumes of early English poetry and Americana, now worth perhaps hundreds of pounds, produced the merest trifle. Several had to be bracketed to ensure a bid at all. Allowance being made for the difference in the value of money at various periods, the disparity in prices is none the less surprising. Mr. Lawler's book is not only an excellent contribution to one phase of Bibliography, but the only work in which the subject has been historically considered, or, indeed, treated at length at all.

THEOLOGY.

After some three-and-a-half centuries of the open Bible, we are beginning to realise that those who are not scholars need a good deal of explanation to make the Bible really open to them. How many people, for instance, could draw up a summary of the gospel story in its proper order? THE LIFE AND TEACHING OF JESUS CHRIST (H. Marshall, 3s. 6d.) will enable all to do this; for it gives the text of the four Gospels rearranged in chronological order, and enriched with an introduction by Dean Farrar and his commonplace book. The text thus mingled is divided into chapters with good descriptive headings, and subdivided into paragraphs. Furthermore, the words of Our Lord himself are printed in heavy type; and quotations from the Old Testament are also distinguished, as in Westcott and Hort's Greek Testament. The result is extremely convenient; but it does not give us a comely page. The paragraphs are not always apportioned with a fine literary sense, and it is unfortunate that the verse should be printed as if it were prose; one would far rather see the Magnificat arranged as it is in the Authorised Version than jammed into a single paragraph. A word of praise is due to the illustrations, which are reproductions from photographs of actual scenes in the Holy Land. Oddly enough the editor of this volume writes as if he were the first to arrange the gospels in this form. He seems to be unaware that Tatian did the same thing in the second century, and that Tatian's Diatesseron has been translated both into Latin and English. Yet we have compared several chapters of the book before us with the Diatesseron, and have found hardly any variation in the arrangement.

IN WAS CHRIST BORN AT BETHLEHEM? A Study on the Credibility of St. Luke (Hodder and Stoughton, 5s.), Prof. Ramsay applies to the Gospel of St. Luke the method which proved so fruitful in his study of the Acts. His general principle is one which he admits to be unfashionable—namely, that Luke is to be regarded as “one of the greatest historians”; his method consists in an elaborate examination of Luke ii., 1-4:—“There went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus that all the world should be taxed. And this taxing was first made when Cyrenius was Governor of Syria,” &c., which has been regarded as altogether discrediting the evangelist's claim to trustworthiness. St. Luke is charged with two blunders. He mentions a census as having taken place in the year of Our Lord's birth, whereas it has been hitherto maintained that the first and only census held by the Romans in Palestine is that which, according to Josephus, was held about A.D. 6-7. He also connects this imaginary census with an officer, Quirinius, who is only known to have been “Governor of Syria” about A.D. 6-9. Prof. Ramsay's answer, in brief, is this—that recent research in Egypt has brought to light the existence of a periodical system of “enrolment-by-households,” which probably prevailed in Syria as well as in Egypt and elsewhere. If the testimony of Luke is to be believed, Augustus laid down “the principle of systematic enrolment in the Roman world.” This, and not an injunction for the taking of a single census, is the true force of the passage; and St. Luke's statement is supported by the recent discovery of a periodic system of enrolments (apographai) in Egypt. Prof. Ramsay argues that there are traces of a similar system having prevailed in Syria. The first enrolment, which should have taken place in 8 B.C., was probably, for reasons which he stated, delayed for a year or two, with the result that the first tribal enrolment actually took place in B.C. 6, which Prof. Ramsay regards as the probable year of Christ's birth. The difficulty as to Quirinius is met by an argument tending to show that Quirinius held an extraordinary military command as legatus Augusti during the period (B.C. 7-5), while Varus was for all ordinary purposes Governor of Syria. Prof. Ramsay's discussion gives an intelligible account of certain very obscure incidents in the provincial history of the early Empire. His conclusions will, of course, be disputed, but the question of St. Luke's credibility in regard to the facts of Christ's life undoubtedly stands on a different level since the discovery of the facts relating to the enrolments in Egypt and the personal history of Quirinius. Some important documents are appended to Prof. Ramsay's book, including three specimens of an Egyptian “rating paper” (apographe). We cannot doubt that Prof. Ramsay's method is sound, and that the only hope of solving many pressing difficulties of historical criticism lies in a more sympathetic study of the New Testament writers. The author has, we think, shown that a vindication of St. Luke's qualities as a historian is of vital interest to all students of the early history of the Roman Empire, and especially of its provincial administration.

SAINT VINCENT DE PAUL.—Miss Mildred Partridge's translation of the Abbé de Broglie's “St. Vincent de Paul” (Duckworth, 3s.) is on the whole very well done, with the exception of the astounding blunder on p. 3, where we read:—

Vincent, at the age of twelve, was entrusted to the care of the Franciscans at Dax, who undertook to teach him for the sum of sixty pounds a year, a sum which, moderate as it may seem to us, was a heavy tax on the poor family.

In the original the word translated “pounds” was, of course, “livres,” and the sentence should run “sixty francs a year”—a moderate charge enough. Of St. Vincent himself it is only necessary to say that, as founder of the Sisters of Charity, he has perhaps more than any other man contributed to the lessening of the sum of human misery.

SAINT CLOTILDA.—This life of “St. Clotilda,” written by Professor Kurth, of Liège University, and translated by V. M. Crawford (Duckworth, 3s.), should teach people to be more careful in their use of that much-abused phrase “the Dark Ages.” One hears the term applied to such a period as the thirteenth century—one of the most splendid ages that humanity has known—as if “darkness” could produce a Dante, a St. Thomas Aquinas, or a Salisbury Cathedral; but the age of St. Clotilda—the sixth century—was indeed dark, and the record of it is full of massacre, unnatural murder, and violence. Throughout this terrible time Clotilda, the wife of Clovis, seems the only placid figure, and her reputation for sanctity, largely due to her conversion of her husband, no doubt gained immensely by the force or contrast.

ST. POLYCARP.—The Rev. Blomfield Jackson has collated for this volume of the Early Church Classics all the known passages which bear on the life and martyrdom of “St. Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna” (S.P.C.K., 1s.), the most important materials being “The Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians” and “The Letter of the Smyrniens to the Martyrdom of Polycarp.” The annotations on the text are admirably done, but Mr. Jackson might have added to his note on “the fragrance as great as of frankincense” that was perceived while the martyr was burning. For this phenomenon was not alone observed, as the note would seem to imply, at the burning of martyrs; it is related also in the stories of the Saints who died a natural death. Thus, in the life of St. Clotilda, reviewed above, the author quotes from Gregory of Tours:—

At the instant of her quitting the world a great light filled the house as though it were midday, and an exquisite perfume pervaded the air so that it seemed to the bystanders as though they were smelling incense and other sweet spices.

In like manner, when St. David died, the whole city was filled with fragrance, and it might be interesting to investigate these phenomena, which modern writers would class together as “collective hallucinations of odour.”

In Messrs. Brimley Johnson and N. Erichsen's series of “Modern Plays” (Duckworth) we have now a Mæterlinck volume (3s. 6d.), containing “Alladine and Palomides,” “Interior,” and “The Death of Tintagiles,” of which the two latter have already appeared in English. Mr. Alfred Sutro translates “The Death of Tintagiles,” which Mæterlinck himself looks upon as his best work, and “Alladine and Palomides.” “Interior” is translated by Mr. W. Archer. These curious little studies in the mystery of fate are ill adapted for the stage, and the characters, depicted with a truth of which Mr. Sutro certainly makes the most in his introduction, are the only things which approach reality. But there is an increasing interest in this Continental literary drama, which represents a phase of thought so different from our more cheerful and practical outlook on life. When, by the way, is England to be represented in this series of “Modern Plays?”

A standard book which has lately been re-issued is Dr. A. W. Ward's HISTORY OF ENGLISH DRAMATIC LITERATURE (Macmillan, 36s.), originally published nearly a quarter of a century ago, and now fully revised by the author, who, to make room for new matter, has omitted the theoretical introduction which began the original edition.

Cassell's NEW POPULAR EDUCATOR is now published in a cheaper form at 3s. 6d. the volume.

ACROSS THE VELD.

I roamed across the veld at sunset time,
And evening met me on the quiet way,
With her the winds that wander down from God,
And kiss to sleep the tired eyes of day—
Kind evening, with the shadows at her feet,
The trailing shadows—coolly dim and grey.

They gather, and they grow at her command,
And lo! the dusty plain is softly veiled,
And there are stars upon the veld—dusk red,
As if dropped down from skies where day has failed—
The lights of wand'ring homes, of desert ships,
That at the sunset into port have sailed.

And as I wandered on with straying feet,
Came to her throne, from out the shadowed West,
Queen Night, in royal raiment of the dark,
Sceptred with silence, the young moon her crest,
Queen Night—with all the sorrows of the day
Folded to sleep upon her kindly breast.

And then I watched the pageant of her reign;
I heard the night winds in the Krantzes shout
A "Hail" unto the coming of the Queen.
I saw in heaven the starry guard file out;
I felt the resting Earth her homage bring,
The homage of deep stillness all about.

And thoughts came unto me, thoughts strangely fair,
Born of the evening mist, the night's dark reign,
Born of the solitude and of the winds,
Vague as the starlight, keen with joy and pain,
Full of some message for my straining ear,
Thoughts that just whispered, and were gone again!

Poor brain of man! so impotently weak
To use the words that wait at its command;
Tho' with a touch we paint the day's bright birth,
And in a line night lies upon the land,
And all the wonders of creation live
In deathless words, penned by some master hand.

Yet thoughts that God sends for our lips to teach
Out of the darkness down the starry ways,
That cry unto our souls to give them voice—
We only listen to in mute amaze;
Our helpless tongues are silent at their call,
Our helpless hands in vain attempt we raise.

Oh human soul! so strangely, sadly dumb.
Back into darkness, whence they came, they go,
The thoughts thou couldst not voice, the heaven-sent seed
That might have caused some fair new flower to grow,
Back into darkness—followed by my tears,
That, falling softly, scarce know why they flow.

THE FIXED IDEA.

A recent writer in the Edinburgh Review, praising the merits of "Barry Lyndon," expressed his regret that Thackeray had not made his public entrance with the history of his Irish Rogue in the manner, as the reviewer said, of other great writers who have almost always begun their career with a striking masterpiece. A good deal of this pronouncement is, of course, open to serious question; we may doubt whether "Barry Lyndon" is a great masterpiece, we may instance a good many authors who have had to fight through a labyrinth of false paths before their true way was discovered to them; but the chief point is this—that Thackeray's talent lay by no means on the road of the picaresque, and that his true starting point was "The Book of Snobs."

For when he wrote "The Book of Snobs" he discovered himself, he entered into his kingdom, and thenceforth, being possessed of this one theme, he spent his days in executing variations upon it. All the other books—"Vanity Fair," "Pendennis," "Newcomes," "Virginians," "Philip"—are intricate, admirable, elaborate extensions and developments of those happy sketches contributed to Punch; even in "Esmond" (concerning which book I cherish a private heresy, not by any means to be taught for doctrine), the same view of life, the same motives intrude, and that especial aspect of humanity which is the spirit, the energy, of the "Snob" studies worked still beneath the pages of the later books. Thackeray (so far as he is valuable) is a man of one idea, and his work was to exhibit this idea under many and diverse conditions.

Again, take the case of Dickens. In almost every possible way the two great rivals were opposed to one another; they might be well used, indeed, as prerogative instances of the two great schools of literary art; but they consented in this, that each had his one impression embodying itself in a series of books. Just as "The Book of Snobs" is, potentially, the whole of Thackeray, so "Pickwick" contains within itself the promise and the excellence of all the stories that were to follow it. Thackeray had the advantage of novelty in his obsession; to no one before had there been vouchsafed so clear and malefic a vision of society in its meaner aspects, whereas "Pickwick" is Matt Bramble, "Pickwick" is Gil Blas, Don Quixote, Sir Lancelot, ultimately Ulysses the Wanderer. Thackeray did but little good with the picaresque motive, Dickens could do little good with anything else. In proportion as Dickens tried to get away from the early scheme and to elaborate plots, or satirise society (as in "Our Mutual Friend"), he fell away from the excellence of "Pickwick," and produced melodrama which Forster applauded, but which saner criticism unreservedly condemns. To take a hero, to set him on a journey, to provide him with adventure on his way, to strew his path with strange characters—this was all the art of Dickens. This is the scheme of "Pickwick," and if this had been the sole scheme of "Nicholas Nickleby" Mr. Andrew Lang would not have been obliged to confess that for him Ralph Nickleby—a Surrey side demon in a frockcoat—was "too steep."

Poe and Hawthorne are a second pair of instances. Indeed, I might have taken Poe as the leading case of this literary obsession, this one idea giving birth to all the excellence of a writer's work, but Poe is so exceptional, his body of imaginative work is, comparatively, so small, that it seemed better to begin with authors who make a more general appeal. But Poe is, certainly, an excellent example of the theory. He had a dreadful fear in his heart that the dead are not altogether dead, and excepting intellectual exercises such as the Dupin tales, and his interesting but tentative and imperfect "Arthur Gordon Pym" all his best stories exhibit variations of this one terrific hypothesis. And the skill with which he handles these variations is, in itself, very striking. At first sight it might seem difficult to co-relate "M. Valdemar" with the "MS. found in a Bottle," the "Fall of the House of Usher" with the "Premature Burial," but a closer examination will show that all four stories are haunted by the one impression, the one dread of death as a slow and lingering process that may extend over days, or months, or, perhaps, centuries. In Hawthorne, the one idea is not so much an affair of matter (though the thought of the invisible world very near to the visible runs through most of his books), as of manner; a certain method of symbolism possessed him from the first, from the "Minister's Black Veil" to the romance which he left uncompleted. Even in the description of the Old Manse, while one sees that Hawthorne is trying to shake off his obsession, to be cheerful, lively, modern, nay, almost commonplace if he can possibly manage it, one sees also the original, inveterate influence assert itself. For instance, he is speaking of the study:—

When I first saw the room, its walls were blackened with the smoke of unnumbered years and made still blacker by the grim prints of Puritan ministers that hung around. These worthies looked strangely like bad angels, or at least like men who had wrestled so continually and fiercely with the devil that somewhat of his sooty fierceness had been imparted to their own visages.

The likeness of the Reverend Master Dimmesdale was amongst the portraits on that wall; the two sentences prophesy the "Scarlet Letter," and not only in manner, but in matter. Hawthorne is of all writers the most difficult to analyze, to define; one is tempted to declare that elusiveness is the only quality that can be certainly predicated of him. It is thus impossible to "pin him down" as if he were Poe, who certainly made materialism mysterious, but remains a materialist. In dealing with Poe I pointed out the master-idea which dominates his stories; it is not easy to be so peremptory with Hawthorne, in spite of the fact that, as strongly as in the case of Poe, we feel the presence of one influence shaping all his work. But perhaps I may say that all through Hawthorne I seem to hear one solemn repeated interrogation, the voice of a man who whispers, questioning himself whether the whole universe is indeed an awful and sacramental symbol; whether the forms of the hills and the trees, the quivering shadows on running water, the colour of a flower or a dress, all our indifferent and unpremeditated gestures and actions and adventures, are but signs and figures of another world, unapproachable and yet close at hand. Poe replied to his riddles, but Hawthorne can find no answer, and the unsolved, reiterated enigma is the energy of all his books.

It would be easy to multiply instances of this excellent literary monomania. Some writers having found the one idea were able to abide by it in the most literal manner. One discovers traces of this in Thackeray, who repeats his characters, transferring them by name from one book to another. We meet Pendennis in the "Newcomes" and in "Philip"; the agreeable Wenham appears in "Vanity Fair" and "Pendennis"; and in the "Virginians" one is made acquainted with the founder of the dynasty of the Fokers and hears news of George Warrington's ancestors, while the whole book is a "sequel" to "Esmond." Dickens tried to do something of the same kind after the success of "Pickwick," but failed, his fixed idea not permitting such a device. But Rabelais and Sterne remained men of one book, adding "parts" to the original volume, instead of seeking for schemes entirely new, and Cervantes adopted the same plan. In our own day Mr. Hardy has, with wonderful skill, made two simple motives serve for, perhaps, half a score of novels, and an enterprising editor, in search of a new "literary competition," might well ask his readers to name these motives and to trace their use in, say, "Under the Greenwood Tree," "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," "A Pair of Blue Eyes," "Two on a Tower," and "Jude the Obscure." In any case such a competition would amuse, and perhaps some of the competitors might in this way be induced to distinguish between the art of the novel-writer and the craft of the persons who supply the demand for "popular fiction."

There is, of course, a moral lesson to be deduced from this as from all other artistic theories. Let not the young writer be afraid when he is reproached with the sin of "repeating himself," let him not be ashamed when the enemy talks of obsession. Let him only take heed that the obsession be a great one, and for the rest he may console himself with the maxim that the art of literature is, in a great degree, the art of repeating oneself effectively. One idea is not a huge stock, but between one and none lies all infinity.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

A MODERN ORPHEUS.

[BY G. MOULTON PIPER.]

It was a hot, sultry evening, a fitting close to a humid, oppressive day, and the clouds hung threateningly over Paris. The many carriages streaming into the city from Auteuil were laden with tired and dusty pleasure-seekers, whose appearance indicated that the back-wash of an exciting race meeting can be a depressing thing. I was, personally, as listless as my fellow-travellers, and, on dismissing my fiacre, I found myself with quite three hours to while away before joining some friends at Asnières.

Going in the direction of the Palais de Justice I was attracted to a little crémèrie, down one of the side streets, by the sound of a violin. On entering I noticed little beyond the fact that the interior displayed the usual features of such places, most things slovenly and all things markedly cheap. The chief matter of interest was, however, an old man, an Italian, who sat in the window seat playing in a desultory manner various operatic airs.

He played mechanically as a man plays whose thoughts are absorbed by other matters, but as he wandered on, it was evident that he was a master of his instrument. Presently he drifted into the opening bars of Gluck's incomparable "Chè farò," and, as the wail for Eurydice streamed out, the whole attitude of the man changed. His negligence vanished, and whatever skill he possessed he exerted in elaborating his theme. It was easy to perceive that his phrasing was incorrect, but in place of an academic precision he imparted to the tantalizing witchery of Orfeo's song the charm of personal human sentiment. The violin was on the Amati model, and, like most instruments of its class, it responded to one string better than to the rest. In this particular instance it was the lowest. The old man knew this peculiarity, and he used that string with a frequency which only a skilled executant would have dared. As one variation succeeded another, and as each deep tone lost itself in an apparently still lower depth, the air gradually merged its identity in the player until at last the sobs of the sorrowing god appeared to come from the man himself.

That this was only a mood I knew perfectly well, and yet I had neither the desire nor the inclination to throw it off. So dreamy was my abstraction over the myth of Orpheus and Eurydice that I never noticed the old man's departure, and it was only by an accidental meeting with him on the Pont Neuf some hour or so after that I was able to indulge any curiosity that I had in his history. He had but a simple story to relate. Originally a labourer at Lucca, he afterwards became a figurinaio, and with their plaster casts he and his wife, his Paula, as he called her, had wandered into many countries. He had been most successful in America, where, in the scattered homes of the Western States, he found a good demand for his wares. By careful trading and the most rigid self-denial they had saved what they thought enough to keep them for the remainder of their days, and with this they returned to Italy. By an unhappy accident they settled in Milan, the home of his wife's people, and it was there, during the uprising in the early days of May, that Paula was shot while looking on, quite unsuspectingly, at the building of the barricade in the Via Torino. Mad with grief the old man seized a rifle and took his part with the rioters, knowing nothing of their objects nor their intents, and then, ruined in his worldly affairs and practically an outlaw, he afterwards came to Paris with the hope of earning a living by means of his violin. In telling his story the man made no complaint, he hardly raised his voice above a whisper, but every reference to his wife seemed to grip him by the throat, while from his eyes came that look of numbed helplessness that marks the tragedy of the poor.

The story of Orpheus and Eurydice grew up when the world was young, and it will last as long as the world lasts, for though life is good, there are few things more bitter than loneliness in old age. But to the scores who were passing by us one more shattered life upon time's highway was of no more importance than was the ruin of an individual to the political charlatans who attempted in Italy to make capital out of the necessities of her people.

And, looking over the bridge, the gleaming causeway that the city lights made upon the Seine appeared suddenly peopled with the victims of life's minor tragedies. In the far distance stood Aucassin's peasant, the long-suffering serf of the twelfth century, "that tragic impersonation of all the inarticulate misery of a race whose lives were crushed and defiled unnoticed," in order to support the vices and luxuries of a brutal feudalism. Not far from him was a group of Florentines of the fourteenth century who, hopelessly ruined by political squabbles in which they had neither hand nor part, went about the streets of their own city feeding on grass like beasts. Nearer still stood the Provençal peasants of the Pre-Revolution days, eking out their scanty supply of barley flour by mixing it with acorns and vetches so as to make bigger loaves. While here, quite close, were the Lombard peasants of to-day, goaded into revolt by leaders who traded upon their starvation and their poverty.

Always the same story, the people paying for the sins and the follies of their leaders, and the fury and the force of political misdoing always falling heaviest upon the lowest string in the social scale, where the agony and the suffering grip hardest.

Notes.

In next week's Literature "Among my Books" will be written by Mr. Arnold Haultain, the well known Canadian writer.

Sir George Bowen was, of course, better known as a colonial governor than as a man of letters. Yet it is said that it was as a man of letters that he first attracted the attention of Mr.

Gladstone, to whom he owed his first colonial appointment. A learned paper on Ithaca, first printed at Coreyra, where Sir George Bowen held a scholastic post, and afterwards reprinted in London, naturally interested a statesman who himself had views about the "Odyssey." He also wrote a book of travels, relating a journey to Mount Athos, and collaborated in Murray's "Handbook to Greece." The statement, however, made in various obituary notices that he wrote that Handbook is not quite accurate. His work in connexion with it began with the third edition, which appeared in 1852. The Handbook in question was the first of all the Greek Handbooks, unless that of Pausanias (which gives no information about hotels) can fairly be counted as a predecessor.

Conflicting views about stage construction have been so much ventilated of late that an unusual interest attaches to the recent performance of The Alchemist by the Elizabethan Stage Society. Ben Jonson was a purist with views not unlike those of some modern dramatists with regard to action and stage carpentry. He prided himself on the subtlety of his art as against Shakespeare, whom he censured for want of "art," for not revising his plays, and for attempting to introduce the impossible, such as "the pomp and circumstance of actual war," upon the stage. The prologue to The Alchemist is itself a protest against the actor, who attempts to introduce too much action into his part. But when we have reconciled ourselves to the want of scenery, to the triumph of the unities, and to a strict adherence to the possible, the question remains where is this "art," which Shakespeare lacked, which Ben himself claimed, and which subsequent writers, such as Pope, attributed to him. The Alchemist is not, after all, a very well constructed play, and despite the satiric power of some of the scenes, which certainly act better than they read, is not in any sense an artistic whole. The solution may be that the author of the immortal lyric "The Chariot of Love," and the no less wonderful invective "The Ode to Himself," was not by nature a playwright, but a poet and satirist, caught into the stream of Elizabethan dramatists.

Mr. William Wallace, of Glasgow, a well-known authority on Scottish literature, in lecturing the other day on "Scott's Spiritual and Ethical Influence" to the Edinburgh "Sir Walter Scott" Club, frankly admitted that the phrase provoked incredulity. Carlyle said of Scott, "His life was worldly, his ambitions were worldly; there is nothing spiritual in him; all is economical, material, of the earth earthy." Mr. Leslie Stephen said, "Scott was a thoroughly healthy, sound, vigorous Scotsman, with an eye for the main chance, but not much of an eye for the eternities," and Taine, writing on the same subject, said, "Scott has neither talent nor leisure to reach the depth of his characters. He devotes himself to the exterior; he sees and describes forms and externals much more at length than feelings and internals." Mr. Wallace appealed to "the plain Scotsman" whom the reading of Scott encouraged to hold the sensual world at arm's length, and, in fact, to do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly. But he appears to confuse spirituality with ethics. Scott never set up as either a preacher or a teacher in his novels. To say that he was a great spiritual teacher because he made virtue triumph over vice is surely an exaggeration. None of the works of Scott belongs to the "novel with a purpose" class. "He was the greatest moral sanitarian that ever appeared in the world of imagination," said Mr. Wallace. This and more might be granted without admitting that the matchless Wizard of the North is, or ever was, a "spiritual" force in literature or in the country.

The latest fashion in books is the bibelot, one specimen of which we have already noticed—a narrow octavo, printed with well defined type and decorated with vignettes and head and tail pieces only. It represents an attempt to get back to the "boudoir" style, and to the dainty mannerisms of the French publishers of pre-revolution days. In America it is quite an institution. Originally it was intended to be a volume of selections rather than a complete book, but it has lately been adopted as a medium for publishing many of the lighter and smaller classics of literature, such as Herrick's poems. It must not be confounded with the opuscula issued, mostly gratuitously, by various literary and other coteries. The opuscula may be got up in any style, or, indeed, without any style at all—they are often mere tracts—but the bibelot separated from its aristocratic guise ceases to be a bibelot. On the other hand, the bibelot may generally be obtained by the public for a dollar, or a few shillings, as the case may be, but rarity and the difficulty of procuring them frequently send the prices of opuscula into the category of pounds, as was evidenced the other day when a set of five of the scarce Stevenson Davos Platz booklets fetched at auction the very high price of £51.

Is it merely a counsel of perfection—something too much to hope for—that all books fresh from the press should show clearly by their title-pages whether they are issued for the first time or not? Publishers have still to be brought into line on this question—which is really, as we pointed out some months ago, of pressing importance and, indeed, one of elementary morals. Messrs. Macmillan have recently added bibliographical notes to their new editions, stating how often and at what dates there have been reprints. Messrs. Longmans, too, now do this, and they also put "Reissue" boldly on the title-page. The example is one to be followed. It ought to be a well-understood rule that books which have already come before the public shall not make their reappearance as if they were new. This is not only in the interest of reviewers (who are, of course, supposed to be able to frustrate all such knavish tricks), but in order that book-buyers may know exactly what they are buying and not be led into purchasing next winter a Christmas book of the season that is just past.

In "Poison Romance and Poison Mysteries" (The Scientific Press, 6s.) Mr. C. J. S. Thompson writes a sprightly chapter on toxicology in fiction. It appears that, though Shakespeare poisoned Juliet according to the rules, the average modern novelist is not great at pharmacy. Wilkie Collins tried to be safe by being vague. "A medicated glass of water and a medicated bottle of smelling-salts" disposed of one victim; another was got rid of by means of "a poisonous gas," which was passed through her bed-chamber. It is, no doubt, a thing that could be done; but the doctors who, in the latter case, discovered that death was due to apoplexy were scarcely ornaments of the medical profession. One of Mr. Benson's heroine's "poisons herself with prussic acid which she discovers among some photographic chemicals"; and the critic can only wonder how it got there. Most notable of all is the case of one of Miss Helen Mathers' characters who "detects the presence of the strychnine in the glass of whisky and water at a glance." It is certainly remarkable that Miss Mathers, as the wife of a medical man, did not take the opportunity of submitting this statement to expert criticism before publishing it.

Mr. Thompson's survey of the subject, however, is not so exhaustive as it might have been. One would have liked to hear something about curare—a poison employed with startling effect by du Boisgobey in "Le Crime de l'Omnibus" and by Mr. Andrew Lang in "The Mark of Cain"; and one would have been grateful for a skilled opinion on Mr. Morley Roberts' poisoning story. It is a story of two clerks in the War Office who resolved to poison their chief. They operated separately, and the two drugs which they gave him were mutual antidotes, so that he continued to go about his business just as though he had taken neither of them. Can such things be? The novel reader has a right to know.

It may be added in this connexion that there is a wonderful virgin poison which still awaits the attention of the novelist. This is the gas known as arsenuretted hydrogen. The least whiff of it is deadly, and it leaves no trace that post-mortem investigations would be likely to detect. On the other hand, it is a very dangerous gas to make; the manufacturer might easily meet his own death in the process. But that is an additional advantage to the writer of fiction, providing him with a novel method of removing a villain from the stage.

The House of Commons has a surprising fund, not so much of humour, as of what may be called collective levity. Philosophers may inquire why a very little joke, which would be coldly received at a private dinner table, meets with an enthusiastic welcome if it occurs in a Parliamentary debate. The fact remains, and we do not pretend to account for it. The other day Mr. Balfour spoke of "a stake in the country" as a phrase that had been "rather overdone," at which accidental jeu de mots the House laughed again and again. The philosopher to whom we commend the inquiry must not attribute the merriment to the reaction caused by previous boredom, for Mr. Balfour was then in the middle of an interesting and ingenious speech. Nor had the debate been dull as a whole. It had been enlivened by more than one witticism, and especially by Mr. MacNeill, who referred to the pathetic statement made by the late Mr. Mundella on his retirement from office, and declared, "If only I shut my eyes I can almost see him." This, however, was not an Irish bull, but only the assertion of a physical fact.

The recent fire at The Grange, Totteridge, resulted in the destruction of yet another of the fine private libraries of England. Sir Charles Nicholson had spent very many years in forming his collection, which, besides several early editions of the classics and of English books, contained a magnificent collection of works on Egyptology and many valuable papyri. The fact that the loss sustained by the owner of the library cannot be accurately estimated owing to the want of a catalogue illustrates again the necessity of cataloguing private libraries.

On Thursday and Friday in next week Messrs. Sotheby will dispose of one of the most comprehensive collections of modern authors that have been placed on the market for some time past. Dickens, Hardy, Lamb, Lever, Meredith, Scott, Stevenson, Swinburne, and Thackeray are, among others, represented in very nearly complete series. These are all first editions, elaborately bound, with the original covers or wrappers bound in. An effort will be made to dispose of each series en bloc, but should the reserve prices not be reached, the volumes will be sold separately. The latter course is much more to the liking of collectors generally and in the majority of cases produces better results for the seller.

The opening has now been announced of Lady Murray's Home for Invalided Authors at Cap d'Antibes. At present, it appears, the paying guests (at £1 a week) are three in number—two Frenchmen and a Russian poet. Sunning themselves in the garden, they will be able to cement an alliance which (if what one hears is true) needs all the cement that it can get. One trusts that they will not combine in a policy of pin-pricks against the English literary invalids who are said to be "expected shortly."

An original idea has recently been put into execution by a group of writers, draughtsmen, and wood-engravers in Paris. They have conceived a collection of little volumes, at 2 francs each, entitled "Les Minutes Parisiennes." M. Georges Montorgueil has begun the series, which will contain twenty-four volumes, by a delightfully exact little study of the noon-hour, the moment when the boulevards suddenly overflow with the petites couturières hurrying from their work for the few brief moments of rest at a neighbouring café. M. Gabriel Mourey will write "1 Heure, La Bourse"; M. Gustave Geffray, "2 Heures, La Cité et l'Île Saint Louis"; M. Huysmans, "4 Heures, Quais, Jardins Publics, Flânerie," while the other twenty-one hours are in equally experienced hands. Ollendorff is the publisher.

It is not generally known in England that the ex-doyen of the Comédie Française, M. Frederic Febvre, is an accomplished writer. His "Journal" may be familiar to a few, but his tales and sketches are equally worth knowing. Ollendorff has just brought out a new volume of sketches by him, "La Clef des Champs," which M. André Theuriet, the Academician, has introduced in a preface. Once off the boards, as de Musset says, night seems to swoop down upon the actor and to shut him away from view. "You, my dear Febvre," says M. Theuriet, "have meant to escape this danger, and as you have travelled widely, seen and treasured up a good many things, as you are a lettré as well as an artist, you have easily become a writer." Febvre has as much distinction as a reporter of life as he has as its exponent before the footlights; and the fact is special enough to merit a record.

It will be remembered that Lieutenant Julien Viaud (Pierre Loti) and a certain number of brother naval officers were placed by President Faure on the retired list. They appealed to the Council of State, which has annulled this decision.

A correspondent writes :—

It is hardly fair to accept Germany's neglect of Ruskin as typical of that country's attitude generally towards modern English literature. The rank and file of German readers may never have heard of Ruskin, but they know their Carlyle perhaps better than we do, though their appreciation may be attributed in some degree to his services as English translator and advertiser of Goethe and biographer of Schiller. Darwin is even more popular among Germans than Carlyle. The "Origin of Species" and "Descent of Man" command a large and steady sale in the cheap little salmon-coloured paper edition, published by those universal providers of literature for the masses, the Reclams of Leipzig. They are to be bought for a few pennings in any town (or village that boasts a shop) in Germany or Austria, together with the writings of John Stuart Mill, not to mention Dickens, Thackeray, and Stevenson. In England we have only just arrived at publishing the works of our own novelists at 6d.

Baron von Ompteda, who died the other day at Wiesbaden, was an indefatigable writer of fiction. He supplied many of the leading German magazines with serials, and his novels and short stories fill eighteen volumes. He also translated all de Maupassant's novels into German and some of Prévost's.

Dr. Ludwig Fulda has just declined the post of dramaturgist to the Royal Schauspielhaus, Berlin, offered him with the title of Professor. Fulda's new historical drama Herostrat, given the other night for the first time at the Burg Theatre, Vienna, excited little enthusiasm, though the verse in which the play is written is said to be irreproachable and the workmanship masterly. The design of Herostratus to set fire to the Temple of Diana in Ephesus in order that his name shall go down to posterity seems hardly to have lent itself happily to dramatic treatment. Its psychological motive is summed up more effectively in the simple words of the historian "cupiditas gloriæ" than in all Dr. Fulda's elaborate versification and brilliant tableaux.

Another première which has recently disappointed the expectations of the Viennese was the performance of the Zionist leader Theodor Herzl's Unser Kitchén at the Volks Theater. Herzl's attempt at comedy has not proved nearly as successful as his grave problem drama Das Neue Ghetto of a year ago, owing to the fact that it is not pure comedy at all, but an amalgam of Scribe, Ibsen, and some very ferocious Juvenalian satire.

The news of the retirement of Mr. Henry Norman from active journalism will be heard with feelings of regret. In the discussion of foreign affairs in the Daily Chronicle, Mr. Norman may have been a little apt to substitute eloquence for close reasoning and accurate statement; but he has always been interesting. His books, too—more particularly the books which he wrote before he seemed to find his political responsibilities weighing too heavily upon him—were often real additions to the gaiety of nations. We trust that he will write many more now that he has withdrawn to his Hampshire farm.

Foreign Letter.

THE WALLACHS OF MACEDONIA AND THEIR FOLK-LORE.

Almost forgotten among the surviving races of the remote past, buried out of sight in the wild recesses of West Macedonia and Central Albania, dispersed almost throughout the Pindus Mountains, scattered over the stony hills on the Thessalian border, and grouped in several communities beneath the rugged crest of Olympus there exist numerous settlements and endless hamlets of a strangely picturesque race of shepherds and artisans—Romans in name, in language, and in type.

The long, impenetrable darkness that settled down on these epic lands, enshrouding them with a veil of mystery after the downfall of Rome and the collapse of Byzantium beneath the flowing tide of Islam, is lifting its shadows at the dawn of a new epoch; for education is slowly but surely creeping, step by step, even to those primitive, unexplored regions, where the gloom of benighted ignorance and superstition still weighs heavily on the wings of progress. The school-bell rings daily in the towns and villages. The schoolmaster is abroad, busy teaching and proselytizing with all the fervour of awakened patriotism. Bulgarians and Greeks, but seldom Wallachs, are eager to assert their claims to national and linguistic preponderance.

The Vlachs of Macedonia and adjoining territories, Romuni or Armuni—according to their own version—are chiefly natives of the hills, graziers and herdsmen; they cling to the highlands, dwelling in sequestered time-worn villages, built of stone, poised high on the steep mountain slopes like eagles' nests. Reticent and retiring in their manner with strangers, using the Greek language for general intercourse in the South, instead of their own dialect, these Zinzari adapt themselves readily to a change of circumstances, notwithstanding their antiquated ways and rustic antecedents. Thus many have drifted to the towns, where they have formed thriving colonies. Opulent traders are far from being rare among the Romuni, while their skill as craftsmen is justly renowned, especially in wood-carving and metal work; the artistic design and delicate tracery of the filigree ornaments of the silversmiths are a feature of this industry. A large number of the inns are kept by Wallachs, named "Charizi," whose houses are cleaner than those belonging to Albanians.

In Monastir, where there is a considerable Latin population mixing but little in marriage with the other nationalities, the cultivation and collection of the legends and folk-songs is encouraged by the more educated class, by the teachers and clergy. But it is to be feared that, in consequence of frequent doctoring and artificial additions, many old ballads and quaint legends will lose much of their pristine purity. The Farseriots have long dwelt on the shores of Lake Ochrida, and in the town on the cliffs above. Here, on the highway to the heart of Albania, they have lived for countless generations, side by side with the aboriginal race. But there is no record of their roaming hither, nor whence they came. Perhaps a trace may be found in the weird and fanciful tales and legends, teeming with a world of gnomes and fairies, and tinged instinctively with the impressive imagery of pagan mythology, so near the land of its birth. Many curious, with some really poetical, beliefs still flourish, cherished in the hearts of this imaginative people. For instance, on the pastoral slopes of the Pindus chain from Mount Smolika to Itamo in the south, the simple shepherds cling jealously to their local superstitions; amidst others they credit the souls of the departed with a fanciful transformation after their translation to Heaven. All journey, good and bad, to the garden of eternal life. But the good are there changed into fragrant flowers of wondrous loveliness, while the bad become noxious and poisonous plants. Muskopolje is one of the oldest and most convincingly Roman settlements in middle Albania, for, in truth, this inaccessible spot is not only the centre of a Wallach community, but also a nursery of native minstrelsy, and the birthplace of numerous popular ballads.

Yet the surviving fragments of this decaying race are slowly losing ground. In some parts these degenerate Romans are adopting the Albanian tongue, and trilling the same songs, as they drive the flocks over the sunny hills. The blood-feud is unknown to them, though they dwell in the midst of Albanians; hence they are called by the Greeks "Arvanitovlachi." An old saying is heard among the Vlachs of this pashalik to this effect:—"Vinlu al amiron ku vinlu al poso, tu uno bute s nu s meastiko" (The wine of the Emperor does not mix with that of the pasha in the same cask). This is compared to an egg (ov). Another, from Samarina, is better known, "Albo easte si neava ama arde" (Snow is white, but burns); or, again, this figurative rendering of a burning light (Gazlu) (a youth wearing a flower on his head) "Un dzone ku lilitze n kap." The Farseriots have preserved a copious store of proverbs, such as "he who beats his wife strikes his own head; he who beats his mule maltreats his purse;" and the shepherds say that "Whoever has not tasted bitter things cannot know the taste of sugar." In the love songs the charms of the damsel are likened to familiar objects. Thus, the eyes are supposed to resemble saucers, the nose is compared to a ruler, the bosom to lemons, and the throat to that of a partridge; while the figure of the beloved is constantly praised for being tall and straight, as a cypress. The sonnets of bygone days, particularly with the Wallachs of Olympus, often express a yearning for the mountains; a longing to fly with a lover to the uplands through dense forests and shady groves, but always in search of a cool spring of pure water. "Sleep, sweetheart, sleep. No, I must rise, the wives are going to Church. No, no; it is only the old women. The sun is up. No; lay thy head on the cotton pillow, the moon is shining still"—is a quaint poem. A farewell song is also characteristic, in which the departing swain requests a last word:—"What shall I send thee from afar? Send me a comb, a mirror, and a stool of glass, whereon I can sit combing my hair of silken gold. Stay not too long away."

Some of the poems and ballads of the robbers, extolling their deeds of violence and bloodshed are in much repute; it is therefore worth mentioning that "brigandage" is not looked upon with disfavour by the people. On the contrary, a "Kapitan" (robber chief) is a man of some consequence, being more honoured and admired than a village priest. Indeed, instances of famous bands having successfully resisted the Pasha's authority in their hidden lairs, and how they drew the soldiers into an ambush, shooting them down from behind the rocks, are glorified in popular lyrics. Kiki's revenge on the Greeks for the murder of the two Kotsa, the Armunis, and the lament on the death of Nika the shepherd stabbed through the back on the eighth day of the Paste (Easter festival) "Dzuo moi di Paste mare," are specimens of songs of strife; the latter is known at Verria and in the neighbourhood. The Wallachs, including the bandits, observe the festivals of the Greek Church, but otherwise are rather lax in their religious observances. At Easter they visit the burial grounds, bearing flowers and the sweet-scented "basilica" shrub with which to adorn the graves. Rice, milk, and fruit are left with the dead, in anticipation, it would seem, of the day of wakening. The Armuns of Olympus and Thessaly as well as all other Wallachs are free from the superstition of the Slavs and Albanians that the dead leave the cemeteries at night time, in the form of vampires, in order to prey upon the living. But they possess a host of supernatural beings restricted to their race. The "Dzune" spirits of the waters hover around the springs, working evil to mankind, disguised in human shape and as animals. Money and other articles of value to propitiate the harmful sprites are thrown into the water, when, during the ensuing incantation, a spell is cast to exorcise their baneful power. The amiable fairy, on the other hand, the "Earth's Beauty" employs her manifold gifts for the good of humanity. Witches are plentiful in the legends of the hills, but their existence appears due to Greek inspiration, for the name σπίγλα is identical in the Latin dialect. Finally, the goddesses of Fate Tihi and Mira (τύχη and μοίρα) are common to Greeks, Wallachs, and Albanians alike.

One of the Olympic ballads is of special interest. The old song vividly portrays the death of an entire family and their servants from the plague—"The Ballad of the Plague":—

A fortunate woman, having eight sons and as many daughters-in-law, with an equal number of grandchildren, possessed only one girl-child of her own, but the household was completed by fifteen servants. The maiden's name was Dzanfike. On a holiday, four messengers came to the house to claim the hand of the damsel for a handsome young suitor of good family. But Kostantin, her youngest brother, objected. "I have promised to give her to some one who is far away in a great city beside the sea; a city of seven hills beyond Sofia, which has not its like in all the world." The wedding guests came to the village on horseback to bear away the destined bride to her distant lover. They rode away with Dzanfike, but left the plague behind them. The dreadful scourge destroyed the whole family to the last soul—mother, children, and labourers, all perished. The buildings were then smeared with tar.

Dzanfike pined for home, and wandering back to her village found it empty and deserted. Her brothers were there no more. The youngest, Kostantin, rose from his grave and sought to embrace her, but she wondered greatly for his face had such an earthy smell. She held him by the hand, asking for her mother, her elder brothers, and all their people. "Come not too near me, my brother, thou hast such an odour of the clay." "They all dwell in their graves," he answered, "but I have returned to life from out of the tomb and have waited longingly for thee." Brother and sister kissed each other and were never seen again.

Numerous dance and bridal songs are kept alive by the people—efforts of the lyric muse of shepherd bards. "Filling the water jug on the nuptial eve"; Trandabotan esti (thou art a flower) and the verses commencing, Albo so n te ved O sor (O may I see thee happy, sister), survive to-day as examples of popular poesy. Lastly, the stirring old robber song "Capitan Naki Kakarada" may be quoted as a record of the deeds of a Macedonian Robin Hood.

At Verria and Servia (Servidje) I have seen the youthful peasants of Olympus dancing in the moonlight on the sward. With hands resting on the shoulder they circled round in chains, then, locking their hands, youths and maids swung to and fro in rhythmic cadence, singing merrily their rustic ditties. In the waning light I watched them wending their way in procession to the Church by the lurid glare of flaming torches. Many of those in the joyous gathering were girls and children clothed in white and crowned with wreaths of flowers, bearing wild herbs to receive the priestly blessing, chanting in monotonous tones the festive hymn "Tayani Yanismata" as they moved slowly through the ill-paved street. Far above the great, grey form of the classic mountain, the domain of the ancient god loomed dark against the deep, blue sky in silent but majestic grandeur.

Throughout the Province of Macedonia, and in the borderland of Thessaly, Wallachs abound in villages and towns, but in the struggle of nationalities they seem to be losing their attributes, slowly merging their separate identity in the other peoples, and their folk-lore will remain, no doubt, only a memory of the past.

University Letter.

CAMBRIDGE.

On March the 11th the proposed reform of the Classical Tripos will be ratified or rejected. The vexed questions of the establishment of a Board of Agricultural Studies and for the re-organization of the Library touch closely the life of the University, but the proposals of the Classical Board affect the school on which, more than on any other, the fate of Cambridge as a place of liberal education must always rest.

The new proposals are the result of two-and-a-half years of continuous deliberation on the part of the Board. At present the Tripos is divided into two parts; the First Part is an examination which practically tests nothing beyond a knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages; the Second Part consists of a number of special sections dealing with History, Philosophy, Archæology, and so forth ; the First Part may be taken at the end of the Second Year, but is generally not taken till the end of the Third Year, and those who pass it then are qualified for a Degree. Now those who drew up this scheme hoped and expected that the majority of classical men, at any rate all those who showed any promise, would, as a matter of course, proceed to the Second Part after passing the First, and it was supposed that good men would always take the First Part in their Second Year. These expectations have proved illusory ; the very great majority of classical men take their Degree on Part I. and do not take Part II. or any other Tripos at all, and only a very small and continuously diminishing minority proceed to the Special Sections of Part II.

This result was felt to be as unsatisfactory as it was unexpected, and some three years ago the Classical Board, aware of the general discontent and sympathizing with it themselves, decided to ask all those engaged in teaching Classics whether they were in favour of change and, if so, what form they would wish the change to take. The answers to this appeal showed an overwhelming majority in favour of reform ; it was evidently the prevailing opinion that Part I. alone did not give a sufficiently wide education, and as the great majority of Classical men took no other Tripos, it followed that they went down with an inadequate intellectual equipment, having done little more than continue the work they had done at school, and having got no new ideas and broken no new ground so far as their reading for their Tripos was concerned. On the other hand it was found that the sections of Part II. had become too highly specialized for the average student who had not got a distinct natural inclination for the particular subject. Each section was well adapted for a man who wished to become an expert and was likely to devote his life to that study, but none were attractive to the ordinary intelligent man who had no special bias ; it was an examination for embryo Professors, not for average students who wish to get a tolerably wide liberal education before entering on their life's work outside the University. It was clear, then, that two changes must be made if our students were to get the full benefit which the study of Classics is capable of conferring ; it must no longer be possible to get a Degree merely on the linguistic work of Part I., while, on the other hand, the further examination, which a candidate would now have to take in order to get a Degree in Classics, must be altered in such a way as to attract the ordinary man as well as the specialist.

Towards the end of last Term, the Board brought forward a scheme designed to effect this double object ; their proposals were debated for three days in the Arts Schools and then referred back to the Board, who now bring them forward in a modified form to be voted on by the Senate. The changes they propose are—first, that Part I. must be taken at the end of the Second Year and that some other Tripos or Special Examination must be taken in order to qualify for a Degree ; secondly, that a new section, called the General Section, is to be added to the existing sections of Part II, which section it is hoped that the majority of Classical men will take.

To the first proposal there will probably be little or no opposition ; but with regard to the new section opinion is divided. The section is to consist of two short papers in Prose Composition, an Essay and five full papers, the subjects of which are as follows : a select philosophical work, a short period of Greek or Roman History to be studied with the original authorities, a paper on a wider period of Greek and Roman History, half of which shall consist of passages for translation and comment, and two papers on Classical Literature, Philosophy, and Art, so arranged that candidates need not attempt questions on more than two of those three subjects. It is to be noted that the select philosophical work is to be either Plato's Republic, or Aristotle's Ethics, or Aristotle's Politics, with special reference to certain books in each case, while for the special history paper it is understood that only those periods shall be set which have a direct educational value.

From this it will be seen that the backbone of the new section consists of a study, as far as possible at first hand, of what is best in Classical History and Philosophy, while it will also be necessary for every one to have some knowledge of Art or Literature, or both. In fact it is a thoroughly "humanistic" scheme, likely to touch the intellectual interests of the ordinary student on all sides, and as free from superficiality as it is from pedantry. The arguments raised against it are, for the most part, mutually destructive ; it is urged, on the one hand, that the section is so wide that no one can possibly take it ; on the other hand, that its adoption will mean the downfall of specialism since no one will then take any of the special sections.

FROM THE MAGAZINES.

The Contemporary has a good number, more wholly secular than usual, and not including, we observe, anything on "the Crisis in the Church." Mr. W. J. Stillman writes, with the advantage of great experience, on "The Peace of Europe." Of four questions threatening peace—the conflict between England and France in Africa, Alsace Lorraine, the struggle between Russia and Austria in the Balkans, and the temporal claims of the Pope—he finds the third the gravest, but the remotest, and the text of his exhortation is the Triple Alliance as the nucleus of the League of Peace for all Europe. Mr. H. W. Macrosty's article on "The Growth of Monopoly" will help to make the public realize, as it has hardly done yet, the main feature of our present economic condition ; and it concludes with this pregnant remark :—"With the weapon of State Control in hand, combination may be welcomed, and if control prove insufficient, State purchase or public administration remain behind." Another good article is Mr. A. Kinnear's on "The Trade in Great Men's Speeches." Since Mr. Gladstone's death the value to the press agencies of speeches by public men has gone down. Statesmen are divided into those who are worth a "verbatim report," "a full report," or a "summary," but we are afraid Mr. Kinnear exaggerates a little when he says that a "verbatim report" means "every word that falls from the lips." Even the Prime Minister, Lord Rosebery, Mr. Balfour, and Mr. Chamberlain now generally fall into the second class. Perhaps the most interesting thing in the article is a note appended to the end :—

Since the above article was written Sir William Harcourt has resigned the Liberal Leadership, and Mr. John Morley has joined him in retirement. This incident will double the value of Sir William's speeches, and it has already doubled the value of Mr. Morley's to the trade.

In Cornhill Mr. A. I. Shand has an interesting paper on "A Missionary of the Far West," though the word "Missionary" is a little misleading. His subject is Kit Carson, the most famous of the wild and lawless trappers who fought out the battle between the white man and the red in the first half of the century. Mr. C. J. Cornish, on "North Norfolk Fish and Fowl," is, of course, first rate. There is also a really amazing article by two ladies on "the sense of humour in men." They conclude that there is, indeed, humour which women as a class do not appreciate, but that this belongs to the more primitive form of humour. The most common forms in which the humour of men displays itself are, they think, "coarseness, profanity, and practical joking"—we learn, by the way, from another article in the magazine, that even in the Royal Navy "the puerile practice of practical joking has died a natural death"—and we are informed by these discerning students of social life that "every one knows that the mere word 'whiskey' is 'wont to set the table in a roar' ; the mention of brandy and soda will always bring down the house." The word "mother-in-law," we are told, produces the same result. These simple recipes for hilarity are, we confess, new to us. Mr. Michael MacDonagh has an amusing account of the penny-a-liner and his methods of obtaining copy. The following, perhaps, is the most original :—

Some years ago, before the labour question assumed its present importance, a band of Fleet-street "liners" created a bogus political agitation. They worked in the most systematic and ingenious fashion. Assembling in some favourite hostelry in the courts off the great newspaper thoroughfare, and giving themselves a high-sounding name as a political association—such as the “Labour League,” the “Republican Association,” or the “Tory Working Men’s Society”—they made stirring speeches and passed significant resolutions on the burning political topics of the day. Reports of the meetings were sent to the morning papers, which, while the game was new, were invariably inserted, and, what is more, leader writers saw in them “the drift of public opinion.” Copies of the resolutions were also forwarded to leading members of the Government and Opposition. Such of the acknowledgments of the resolutions as were not purely formal were also sent round to all the newspapers. Finally, any autograph replies received were disposed of to some dealer in autographs. Thus there was a triple profit on the transaction—first, the report of the meeting; next, the politicians’ replies (both of which were paid for by the newspapers that published them at the rate of a penny or three-halfpence a line); and, lastly, the sale of the autographs.

But we must remind Mr. MacDonagh that an Editor who knew the “forms of address” for the different orders of Clergy would not insert a paragraph stating that a vacant bishopric “will be conferred upon the Very Rev. Canon —.”

Macmillan is not, this month, of overwhelming interest; but if we were giving a prize for the best article we should certainly award it to Colonel Trevor for his paper on “Sir Salar Jung’s visit to Europe.” It contains several good stories; there is the true expansion-of-England touch in the account of a bit of dialogue that passed between the Hyderabad statesman and a certain Major of a Highland regiment:—

He delighted in the Major’s huge form and broad Scotch (which I cannot pretend to reproduce), still more when after breakfast that worthy took an opportunity of addressing the following sentence to his host:—“I’m told, Sir Salar [his pronunciation of this word made it rhyme to valour], you stood by us in the Mutiny. You’re a fine fellow and I honour you for it. But by G—, if you hadn’t, the — [mentioning the name of his regiment] would have been into you.”

There are good points, too, in the account of the attitude of European hotel-keepers towards the eccentricities of Sir Salar Jung’s retainers:—

A hotel-keeper at Naples, pointing to discoloured walls and holes burnt in bedroom carpets by braziers used for cooking, threw up his hands as he exclaimed:—“I shall have to re-paper and re-carpet these rooms; no one can be put into them for some days.” Another at Turin, who had witnessed an irruption of Mahomedan servants into his kitchen and did not grasp their design in wishing to see slaughtered, in the manner prescribed by their religion, the chickens to be cooked for their masters, bade me farewell in these words:—“Delighted to see you on your next visit, Captain, but come alone, come alone. Never again, never again,” he repeated, as I expressed my regret and tried to explain the object of Indians being educated by travel in Europe, winding up with a warm shake of the hand and my usual formula, “You must put it down in the bill.”

Military affairs continue to fill most of the pages of the Century. There are articles on “The Winslow at Cardenas,” on “Cable Cutting at Cienfuegos,” and on “The Capture of Manila,” with a further instalment of Mr. Hobson’s narrative of “The Sinking of the Merrimac.” Some extracts are also given from General Sherman’s diary of his tour in Europe. For the most part it is an ordinary diary of a moderately intelligent man; but an interesting personal note is struck in the account of the General’s meeting with that other great soldier, Prince Frederick Charles, of Prussia. The place was the Russian Embassy at Constantinople. We read:—

The dinner was formal and without interest, and afterwards we all passed down to the sitting-room to smoke. There, a grand Turkish pipe was served to the Prince, but to nobody else, and though I first thought it was accidental I soon saw that it was etiquette, and that even I must look on a Prince as hedged around by some divine rights and privileges. Fred Grant, perceiving this personal slight to me, most courteously came and offered me cigars and cigarettes. I took one of the latter, lighted it, and smoked it in unison with the Prince general. As a general, his fame is established; as a Prince, he is not the subject of criticism; as a gentleman, he will sink very low, and thus is one of the delusions of my life vanished. I am told that Prussians are elevated beyond limit by their brilliant successes over the French—a great pity, but one that in due time will bring down on them the judgment of the world, if not disasters such as now the French groan under.

But the hour of the Nemesis which General Sherman looked for has not yet struck.

Among religious magazines none contains more to interest the lay reader—the word is not used in its technical sense—than does Good Words. This month, we have only space to mention, out of a host of good things, Mr. Leonard W. Lillingston’s account of the making of Dr. Murray’s great English Dictionary. Fact after fact is cited to show what labour this great work has involved. At any given moment, there are about six tons of quotations waiting to be sorted and classified. “It would take you thirty years to look through them at the rate of one a minute.” The task was started with “thirteen hundred readers and thirty sub-editors.” Among the names of early readers were included those of Rossetti, Hazlitt, Perowne, Lubbock, Littledale, Lightfoot, Lushington, Craik, Page-Hopps, and Dowden. “The slips which line the Scriptorium came from all parts of the world; from France and from Florida, from Algeria and Amsterdam, from Upper Egypt, Stockholm, Rome, Florence, and Japan.” All sorts of notabilities have been written to for explanations of words that they have used—Tennyson, George Eliot, J. R. Lowell, Andrew Lang, Stevenson, and others. The application to Stevenson introduces the following story:—

Stevenson was applied to as to the word “brean” which had turned up in one of his breathless tales. To which Mr. Stevenson replied that he was sorry to say that he had not read the proofs of the book, but “brean” was plainly a misprint for “ocean!” And he goes on to show, by an example, how his handwriting made this possible.

FICTION.

A Son of Empire. By Morley Roberts. 8×5½ in. 338 pp. London, 1899. Hutchinson. 6/-

It looks to us as though “A Son of Empire” must be taken to mark a great turning point in the career of Mr. Morley Roberts. Hitherto this writer has been a little apt to spend his time in dissecting the souls and analysing the motives of the sort of people that one does not care to know. “Maurice Quain” was his high-water mark in this direction. It was admirably done. Yet one’s impression of Maurice Quain was always that of a person who wanted a good wash and brush up before his storm-tost soul could be of general interest. But let him rest in peace. Mr. Morley Roberts has changed his plans and chosen other heroes. He has gone, so to say, into the British Empire business; and, if we are not mistaken, he is going to be one of the heads of this department of literary endeavour. To a certain extent his story may be read as a roman à clef, though all the characters do not belong to the same period of modern history. The plot is obviously suggested by certain well-known facts in the career of Sir Richard and Lady Burton. In the manner in which the hero makes the heroine’s acquaintance the lines of that well-known romance in real life are closely followed. When, however, we come to the fighting, we are brought right up to date. The story is, with only slight deviations, the story of the dash for Chitral. The Colonel Briggs, who is in command, is no other than Colonel Kelly; and if Sir Eustace Camborne and Lord Graham—the two Commanders-in-Chief who flit across the stage—are not meant for portraits of Lords Roberts and Wolseley, then we do not know portraits when we see them.

Two things—two very important things—Mr. Morley Roberts has done excellently in this book. In the first place his fighting is the real, true thing. His picture of the skirmishes in the hills may stand beside Napier’s picture of the “unconquerable British infantry” saving Beresford from a Court-martial at Albuera. His little Goorkhas, with their child-like joy of battle, and their love for their "Leften" Gwynne, are worthy comrades of Learoyd, Ortheris, and Mulvaney. And then there is the heroine—Madge Gretton. She is the freshest and most delightful girl that we have lately met in English fiction. She does the most charmingly daring things. Among other things she steals the Adjutant-General's cipher, in order to send to India a telegram which shall get her lover the appointment he desires; and when her lover is accused of having procured the despatch of the telegram, and is in danger of disgrace, she drives down to the War Office and confesses to the Commander-in-Chief. For that interview alone the book would have been worth reading. But there really is no page in it that is not worth reading. It marks an immense advance in Mr. Morley Roberts' work. The critics have always admitted the high merits of his fiction; and this time we make no doubt that the clients of the circulating libraries will adopt the critics' view.

IN MOLLIE'S PRINCE, by Rosa Nouchette Carey (Hutchinson, 6s.), "Mollie" is a specimen of the girl of the past before the high schools had caught her, very engaging, and very innocent, with the "cloistered and unpractised virtue" of nine years old up to the day of her marriage. She has a sister and a friend who are reputed to be "clever." The former talks about "the brere rabbit"; the latter says "manners makye man," perpetrates a horrible parody on "O woman! in our hours of ease," and ends by developing into the prince and a "lord" in disguise. The couple are well matched, and must have been profoundly happy. The book is thoroughly wholesome, but so is oatmeal porridge, even without sugar or salt.

BRUCE REYNELL, M.A., by J. Duncan Craig (Stock, 6s.), gives us a lively picture of the Ireland of a dozen years ago, when Captain Moonlight was having fine sport among the landlords. The adventures of the young locum tenens, Bruce Reynell, as "an Oxford man in Ireland," are well told, and Miss Kildinning makes a most spirited heroine. The one puzzling thing in the story is Shaun Ruadh's long immunity from justice. He was a picturesque ruffian, it is true, and we can understand the author's reluctance to kill him; but his whereabouts were known, and there was enough against him to hang a dozen men. When his death does come at last, towards the end, the chapter that describes it is, perhaps, the best in a distinctly readable book.

THE ROMANCE OF A RITUALIST, by Vincent Brown (John Lane, 6s.), has one character who impresses herself upon the reader, and that is the Ritualist's mother, one of the most charming of elderly women in recent fiction. For the Ritualist himself we have little sympathy. A good course of bicycling would have cured him of the inconvenient habits that keep most of the other characters either looking for him or preventing him from committing suicide. One whole chapter is devoted to an account of how he failed to shoot himself. It is something of a pitfall to a novelist, this working up of a tragedy which the reader knows will be averted on the smallest provocation. "Would they find him—when it was all over?" and so on, brings the tragic and the ridiculous too near together, and is much better avoided.

The scene of POTSHERDS, by Mabel C. Birchenough (Cassell, 6s.), is laid in the Potteries, and the plot might be described as tragic, or as melodramatic, according to the point of view. It includes murder and unjust accusation of murder, and a compromising letter in the possession of a lunatic. There is also something about the art students of the Quartier Latin—a class concerning whose depravity the author evidently entertains no doubt. The style of the book is heavy and cumbersome, but the binding is better than that of the average of six-shilling novels.

IN A GIRL OF THE KLONDIKE (Scott, 3s. 6d.) Miss Victoria Cross, who has hitherto devoted herself to portraying the agonies of morbid souls, seems to have fallen under the influence of Mr. Bret Harte. Her heroine is the beautiful daughter of a Polish saloon keeper in Dawson City. The young woman drinks and gambles, but has a soul above her vices. A good young man, educated as a missionary, who has fallen a victim to the gold fever, lays himself out to reclaim her from them, and, for a time, success crowns his efforts. The monotony of matrimony, however, is more than she can bear. She returns to the haunts of vice, and the work of rescue has to be begun again de novo. Some "shooting on sight" in a gambling hell brings the narrative to a tragic climax. In the matter of punctuation Miss Cross is erratic.

ONE WAY OF LOVE, by Dollie Radford (Unwin, 3s. 6d.), is a very old way. Sacha was a lonely girl, living, in a place suggestive of romance, with an uncongenial aunt and a nonentity of an uncle. When a man of the world—the man of the world of fiction—comes to amuse himself with mild lovemaking, the end is to be foreseen. He goes away and gets engaged to somebody else, and she is left to her lost illusions. The presumption is that another lover, who will not ride away, is the final solution to Sacha's woes. But the authoress prefers not to commit herself.

AN ENEMY TO THE KING, by R. N. Stephens (Methuen, 6s.), opens well, with the young hero's departure for the Paris of 1578, and his ardent hopes of some "crowded hours of glorious life," to be spent in an atmosphere of love-making and sword practice. His dreamed-of lady-love is to be all that young romance can picture in the way of beauty and truth. We feel for him when his first choice falls upon the unworthy tool of Catherine de Medici, who makes a catspaw of him in her turn. There is plenty of hard riding and hard fighting for him before he finds his ideal in Mademoiselle de Narion, and escapes from the clutches of the Guise party. We followed the story with sustained interest and wished it longer. Mr. Stephens has a particularly light and readable style, and a graphic turn of expression which does justice to his "big situations."

THE WARSTOCK, by Wirt Gerrare (Greener, 6s.), declares in a very long, ponderous and pessimistic preface that it "does not pretend to be literature, that it makes no appeal to the emotions, and is not intended simply to amuse." It further says that "to-day we possess no virtue that was unknown to our forefathers; not a vice they practised but disgraces our boasted civilization. The paid gladiators of ancient Rome have their counterpart in the salaried football-players of modern England." In the text we read of a young man who goes to a "fashionable throng." It depressed him.

He noticed that, although the men were of every size and age, the women, for the most part, were apparently young. All wore red-gold wigs of precisely the same pattern; of one cut, too, their dresses, aping each other even in the variety of aniline dye with which they were stained; all adopting the same pose; one and all marked to the same extent by the artificial blush on each cheek; of one sort their voices and their words.

"The Warstock" is very earnest indeed. Its great point is that the future belongs to the inventor, and that the inventor has a hard time of it now when he becomes a patentee. On this last subject Mr. Wirt Gerrare touches with much concentrated bitterness. The moral, however, is not very clear, though it is vaguely impressive. For the romance part of his book there is not much to be said, and it might have been better if he had relieved his feelings in a preface, and then burnt it.

The plot of THECLA'S VOW (Smith, Elder, 6s.) is curiously simple. A lady who has been reproached by her husband for levity in conversation takes a vow of silence, and holds to it till death. The bulk of the book is taken up with a description of the manner in which she resisted the various temptations to go back from her word. The theme is one, most would imagine, that might lend itself to a short comedy; few indeed would dare to make it the basis of a serious novel. Yet the beautiful Thecla—one of the most beautiful and accomplished women of her race and time—contrives to enlist our sympathies in spite of the inevitable absurdity of her self-imposed penance.

Half Austrian by birth and half Italian, she throws in her lot with the latter race in their struggle for freedom, and fights for the cause in the arena of literature by anonymous contributions to the magazines. It must be confessed that the history of her life flags from time to time; the central motive is too thin to bear a six-shilling novel on its shoulders; but the book brightens towards the end, with the outbreak of the revolution. The English of the book is that of a foreigner, and its modern colloquialisms seem strangely out of place. But Mr. Gallenga has managed even with this unpromising material to construct a fairly readable story.

LIFE'S PEEP-SHOW (Unwin, 6s.), by H. Rutherford Russell, has a sufficiently comprehensive title. It contains a number of more or less realistic sketches, such as might be torn from an artist's notebook. There are indications, however, that they are not studies actually made on the spot. Some of them, no doubt, have been seen and remembered, but in these pages they lack vividness. In the sketch entitled "Sarah," for instance, the crooked little sempstress reminds us more of the pages of Dickens than of real life, and we miss the graphic touches which irresistibly suggest a portrait. In "Mark Latimer" the temptation of the enthusiastic young temperance lecturer who has a wife in an inebriate home leaves the reader unsympathetic. Still, Mr. Russell writes fluently and well; and his book has a good moral tone and is likely to find admirers.

THE BLACK CURTAIN (Duckworth, 6s.), by Flora Haines Longhead, is an American story, printed from the American plates. The spelling is annoying, but the book itself is not unattractive. The earlier chapters are the best part of it. A singer who has lost her voice and a painter who has lost, or almost lost, his sight settle on the same plot of ground among the mountains of California, and, beginning by disputing about their rights, end by losing their hearts to one another. Before this happens, the situation is complicated by the fact that the lady's paper house is blown into a tree, and, as it cannot be dislodged, she is obliged to live in the air. There is a good deal of quiet humour in the dialogue, but all the scenes are not equally satisfactory. This appears to be Miss Longhead's first attempt. If so, there is enough good work in it to lead us to expect from her something better in the future.

SHORT STORIES.

THE AULD MEETIN' HOOSE GREEN, by Archibald M'Ilroy (M'Caw, Belfast), is a slightly connected series of Ulster-Scotch stories, of a kind with which Mr. Barrie has made us familiar in another but similar land. In fact, if we were not told that the scene is Ulster, we might have imagined ourselves not very far from Thrums. Mr. M'Ilroy touches the pathos and humour of humble lives with a delicate hand, and has produced a charming book.

The art of writing short, connected sketches seems to be more commonly practised in America than in this country, although of late years this has become a favourite method among writers north of the Tweed. Dialect is eminently useful in this sort of writing; it gives an air of simplicity, and of reality, to work that might otherwise be considered too slight for publication. In DUMB FOXGLOVE (Harper, 6s.), Miss Annie Trumbull Slosson has produced a slight but interesting series of sketches from rustic life in New England. She has tenderness and humanity, and the seven little tales that go to make up her volume are all worth reading. "Apple Jonathan" is perhaps the best of the collection.

THE MAZE OF LIFE (Bellairs and Co., 3s. 6d.), by George Newcomen, is presumably a first venture. There are two stories in the volume, one concerned with the downward course of Charlie Brownrigg, and his subsequent reclamation by his wife; the other with the history of a girl, who, somewhat unnecessarily, feels impelled to marry a man for whom she has no love, simply because her guardian, a married man, has made love to her. There is an air of provincialism about both tales, but, more serious defect than this, the characters do not live. Yet "The Maze of Life" is at least grammatical, and appears to have been written with some care.

Mr. W. Braunston Jones has brought together a couple of stories, which have nothing much in common beyond a certain directness in the telling, under the name of A BRACE OF YARNS (Digby, Long, 6s.). His manner of writing is a trifle abrupt, but he shows a certain amount of skill in the construction of his stories. Mr. Jones knows something about life at sea; and although in "Jack's Luck" he rides gaily over a few palpable impossibilities, he contrives (which is after all the main thing) to hold the reader's interest to the end. His book will serve to amuse any one who takes it up for an hour or so.

THE SHADOW OF LIFE, by Marten Strong (Pearson, Limited, 2s. 6d.), has something of the shilling shocker about it, but a sensation-loving railway traveller might do worse than buy the book, which is excellently printed.

Mrs. Cashel Hoey's translation of Jules Verne's AN ANTARCTIC MYSTERY (Sampson Low, 6s.) is a good one, and the illustrations and general "get-up" of the book are very attractive. There is a great fascination in the idea of the vast magnet that sucked ships and men into its embrace by attracting all the metal about them.

We are glad to welcome a cheap edition of RUNIC ROCKS, by Wilhelm Jensen, translated by Marianne Suckling (Elliot Stock). Jensen has so much force, charm, and originality that he ought to be better known to the English public than he is.

Obituary.

ARCHIBALD LAMPMAN.

A poet of singular charm, who, if health had permitted, would have added power to beauty, and fame, it is to be hoped, to both, has just fallen prematurely out of the ranks of Canadian literature in the person of Archibald Lampman. The son of a Church of England clergyman, but descended from German ancestry on both sides, Mr. Lampman was born at Morpeth, Ontario, in 1861, and had thus not yet completed his thirty-eighth year. He was educated at Trinity College School, Port Hope, and at Trinity University, Toronto, where he graduated with honours. After a short career in the teaching profession he entered the Canadian Civil Service, and in 1887 began to contribute verse to the American magazines. In 1888 he published his first volume of poems, under the title of "Among the Millet," his second, and, unhappily, his last, the "Lyrics on Earth," following it after the long interval of eight years. This slowness and scantiness of production was due to the cause which brought about Mr. Lampman's untimely death, a fatal weakness of constitution which he himself recognized as condemning him to an early grave. Small, however, in amount as is the work which he has left behind him, it was, much of it, of a fine poetic quality, and has been generally recognized as such by competent critics in both hemispheres. Mr. Howells pronounced him as worthy to rank with the strongest of American singers, and some of the foremost critical journals in this country expressed their full concurrence in that judgment. In everything that he wrote there was not only a note of individuality, but a flavour of his native soil; and in one short poem of his first volume, entitled simply "Heat," he has succeeded in producing, alike in colour, atmosphere, and sentiment, the most perfect expression of Canadian landscape that has ever been achieved in poetry or prose. The appreciation, however, which his genius received in other parts of the English-speaking world was unfortunately denied, or partially denied him, in his own land. Canadian poets, of merit indeed, but of gifts inferior to his, were persistently ranked above him; and though time, no doubt, would have reversed the positions, the task of redress was too great for Lampman's strength and too long for his day.

The archivist of the Opera in Paris, M. CHARLES NULTER (Charles Louis Etienne Truinet), who has just died at the age of 71, was one of the most prolific librettists and vaudevillistes of the last forty years in France. He was associated with Offenbach and Sardon, and one of the earliest adapters of Wagner. His interest for us, however, is his admirable work in organization of the library of the Opera. He collected there an immense number of documents affecting the history of the stage, and he had published "L'Histoire du Nouvel Opéra" and "Les Origines de l'Opéra Français."

THE CONSOLATIONS OF TRUTH.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I think that I cannot have written in vain on "the Consolation of Truth" when Prof. Case has deemed my letter worthy of a careful reply. But it appears to me that his facts and reasoning do not in the least invalidate what I have said myself. I admitted in my former letter (what, of course, it would be absurd to deny) that there were disagreeable truths in the world, but I maintained that the mind was strengthened by facing them; and, though Prof. Case does not expressly deny this latter proposition (which I fancy he would admit in most cases), he holds that there are cases in which truth brings no satisfaction, and where, on the contrary, "there is consolation in falsehood and fiction." I do not know that exactly. Does any one really prefer to live in a fool's paradise rather than know a disagreeable fact? Others may, perhaps, wish to keep him there, but I should say that he himself, if he have the faintest suspicion of the truth, will be very uncomfortable until he knows it absolutely; and, unpleasant as that truth may be, his mind will then be comparatively at rest. "Why does a doctor," your correspondent asks, "falsely give hope when there is no hope?" It is a nice question in casuistry how far a doctor is justified in doing so, and I hope I shall not be one of the patients so deluded. But a stronger instance follows:—"What satisfaction is there in knowing the worst when you are told the truth that you have cancer in the stomach and expect to die a disgusting death?" One cannot answer such questions glibly; for none of us, I suppose, knows what strength he himself shall find in the day of trial, and it would be very wrong to trust to one's own. But I know, what is very much more to the point, that even if consideration for the infirmity of human nature bids us in many cases endeavour to veil the truth from dear friends, there have been martyrs in past times who, animated by the love of truth, and consoled by truth as none of us are consoled in this very comfortable age, have faced both death and torture in many a cruel form. And I know, moreover, that the world, as it is now, has been greatly benefited by their sufferings.

And this leads me to what I think the weak point in Prof. Case's letter. All his argument turns on the thesis laid down by himself:—"Man has two ways of knowing reality, sense and reasoning from sense; and, in consequence, has the power of arriving at true judgments." Of course it is implied that these are the only ways of getting at truth, and that there is no spiritual sense engaged in the process at all. The report of the bodily senses and the inferences of the human mind thereupon are all that we have got to go by. I doubt if science itself would have made much progress in the world if it had been strictly confined to those two processes. I believe a flash of inspiration has often revealed to the scientific inquirer some great truth, and all that experiment and inference have done has been merely to bring it fully to the test.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

Pinner, Feb. 25, 1899. JAMES GAIRDNER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—If it is not too much for you, editorially, to admit letters from two brothers at once into your columns on such a subject as "The Consolation of Truth," I should like to be allowed from the physician's point of view to challenge the proposition affirmed, or at least implied, in Professor Case's illustration of his general argument—"Why does a doctor falsely give hope where there is no hope?" The mere statement of this as an argument, I think, shows the weakness of the position it is intended to cover. A doctor is indeed bound, in the interests of his art as well as of his patient, to keep himself and others hopeful as long as he reasonably can; but I have yet to learn, after more years of sad experience than have fallen to most men, that he is either bound, or morally permitted, to give hope falsely, where he either believes absolutely or knows positively that there is none. On the contrary, there is no single stumbling-block that stands more in the way of the true physician anxious to be, in the course of his duty, both true and helpful than the tacit assumption or too common popular belief that his opinion is not a real or genuine one, or that it has to be largely discounted on the ground alluded to, or that on such ground he is professionally incapacitated, in most cases, from telling the truth. As matter of severe and exact experience in many cases, I affirm absolutely that there is not, and cannot be, any such obligation to falsehood; and that many, or perhaps most, patients who are dangerously ill are far more perturbed and dissatisfied by the current opinion that it is impossible to get the truth out of a doctor than they are, or would be, by his telling them the exact state of the facts; of which, moreover, they are often, or usually, inwardly conscious long before expression is given to it by any one.

With this personal experience before me, you must allow me to be simply amazed at the cool assumption that it can ever be right, much less (as Professor Case implies) an imperative duty, for a physician in urgent circumstances "to satisfy his patient or his patient's relatives" by lying. And the concrete illustration given is even worse. "What satisfaction is there in knowing the worst when you are told the truth that you have cancer in the stomach, &c.? None; absolutely none." I am not afraid, as a physician, to face even this strong instance, and to say that it lies within my experience that a sick man, tortured and saddened by sufferings which he feels to be mortal, but has not been permitted to speak or hear about as he knows them to be, may derive an unspeakable satisfaction from knowing the worst, or the exact truth even in such a terrible case. I do not wish to take up your space with casuistry upon this difficult subject, which I admit has its difficulties in detail, if not in principle; but I wish most emphatically to say that, in my opinion as a physician, the ethics of the professor of moral philosophy need to be revised, and that very thoroughly, when applied to the medical profession.

A single word as to the opinions of the late Professor Clifford, referred to by my brother. These (as I remember them now many years back) were to the effect that it was immoral (scientifically, of course) to believe what you cannot prove. My reply to this at the time was that in matters of life and death the physician or the surgeon was often obliged to act upon convictions which, however sincere or decided, could not be proved in Professor Clifford's sense of the word. In medicine, as in theology, we are often compelled by an inward necessity to "walk by faith, and not by sight." We walk tentatively, it is true, and we try, at least, to learn by experience. We differ from the theologian in this, that we are not prone to dogmatise; and when we have done so in the past we have as often as not been terribly in the wrong. But it is astonishing how very dogmatic even a pronounced agnostic can be, when he tries!

I am, &c.,

THE MORELLI DA VINCI.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The question raised in a recent number of Literature on the above question, in the course of a criticism of M. Müntz's books is the most difficult one in connexion with the study of art. Æsthetic questions are largely abstract and always leave a broad margin to individuality. De gustibus nil disputandum est is only true in so far as that there is no standard outside the variations of taste to which the dispute can be referred, and practically it is true that every one has the right to maintain his own ideal of likings and dislikings, and to prefer a picture of Ruysdael to one of Turner, or vice versa, without being met by a snub.

In that other province of art study which is becoming so popular, and in which the Germans are taking the lead—the purely archaeological—we can touch ground of positive authority and cumulative weight, for the research is indefinite and hangs on documentary evidence. But in the matter of determining the authorship of a picture, especially of one of the old masters, we enter into a question of pure expertise, in which good taste and erudition have next to nothing to say, and in which the cumulative judgment of critics has no value whatever, for the point is not to be determined by a majority, but, on the contrary, by the one highest and best trained opinion. It is a purely technical question, as to which the highest authority will always be that of an artist, other things being equal. I have passed many years in the affectionate study of the pictures of the old Italian masters; I can make a fair copy of one of them; I have been trained in the study of art in its various branches by long intercourse with many artist friends, and I possess a tolerable general judgment on Italian art, but I should repudiate summarily any assumption of authority to such judgment in a difficult case of authorship, though I should not hesitate to pronounce on the general question of authority. A man who has copied much learns certain subtle characteristics of execution which escape a non-painter, and in many cases, as in the schools, these are the only distinctive indications between the master and his pupil. There are other traits, such as mannerisms in features, ear, or eye, the form of hand or foot, &c., which are generally common to the master and his most faithful pupils, with peculiar pigmentary qualities, dependent on process and pigment.

Morelli made the discovery of what had been, for years untold, the common knowledge of the copyists and the real experts, and established what his followers and himself call the "science" of that form of art criticism; but, like other acquisitions of the kind, it was only good for the man who has learned to use it intelligently, which he never did. The consequence was identifications of old masters which are the derision of every competent expert. His ludicrous determination of an unknown second-rate portrait in the Borghese gallery as a new Giorgione ought to have been the wreck of his reputation, but neither it nor several similar blunders seem to have undeceived his followers. It is useless to discuss colours with the blind—equally so to talk of purely technical characters with men who cannot tell whether the colour employed in a certain picture is one that was known in the day of the reputed painter or not, because they cannot recognize the pigment. The forgers of old pictures know all the superficial marks of their originals, and the incompetent expert falls a victim to his incomplete knowledge—as Morelli constantly did, and as his school always does—because a critic who had the knowledge requisite to form an independent judgment would know that Morelli was no guide.

Apart from the painters (copyists) who are not professional experts, and who do not know how to put their opinions in literary form, but whose general and concrete judgments are worth those of all the purely literary critics, I have never found but two men whose opinions were of supreme authority in Italian art, the late Signor Cavalcaselle and Mr. Charles Fairfax Murray, our English expert. And in the circle of German cognoscenti Dr. Bode has the highest authority, and Müntz in France, but amongst them all Murray is facile princeps. Cavalcaselle, who was, like Murray, a clever painter and copyist as well as a critic and a man of consummate finesse and patient research, said to me one day when discussing the Tobit picture in the Academy at Florence long attributed to Botticelli, the determination of the authorship of which was one of his triumphs, "Murray is the master of us all." The mastery acquired by such workers is not possible to the dilettante or the purely literary student—as well expect the expertise in hand writing from a man who never learned to write.

I have known some very curious cases of imitations passing in time for originals, but this never would, with a careful expert. More than forty years ago the late J. B. Pyne, a most competent imitator of all the modern landscapists, told me of a picture of his, which, in despite of his assertions, has gone into the trade as a Ruysdael. He painted it as an exercise, and sold it as an imitation, but several years later was invited by a Bond-street dealer with whom he dealt "to come to his shop and see a Ruysdael he had just bought." He recognized it as his own imitation, and assured the dealer that it was such. Being questioned, he scraped off a bit of paint in the foreground under which he had, ad hoc, hidden his signature. In spite of this the picture was sold for a Ruysdael. Yours truly,

W. J. STILLMAN.

THE CLASSICS OF MOUNTAINEERING.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Climbers will be grateful for your suggestion that certain of what may be called the classics of mountaineering should be reprinted. Many of us would like to have on our shelves such books as Sir Alfred Wills' "Wanderings," for which we have now to go to the libraries. Messrs. Longmans have set an example recently by reprinting Leslie Stephen's "Playground of Europe," and Tyndall's "Glaciers of the Alps." Will other publishers please follow suit? The appreciation now shown for good mountaineering literature should make the speculation a paying one.

"THE MAN IN THE MOONE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The note in your issue of February 18 on Bishop Godwin's "Man in the Moone" leads me to transcribe the title of a similar book in my library:—

"The discovery of a new world, or a discourse tending to prove that 'tis probable there may be another habitable world in the Moone. With a discourse concerning the possibility of a passage thither. The third impression. Corrected and enlarged. London: Printed by John Norton for John Maynard, and are to be sold at The George in Fleet-street, neere St. Dunstan's Church. 1640."

I am yours faithfully,

WILLIAM HARBUTT DAWSON.

THE THREE-DECKED PULPIT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—This term, as applied to the pulpit, reading-desk, and clerk's desk, was a very common one in my young days, and it sounds strange to hear your correspondent speak of having lit upon it "once or twice in recently published writings."

"In the midst of the church stands . . . the offensive structure of pulpit, reading-desk, and clerk's desk; in fact, a regular old three-decker in full sail westward."

The Christian Remembrancer, July, 1852, p. 92.

Quoted by the late E. C. Brewer.

"A London Rustic" will find an illustration of one in Hogarth's print, entitled, "Credulity, Superstition, and Fanaticism," and also in "The Sleeping Congregation."

Most of the three-deckers disappeared when our old churches were "restored" by the substitution of very new and highly varnished pitch pine in the place of the old black carved oak, which latter was then generally applied to the purpose of medievalizing any modern villas in the neighbourhood.

Yours faithfully,

F. L. MAWDESLEY.

Authors and Publishers.

Sir William Martin Conway, who is a good man of business as well as a good man of letters, has been re-elected chairman of the Society of Authors. Mr. Gilbert Parker has joined the committee of the Society.

At the annual meeting of the Society, which was held last Tuesday, a point of some interest and importance was raised. A member complained of the methods of those reviewers who tell the whole story of a book when criticizing it, and suggested that "it was a matter for some protest." The question is to be discussed at the meeting of the Committee of Management on Monday. Whether books—and particularly novels—gain or lose by "abridgment" in a newspaper is a question on which authors and publishers are divided. Some houses carefully refrain from sending books to the papers which publish "book of the week" reviews. Others go so far as to write to editors asking that such a book may be treated as the book of the week, and summarized.

We understand that the latest proposals of the Publishers' Association on the vexed discount question are on the following lines:—

1. New books to be issued as far as possible at net prices, and existing books to be converted into net books by taking off one sixth of the present price; the author's royalty remaining unaltered.

2. The trade terms now given to be offered to those booksellers only who agree to sell the books at full price. The charge for net books, to other booksellers, to be the full published price.

3. An agreement, embodying these proposals, to be offered to the booksellers for their signature.

4. Booksellers refusing to accept the agreement to be treated alike by all the assenting publishers.

5. These rules not to apply to remainders or dead stock.

6. The onus probandi, in cases of underselling by blackleg booksellers, to rest upon the Booksellers' Associations.

It will surprise us if the proposals which we have thus summarized pleased the booksellers; and we certainly fail to see how authors are to derive any advantage from them.

We are glad to see that a life of the late Sir George Grey is announced by Messrs. Chatto and Windus. It describes itself, in the title, "The Romance of a Pro-Consul: being the Personal Life and Memoirs of the Right Hon. Sir George Grey, K.C.B." The author is Mr. James Milne who was on intimate terms of friendship with Sir George Grey from the time the latter returned to England in 1894, and whom he made the depository of a series of reminiscences.

"The Life and Letters of Sir John Everett Millais," which his son, Mr. J. G. Millais, is preparing for publication by Messrs. Methuen, will consist of two volumes of biography. It will be illustrated with examples of Millais' work, and with many portraits of himself and of his friends, amounting to a total of some 300 pictures, many of which have not been reproduced before. Messrs. Methuen have also a work in the press entitled "The Heart of Asia," by Professor Ross and Mr. F. H. Erskine, in which an historical and descriptive account is given of Russian Central Africa.

Mr. H. V. Esmond, whose work for the stage shows much promise, is engaged upon a four act light drawing-room comedy, which will probably be finished about Easter. Its destination in this country is at present unknown, but Mr. Edward Sothorn will, in all probability, play the leading part in America.

Next Monday the first volume of Sir W. W. Hunter's "History of British India" will be published by Messrs. Longmans. This will carry the story of India down to the year 1623.

Mr. Hugh Clifford, the author of "In Court and Kampong," and (with Sir Frank Swettenham) of the "Dictionary of the Malay Language," has prepared a new volume of short stories and sketches treating of native and European life in the Malay Peninsula. He is also engaged upon a novel, the title of which will probably be "Domination." The scene is laid partly in England and partly in the Malay Peninsula.

Messrs. Longmans announce an account of the Episcopate of the late Bishop Charles Wordsworth of St. Andrews by his nephew the Bishop of Salisbury. The same firm have nearly ready a new edition of "Myth, Ritual, and Religion"—originally published in 1887—which the author, Mr. Andrew Lang, has been revising in order to bring it into line with the ideas expressed in the second part of his "Making of Religion."

Miss Agnes Repplier has recently completed her history of Philadelphia, and is now collecting data for a book on cats.

Since Mr. Le Gallienne returned from America he has written a novel for Mr. Arrowsmith, which will be published this month. The title will be "Young Lives." Mr. Le Gallienne has also completed a story for Mr. Lane called "The Worshipper of the Image," in which the tragedy of the modern artistic temperament is disguised as a fairy story.

Mr. Clement Shorter will contribute an article to the Contemporary Review for April on "Illustrated Journalism: Its past and its future."

Messrs. Sands announce the first volume of "Modern European Tactics," translated from the German of Captain Balck by Mr. L. R. M. Maxwell. This volume deals with the employment of infantry.

Messrs. Hutchinson announce "A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan," by Mrs. Hugh Fraser, who resided at the British Legation in Tokyo for some years with her husband. The same firm are publishing "An Introduction to Stellar Astronomy," by Prof. W. H. S. Monck, with illustrations.

The next volume in the series of Oxford Church Text Books will be on "Early Christian Doctrine," by the editor, the Rev. Leighton Pullan. Messrs. Rivington have already in the press "Medieval Church Missions," by Mr. C. R. Beazley; "A Church History of Great Britain," by the Rev. W. H. Hutton; and "The Articles of the Church of England," by the Rev. B. J. Kidd.

The translation of Professor Harnack's "History of Dogma," which is being issued in the Theological Translation Library, has now reached its fifth volume. The sixth is in the press, while the seventh and concluding volume is in active preparation and will contain a full index to the English edition.

Mr. J. Massie, of Mansfield College, Oxford, is publishing a pamphlet on the Irish Roman Catholic University question under the auspices of the Liberation Society.

Messrs. Skeffington will publish in a few days an important series of addresses to men, entitled "The Church's Message to Men," by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Bishop Milne, Dean Hole, Canon Gore, and others; also a series of Sermons by Canon J. Hammond, of St. Austell, entitled "The Church and Her Accusers at the Present Crisis."

"A Critical Commentary on the Book of Daniel," designed especially for students of the English Bible, by Mr. J. Dyneley Prince, is in the press; the author is the Professor of Semitic languages in the New York University.

We understand that "The Romance of Flowering Plants" will be the first in the new series of volumes under the title of "The Library of Natural History Romance" to be written by Mr. Edward Step, F.L.S., and published by Messrs. Warne and Co.

Mr. George Gissing has just completed a new novel.

"Well, after all—" is the title of Mr. Frankfort Moore's new novel which is to appear in a week or ten days. It does not deal with the past century but with the present, though not in the flippant way of "The Millionaires."

Mr. Heinemann has taken over the copyright of "As in a Looking Glass," by F. C. Philips, and is issuing it at six shillings, with the drawings by the late George Du Maurier, which have hitherto only appeared in a limited édition de luxe, now out of print.

Some of the characters which appeared in Mr. Benson's novel, "The Vintage," will re-appear in his forthcoming book, to be called "The Capsina," a story of the Greek War of Independence. The action takes place almost entirely at sea among the isles of Greece.

"The Path of the Star" is to be the title of the new story by Miss "Sarah Jeanette Duncan"; the scene is laid chiefly in Calcutta.

Mr. Hornung's new book will, like some of his past work, deal with life in Australia; it is to be entitled "The Amateur Cracksman."

Mr. H. De Vere Stacpoole's new story, "The Rapin," which Mr. Heinemann is publishing, deals with artistic life in Paris.

Messrs. Service and Paton announce a new novel, dealing with the drink problem, by Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, entitled "A Daughter of the Vine."

Mr. Charles Garvice is writing a novel which deals with life in an out-of-the-way corner of Ireland, and thence runs to London and Australia. He is also dramatizing his book, "Just a Girl."

"Frank Redland, Recruit," is the title of the new romance with which Mrs. Coulson Kernahan is following up "Trewin-not of Guy's."

"Nootka" is to be the title of Lord Granville Gordon's story of Vancouver Island, which Messrs. Sands are shortly to publish.

NONCONFORMITY IN FICTION.

No critic of Dickens has, we think, quite satisfactorily accounted for Mr. Chadband and Mr. Stiggins. Ministers of religion outside the pale of the Establishment did not in Dickens' day—any more than now—all talk the twaddle of the former, or share the latter's weakness for grog. Yet Chadband and Stiggins practically exhaust his statement of religious Nonconformity. Their characteristics are so familiar, the influence of Dickens so great, and his aversion to the class they represent so obvious, that if one tries to piece together the Dissenter of fiction one may very likely draw a hasty conclusion. A savour of unctuousity is unavoidable; we hear of moral pocket-handkerchiefs and the Light of Terewth; there is a fat smile, and a distinct aroma of rum and water. But first impressions are not always trustworthy, and we are inclined to think that a writer in the Puritan of this month has let Dickens influence his judgment unduly. He finds in this particular perversion of the best instincts of Dickens—as many other religious people have found since the first appearance of "Pickwick" and "Bleak

VOL. IV. No. 10.

House"—a very just cause of offence. But the irritation naturally caused by the contemplation of Mr. Chadband, Mr. Stiggins, and the Rev. Melchisedech Howler leads him to say in his haste that "Dissent in imaginative literature generally is normally treated with dislike and contempt." As a matter of fact, Dickens' conception of Dissent is, when we remember his main qualities as a novelist, so extraordinary that we should expect to find his case much rather an exceptional than a typical one. And when we are asked, "Is there a decent portrait of a clergyman or a minister in Dickens?" we reply, yes, there certainly is. There was a certain good-humoured, benevolent-looking clergyman at Dingley Dell, and there was the Rev. Frank Milvey, a capital type of Anglican parson. This makes the case all the more strange. Dickens was a Churchman, it is true, but he was a lover of humanity first; and the one clear note which sounds consistently through every page he wrote is his revolt against conventional judgments, his ready sympathy with what is socially deemed despicable, his contempt for appearances in the search for what was good in his fellow-men. More than that, where he had prejudices—prejudices which grew out of his hatred of privilege and of those who oppress the poor—he could curb them at will, and let his humanity put them to shame. Hence it is that both Cousin Feenix and Sir Leicester Dedlock, when they are put to the test, behave like gentlemen. Yet for the representatives of that large body of men which fought like himself against class tyranny and intolerance he has absolutely no mercy. Possibly the explanation is that Dickens was not interested in the religious side of the society which he depicts; that his pastoral types only come in with other examples of hypocrisy, a vice he was never tired of castigating, and that he found more examples of it outside than inside the Established Church. But we do not propose to examine Dickens' behaviour in this matter: only to point out that it does not supply a basis for any general conclusion on the subject of the treatment of Nonconformity in fiction.

One sufficiently obvious circumstance may have contributed to the charge of prejudice on the part of our novelists against a particular class of society. A little further analysis resolves it, in a great degree, into a charge, not of dislike or contempt, but of neglect. Whatever his treatment of the ministers of religion, Dickens formed no exception among English novelists in his avoidance of the religious side of life. To the Evangelical mind, no doubt, this is regrettable; and we must equally allow that if life be regarded with an unflinching realism, its portrayal is incomplete and superficial without some recognition of its spiritual activities. There is, of course, a school of fiction in which this recognition finds a place, but as a rule neither author nor reader concern themselves with the question whether the characters which interest them attend church or chapel. But the Anglican cleric is too prominent and ubiquitous a character to be excluded from the dramatis personæ. His social position and family connexions, his pleasant country rectory, his anticipated bishopric render him indispensable to a writer painting the virtues or satirizing the foibles of the upper strata of society. And when he rises from the ranks to the giddy eminence of a residence in the Cathedral Close or at the Episcopal Palace, he qualifies for the social set which lives in the pages of Anthony Trollope, and may even aspire to be recognized by those exclusive circles which formed the entire world for the author of "Lothair." But Disraeli could not have brooked a Dissenting minister. That exemplary person has, or at any rate had, as compared with the Anglican, no advantages of rank or picturesque surroundings to attract the novelist with an eye for colour, and no "introductions" influential enough to give him the entrée into the good society of fiction. The "wistfulness" with which the new minister in "The Chronicles of Carlingford" regards the perpetual curate of St. Roques is perfectly natural; and is a veracious touch in a very sympathetic portrait of a Nonconformist. He recognized inevitably a social cleavage; and the novelist recognized just as inevitably that for her readers there was far more interest and variety on one side of the line than on the other. We cannot, then, perhaps be surprised to find that, until recently, Dissent has been largely ignored in fiction. But in the few cases of novelists who do not ignore it, chief among whom are George Eliot, George MacDonald, and the author of "Mark Rutherford," to say nothing of the later artists of Free Church life in Scotland, it is certainly not treated with dislike and contempt.

Such a complaint is becoming every day less and less justified, chiefly because the literary attitude of Nonconformists has very much changed during the last quarter of a century. In the realm of literature pure and simple, other causes besides those we have mentioned have hindered any true incisive portrait of Dissent. We have, fortunately perhaps, not borrowed from across the Channel the traditions of a school of realism which finds its ideal of art solely in minute observation and laborious record, and no English Huysmans is likely to chronicle with minute learning and conscientious introspection the stages of his progress through the Congregationalist, the Baptist, and the Wesleyan Churches. A still greater hindrance to the artistic presentment of Nonconformity may be found in the fact that the whole current of Nonconformist traditions has been against it. It is the fashion nowadays to paint the Puritan when he first appears on the stage of national life as a man with a distinct leaning towards art, literature, music, and gaiety. Among the more highly-educated Puritans no doubt there were many whom such a picture truly represents. But, for all that, the gulf between Puritanism and the literary spirit was a broad one. The Puritan never forgot that he was a citizen of God's Kingdom on earth, a warrior in the Divine army. He would paint only what tended to God's service: and "no more of body than shows soul." The literary artist follows his instincts, and paints things "just as they are, careless what comes of it." Thus the serious and ethical spirit of Nonconformity, profoundly as it has influenced for good our social life and political progress, has not, on the whole, been favourable to the higher flights of imaginative literature, and has certainly not tended to encourage any literary treatment of its own spiritual and social life in a manner that did not directly tend to edification.

But the narrowness of this literary outlook is becoming a thing of the past. The last two or three generations have seen an immense growth of culture among Nonconformists of all sections. They have for a long time had representatives among leading exponents of the most advanced schools of theological research. They share freely in the literary movements of the time, and the best of their special organs recognize, as fully as any secular journals, the independent claims of literature and art. Among living poets, essayists, critics and scholars, many are Nonconformist by birth and training. The poet whose struggle with disease has lately been anxiously watched by two continents is closely connected by birth with Methodism. Two or three of the most popular novelists of the day are Nonconformist ministers. The natural result of all this is that Dissent is no longer, if it ever was, the pariah of fiction. Chadband and Stiggins would not be tolerated now for a moment. Many recently published works of fiction—we reviewed one a fortnight ago—show signs of the change. One, particularly, published last year by Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler, has run into many editions. The novel of manners, in fact, cannot now afford to ignore the Dissenter, and its sympathetic treatment of him will not only help it to a true picture of contemporary life, but do a good deal to break up class prejudice and religious animosity.

Sympathy with Mr. Kipling on the sad loss he has sustained in the death of his daughter before he was himself well enough to be informed of her illness will be as general as the satisfaction at his own wonderful recovery. His illness showed in a remarkable way the extent of his influence both in the Western and Eastern hemispheres. He gained it by singing of the power of the white man: he doubled it by pointing to the duties that power implied. The Americans evidently regard him as almost as much theirs as ours; he has inspired the German Emperor to speak of "the deeds of our great common race"; and he has had the compliment of receiving more discriminating praise from French critics than from any others.

We published the other day a very acute appreciation of "the Poet of Energy," written by a young French journalist: and in the current Revue de Paris there is a brilliant study of his writings from the pen of M. André Cherillon. He finds in Kipling, as a story-teller, a conciseness peculiarly French. "He is crisp, powerful, compact, and keen like Merimée"—we quote from a translation in the Daily News—"but much more sinewy, instantaneous, and cruel." He tells of the East

Not like our Loti, with a passive and semi-neurasthenic melancholy, a shudder of pain and voluptuousness at the thought of death and the great eternal forces, but like a man of action who sees in those forces only obstacles to exercise his activities, whet his will, fortify his personality, define and harden his self-respect.

Of his technical knowledge M. Cherillon speaks with the true, lucid incisiveness of a Frenchman:—

In all Kipling's tales one finds the short, measured gesture of a strong man relating great things in a calm, cool tone. What adds to the decisive superiority of his manner is the comprehensiveness and minuteness of his impeccable information—the stolidity of his universal knowledge. . . . He speaks of the navigation of the Hooghly like a Calcutta pilot; of elephants like a cornac; of the jungle, wild boars, and the nilghai—of the hours and reasons of their migrations—like a hunter; of the misery and crime of the East-end like a superintendent of police or the president of a charitable society; and of beer and gin like an intelligent drunkard. He is omniscient and imperturbable.

What a gulf between this poetry of action at close quarters with the facts of life and the poetry of romance and sentiment which held the field a quarter of a century ago! Tennyson could not fire the blood or draw the individual out of himself as Kipling does. But Kipling, on the other hand, cannot sing the music which touches to pathos or regret, or arouses some memory sweet and evanescent like the scent of a flower. The comparison suggests itself as we read the speech made by Prof. Sandys as Public Orator on the presentation of the present Lord Tennyson for an honorary degree at Cambridge. He quoted (in a Latin rendering) that magnificent line in "The Brook"—in itself an object-lesson in poetic style—"By the long wash of Australasian seas," and also the passage from "The Princess," beginning, "Fresh as the first beam glittering on a sail." The mere recollection of such lines takes us at once into a wholly different world of emotion, and in some respects to a higher level of poetry than that attained by Kipling.

The Public Orator was very happy in his references to the antecedents of the new Governor of South Australia, and the appropriateness of his appointment—though it is worth while to point out that it was not a mere complimentary or sentimental appointment, as most of those who commented upon it when the announcement was first made seemed to think, but was greatly due to a recognition in high quarters of the new Governor's administrative talents. We quote an extract from the Public Orator's speech. Readers will, we think, recognize in the last sentence an unconscious reminiscence of Kipling:—

Laetatur nominis tanti heredi tam digno Australiae provinciam quandam esse destinatum, quae talium virorum auxilio non modo cum aliis utrumque Australiae partibus sed etiam cum ipsa patria vinculis (ut speramus) indies artioribus erit in posterum coniuncta. Ergo, muneri tam magno designatus, alumnus noster propediem ad Oceanum illum longinquum proficiscetur, ubi Australasiae litus resonante longe tunditur unda. Ibi sidera nova contemplabitur, interque anni tempora nostris contraria versabitur; sed, caelo quidem mutato, animum in suos numquam mutabit. Ibi domum suam paternam insulamque Vectem et navium carbasa aut hinc aut illinc Britanniae litora praetereuntium fortasse nonnumquam requireret.

The death of the Rev. A. K. H. Boyd will certainly leave a gap in the pleasant academic and literary circle in which the minister of the Collegiate Church of St. Andrews was so well known and popular. That the loss will be sensibly felt in the larger outside world of letters it might be too much to say. Still, it is interesting to reflect that its impression, wherever it is felt, will be of a totally different kind from what it would have been if Mr. Boyd had passed away in the early years of what afterwards proved to be his long ministry at St. Andrews; and the change which has taken place in this respect may be taken as concurrent with a gradual transformation of the relations between literature and the critical journals.

When, in 1865, Mr. Boyd was appointed to the incumbency which he held till his death, the signature A. K. H. B. was not only widely and favourably known to magazine readers but possessed a familiarity, less agreeable to its owner, as that of one of the standing targets of the still comparatively youthful Saturday Review. In the days of its early exuberance that journal could not, it will be remembered, exist without a butt, or rather without two or three, and its satirical attentions during the first ten years or so of its life were divided pretty equally between Mr. Martin Tupper, Mr. G. A. Sala, and the author of "The Recreations of a Country Parson."

Not that even in those days there was much material for merited satire in the essays of "A. K. H. B.," while, on the other hand, there was much excellent stuff in them which will be found, by any one curious enough to turn back to them, to have preserved its quality to the present day. What the malicious reviewer seized upon in Mr. Boyd's writing was its manner, which was certainly somewhat in advance of its age. It was of that cheery, chatty, egotistical kind which has become so common a trick of the present day that no one thinks of noticing it, unless when carried to a particularly offensive point, but which in the early sixties found many critics old-fashioned enough to resent it. They even showed signs of chafing under it in the hands of the great author of the "Round about Papers" himself; and when ventured upon by any one of lesser mark and powers, they vowed to have no mercy upon it. Nowadays, however, no one would think of denying the privilege of its use to a writer who had so much to say worth listening to as the "Country Parson"; for nowadays, alas! the button-hole of the patient critic is worn threadbare by the forefingers, and his back smarts under the friendly slaps, of a score of literary gossips who have infinitely less claim to a hearing than "A. K. H. B."

A History of British India. By Sir William Hunter, K.C.S.I., M.A., LL.D. Vol. I., 9×5½ in., 475 pp. London, 1899. Longmans. 18/-

The want of a good history of British rule in India has often been deplored. Of biographies—with their inevitable distortion of perspective—we have had more than enough; studies of particular incidents, of particular periods, or of particular provinces have not been wanting; even summaries of the whole have been attempted, though only in one case—that of Sir Alfred Lyall's brilliant and suggestive "British Dominion in India"—with any remarkable success. But we have long been waiting for a writer with sufficient time and energy to master the formidable literature of the subject, to test afresh the assertions of his predecessors, to examine the enormous bulk of unsearched records, and with sufficient literary skill to weave an interesting narrative out of material that is at once complicated and unfamiliar.

The effort now made to meet this want is by a writer whose past record points him out as specially fitted for the work. In his introduction, Sir William Hunter says that the task is one which has occupied a great part of his life. From the time when, early in his Indian career, he examined the contents of the Calcutta record rooms, the collection of materials has gone slowly but steadily on; exceptional opportunities were afforded by his work as director of the statistical survey which produced the "Imperial Gazetteer"; and when in 1887 his retirement from the public service gave him the necessary leisure, it was his fixed intention to write without delay a complete history of India from the early Aryan period onwards. At this juncture occurred a misfortune which would have daunted most men. The main part of his materials and manuscripts went down in the Nepal on their way home, and the labour of collection had largely to be undertaken afresh. With persevering energy Sir William Hunter set himself to the task, though he found it necessary to modify his original plan by omitting his proposed account in detail of the early history of India, beginning instead at a time when the nations of modern Europe came first into contact with the peoples of the East. One portion of his task is now completed by the publication of the first of the five volumes which are to be devoted to the subject.

An interchange of Eastern and Western products has always formed the main current of the world's trade. Sir William Hunter sketches the old commercial routes (illustrated by a map specially drawn by Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole), their value, and the consequent struggles for the possession of them. The early attempts of European travellers to reach Cathay overland, and then the Portuguese quest of the sea-route to the East, the ideals that animated the explorers, the materials at their command, their patient and persistent efforts, crowned at last by well-deserved success, are here told with an enthusiasm which lends freshness to a subject that is somewhat worn. And in his review of Indo-Portuguese history Sir William has done well to rely largely on Portuguese records. There is real sympathy with England's ancient ally in his sketch of the rapid building-up of a dominion in the Indian Ocean by Almeida and Albuquerque, its triumphant defence against the attacks of Arabs and Turks, the exhaustion of the mother country and her entanglement with Spain, the consequent enfeeblement and decay of the colonies, hastened by the profligacy and corruption of the laity and the bigotry of the priesthood. The various English and Dutch attempts to reach India, by land through Syria or through Russia, by sea first by the north-east route round Europe and Asia, then by the north-west round America, and finally, in defiance of the Portuguese monopoly, by the way of the Cape of Good Hope, culminated, after the successful expeditions of Lancaster and Houtman, in the establishment, at the close of the sixteenth century, of the English and Dutch East India Companies. The chapters devoted to the former body are among the most striking in the book. Certainly nowhere else can we find so careful and so clear an account of the company's early ventures.

With the two sea-fights against the Portuguese by which Best (1612) and Downton (1614) made good the English footing in Indian waters, we again for a time join the stream of Indo-Portuguese history. As Portugal yielded to fate and retired from the contest, a still more formidable competitor engaged the attention of the English. England and Holland had long been engaged in a struggle for the exclusive acquisition of the trade of further India and the Spice Islands. For the first time, we believe, in any English work, we are given an account of this episode—so important alike in Asiatic and in European history—based on a careful comparison of both the English and the Dutch accounts, and written with an evident desire to hold the balance impartially between them. The failure of our nation to maintain its position was due, in the first place, to the limited means employed, and in the second to the political influence of the Dutch Company, which was practically a national concern, whereas its English rival was purely a private corporation, feebly supported, or not supported at all, by the English Government and nation. Gradually the disagreements developed from insults into downright fighting; then came the temporary lull due to the abortive treaty of 1619, soon followed, however, by manœuvres—not over-scrupulous—which drove the English slowly to the wall, until by the beginning of 1623 the Dutch had mastered the Clove and Nutmeg Archipelago. At this point, however, matters took a dramatic turn. The cruel torture and execution of the English factors at Amboyna roused a resentment in this country which, but for the apparent imminence of war with Spain and the consequent necessity for a good understanding with Holland, would probably have led to a rupture between the two Powers. Practically this piece of iniquity consummated the ruin of the English position in the Malay Archipelago; but for the Dutch the blunder was worse than the crime. The pathetic sufferings of Towerson and his comrades were never forgotten in England; whenever feeling ran high against Holland, the story of "Amboyna usage" was revived; and when, thirty years after, Cromwell dictated peace to the Dutch, the latter were forced not only to cede Pulo Rhun and to pay a large sum as compensation for the wrong which had been done, but also to accept in explicit terms the English declaration that the "fact of Amboyna" was a "massacre."

All this, however, is not the main subject of Sir William Hunter's book. He has still to deal with the gradual establishment of English trade, and finally of English dominion, upon the Indian peninsula; and his progress in this task will be watched with interest. He is aware that to yield the whole of the first volume to events which bring us merely to 1623—only fifteen years after the first arrival of an English ship on the coast of India—might appear disproportionate:—

It may seem, perhaps [he says], that I have allotted too much space to this threefold struggle—of Christendom against Islam, of the Protestant North against the Catholic South, and of the two Protestant sea Powers of the Atlantic—for the Asiatic trade. But a different law of proportion applies to Indian history, as I have conceived it, from that which sufficed for a melodrama of British triumphs. . . . Characteristic features of our present Indian polity date from that early time. . . . In one sense, indeed, England is the residuary legatee of an inheritance painfully amassed by Europe in Asia during the past four centuries. In that long labour, now one Christian nation, then another, came to the front. But their progress, as a whole, was continuous.

Students of Anglo-Indian history will have little inclination to quarrel with this course. There is nothing we would willingly spare in this first instalment of a work which promises to be a standard comprehensive history of our Asiatic Empire.

Khartoum Campaign, 1898. By Bennet Burleigh. Illustrated, with Maps and Plans. 9½ x 5½ in., xii. + 340 pp. London, 1899. Chapman & Hall. 12/-

Though rapid publication and the lightning habits of the modern journalist have somewhat spoilt us for the delay even of a few months, Mr. Bennet Burleigh has done wisely in waiting to bring out his continuation of the story of the Sudan until he could round it off with some decent approach to completion of subject if not maturity of judgment. His pages are, of course, rather the material for a future and more critical historian than the standard and final work upon the series of operations whose close he has described. But his book has a distinct value of its own, in spite of anything that his predecessors have produced, for he gathers up in one coherent whole the progress of events from the advance after the Atbara to the initiation of the Gordon Memorial College and the conclusion of the Fashoda incident. With most of his own description of all he saw during the campaign—and Mr. Burleigh may be trusted to have missed very little—we are already to some extent familiar in the columns of the Daily Telegraph, the paper which he represented as special correspondent at the front. But the campaign itself was worthy of a more permanent record from the same pen which gave us so many vivid scenes while it was actually in progress, and Mr. Burleigh has considerably increased the value of his original work by revisions and additions, and more especially by incorporating with it many papers and letters from official sources, which are here very conveniently placed beside the record of the events to which they refer. Mr. Burleigh's volume may not have much more than temporary value, for he is still too near the events he chronicles to be quite impartial in his award of praise or blame, though his errors of judgment are more those of omission than of commission. But it will be of evident interest to a generation which does not care to wait for real history. One more general comment is unavoidable. It is suggested by the final Note, in which the Author once more belabours the already thrice-crushed Mr. E. N. Bennett. We trust that this is the last time that any one will think it worth while to bring Mr. Bennett out of his academic recesses for the purpose of hammering him. He was so unwise as to follow up an amusing and perfectly innocuous little book with the ill-considered and unfounded charges of a magazine article. Any further statements he may make about Egyptian battlefields have already been sufficiently discredited by himself.

Apart from this, Mr. Burleigh touches on the question of the wounded on three occasions; he describes the arrangements of Surgeon-General Taylor for the comfort of the British Division, and of Surgeon-Colonel Gallwey for the Egyptian troops, on page 69; he tells on page 233 how the Sirdar sent out food and water to the wounded Dervishes after the battle of Omdurman; and on page 268 he describes the admirable system organized by the Red Cross Society on board their special hospital-steamer the "Mayflower." That Society had offered their services, through Lieut.-Col. Young, as early as June, 1898, intimating a desire to assist, entirely at their own expense, in the expedition. After a refusal, their subsequent appeal was only granted by the Foreign Office in August, and instead of three hospital ships (enough to transport every sick soldier by water) they could only get one ready in time, with a crew and a complement of nurses. It is by no means clear why the first offer was refused; for apart from all the jolting of land-transport as far as Railhead, the horrors of a railway journey, in "an opaque atmosphere of grit mixed with the sweepings of the ages," are hardly calculated to soothe the sufferings of a wounded soldier. Nor could the lot of those who had to stay in hospital camps, among the "dust devils of the desert," have been much better. Several cases of enteric fever which ended fatally could certainly have been saved had sufficient water-transport been ready in time. When at last the "Mayflower" was allowed to be put in active service, with all expenses of transport and of a cuisine managed by a French "chef" paid by the society, she made no less than three round trips, and provided every patient with pyjamas, socks, and other necessities, free.

Mr. Burleigh's book suggests yet another timely commentary on one of those subjects connected with the campaign which have lately come before the public, and somewhat taken the place of immediate interest in the fighting. On page 238 the author records what happened at the Mahdi's tomb. The brass and iron grille round the catafalque had been much injured by the damage done in shelling the roof. After the woodwork and the lettered panels had been "smashed or carried off by relic-hunters," two huge blocks of stone were seen, beneath which lay Mohamed Achmed's body.

To destroy utterly [writes Mr. Burleigh] the legend of his mission, when the British troops had returned to Cairo the Mahdi's body was disinterred. It had been roughly embalmed, and the features were said to be recognisable. . . . Perhaps it may be deplored that Mohamed Achmed's remains were broken up, part being cast into the Nile, while the head and other portions of the body were retained for presentation, it was said, to medical colleges. There were those who thought that the wisest course would have been to expose the remains for all to see them who cared to, and then to hand them over to the natives to bury in one of their cemeteries, as if he had been an ordinary man. But the Sudan is not Europe, nor are its inhabitants amenable to measures eminently satisfactory to civilized northern races. The tomb was subsequently levelled to the ground by an explosion of gun-cotton, and the debris was cleared away.

Comment upon all this, however justifiable, may not be equally expedient. But it can only be a subject for regret that, if such measures were indeed necessary, British officers should have had to carry them out.

Mr. Burleigh's pages are, of course, full of all those details of the army on the march and in action of which we have heard a good deal before, both from himself and from other sources. But his memories of the battlefield of Abu Kru in 1885 enable him to make far more useful and enlightening comparisons than many of his colleagues have afforded us, and all he has to say on the question of the Sirdar's relations to the Press (pages 66 and 108) are of interest to a public far wider than the professional, especially when considered by the light of the fact that upon the hearty acquiescence and co-operation of the Press depended in large measure the success of the Sirdar's scheme for the Memorial College, now happily inaugurated. As to the great battle itself, Mr. Burleigh's newer contributions to our knowledge will chiefly be found in Chapter XII., where the value of the artillery is clearly brought out, and the precise vision secured by the use of smokeless powder is very rightly emphasized. The effect of the Lyddite shells and of the new bullets is also described. On page 204 an account is given of a wounded Dervish who attacked the camp-followers, which is by no means convincing, and we should like to hear what the A.D.C., who finally killed him, has to say on the matter.

But the keynote of the whole book is supplied by the frontispiece, an excellent portrait of Major-General H. A. MacDonald, C.B., D.S.O., who has been made an extra A.D.C. to the Queen. The magnificent way in which this gallant officer handled his troops is fully told on pages 190 and 207; and Mr. Burleigh thinks that "if the public are in search of the real hero of the battle of Omdurman, there he is, ready-made." There is no need to recapitulate here how MacDonald fought his single-handed battle against tremendous odds at a grave and unexpected crisis, but it is rather too evident that, in his natural admiration for a heroic action which passed before his eyes, Mr. Burleigh has somewhat lost the true perspective of events and personalities. As an example of this want of balance, we may point out that Major General Sir Archibald Hunter, in command of four brigades of the Khedivial troops, is only mentioned very casually, on occasions when it was impossible to omit his name. Yet he was with MacDonald's brigade at the critical moment, and himself brought Wauchope's brigade at the double to its assistance, after galloping to the headquarters staff to ask for help. Nor does the warm tribute to his merits in the Sirdar's despatch seem to justify Mr. Burleigh's strange silence. "Khartoum Campaign" is well written and well put together, but it is by no means the "last word" on these important operations.

Notes from a Diary Kept Chiefly in Southern India by The Right Hon. Sir M. E. Grant Duff, G.C.S.I. 2 vols. 7½ x 5¼ in., xii. + 373 + 370 pp. London, 1899. Murray. 18/-

The two new volumes of Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff's "Notes from a Diary" are of much the same composition as the two preceding volumes. That is to say, they are made up, in unequal quantities, of botany, anecdotes, and small beer. Perhaps the botany is not quite so obtrusive as it was in the "Notes" of 1851-81; but on the other hand the small beer is perhaps even smaller, and the percentage of inferior anecdotes larger. We are not sure that this derangement of the original proportions of the various ingredients is an unmixed advantage; for the botany can "easily be skipped," as the author points out in his preface, "by those who have no interest in plants," whereas one must read an anecdote in order to find out whether it is worth reading. The "chestnut" differs from the other botanical specimens treated of in the diary, in that it cannot be skipped; while even the small beer is again and again inadvertently sipped, its tenuity not being always discernible by the eye. Both of these drawbacks, however, might have been overlooked, if the promise of the preface in regard to the anecdotes had been faithfully kept. "Such of my readers," says the diarist, "as care for good stories will, I think, find a reasonable number of them, though not so many as I may have to offer at some future period, when I may be dealing with my life after I had returned to Europe." What should be considered a "reasonable number" of good stories it is difficult to say; but, of course, in the space of two volumes, amounting between them to over 700 pages carrying an average of, say, a couple of stories apiece, it would be hard indeed if one could not find a few score specimens deserving to be described as good. But there can be no such thing as a "reasonable" number of stories not deserving this adjective, because there is no reason for admitting stale or foolish anecdotes at all, the taste to discern and the firmness to exclude them being precisely the prime qualifications which we look for in a diarist who undertakes to make a selection of "Notes" from his diary.

There are other defects or rather superfluities in the volumes which it would have been still easier to avoid. Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff is too apt to mistake his diary for a commonplace book—which, of course, he is quite at liberty to do, so long as it remains unpublished—and to transcribe into it passages of considerable length, but not always of equal value, from his recent reading or from the letters of his correspondents. For a man who is so easy a prey of the pretentious aphorism as he is, the practice is a particularly dangerous one. It was with some apprehension that we noted the name of Joubert on one or two of these pages, but the author, though evidently an admirer of that philosopher, has not quoted him. In revenge, however, we get the following:—

Vauvenargues says: "Il est faux que l'égalité soit une loi de la nature. La nature n'a rien fait d'égal. Sa loi souveraine est la subordination et la dépendance."

It is really astonishing, when one comes to think of it, that men and women of intelligence, nay often of high intellectual power, should be impressed by this sort of thing. For it is not as if the flatness of the platitude were disguised by any particular brilliancy of form. The truisms of the aphorist do not reach us amid such a blaze of eloquence that, as Johnson caustically said of Pope's "Essay on Man," the reader is dazzled, and "when he meets with it in its new array no longer knows the talk of his mother and his nurse." Even when the saying is more than mere common-place, the diarist shows signs of overrating its profundity:—

It is exactly two years and a half this morning since I took my seal as Governor. As to public affairs, it will be for others to say, after making themselves acquainted with the fact, whether I have or have not remembered the saying, "L'homme d'état est un messenger à qui le temps présent est remis en dépôt pour être rendu tel qu'il est ou meilleur au temps à venir."

Here, too, the quality of the quotation is curiously in keeping with that of the reflection. The Governorship of Madras is an important post, and the then Governor was a man of great ability and high political distinction. Still one cannot help feeling that the solemnity of tone, more appropriate, perhaps, to the "legacy" of a Richelieu or a Napoleon, is just a little bit in excess of the occasion. It is the more disconcerting to the reader who has been lightly skimming the "good stories," because of the author's claim in his preface to have excluded "business, politics, and the graver interests of a Governor from these pages." It is a mistake, we think, to have established any such hard and fast rule. The very charm of a diary, surely, is that it represents all aspects of the diarist's life. It was certainly the charm that Horace found in the poetry of Lucilius, in which "votivâ patuit veluti descripta tabella, Vita . . ." We cannot finish the quotation in its exact terms without applying so inappropriate a word as "senex" to the distinguished diarist; but it is apposite in all other respects, and the "Notes from the Diary" would, we venture to think, have gained considerably in interest if they had been made to give a more complete picture of their author's daily life, in its official as well as its unofficial aspects. Their tendency is, as we have said, to resolve themselves into a more or less loosely strung rosary of unequal anecdotes, varied now and then by a botanical excursion such as:—

On reaching Government House at Madras the first thing I observed was that the faithful clump of Plumeria alba was, as usual, in full bloom. That of Lagerstrœmia Regina must have been at its best three or four weeks ago. Only a few spikes are still out, but I see the grand flower on the tree for the first time.

or by such chroniclings of small beer (with reverence be it said) as—

We had as many people at dinner as we could manage, except on Sunday, the 10th, when we had a quiet little party of twenty-eight. On the 9th, 11th, and 12th respectively we sat down fifty-one, fifty-three, and fifty-one. A large number of persons also came to breakfast on several of these days.

It is time, however, to give some specimens of what Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff evidently regards as the chief attraction of his book—the good stories, of which he has supplied us with a "reasonable number." As we have already said, we do not complain of the number of such stories as being of less than of reasonable magnitude; it is of the proportion of stories not at all deserving this description that we complain. We must protest, for one thing, against the reproduction in "book-form" of what may be called the "family" or breakfast table conundrum: as, for instance, "What is the difference between temptation and eternity? One is a wife of the devil and the other is a devil of a while." These products of the human intellect should disappear with the tea-urn, never again to present themselves even orally—and most certainly not in print. And, generally speaking, the diarist is too fond of recording puns—a form of verbal wit which, nowadays, will only very rarely, and with much difficulty, pass muster in conversation, and will almost never bear to be reproduced. This, of the chemical lecturer who drank off a deadly potion by mistake, and, as he lost consciousness, said to those who were supporting him, “Write upon my tomb, it’s iodide of mercury”—does not exhilarate. The very sight of those pathetic italics which, ex abundanti cautela, the narrator has insisted upon, has a depressing effect.

It is rare to find a University story which is at once good and new, and we are therefore indebted to the diarist for that of the undergraduate who, being asked what is a “final cause,” replied “It is the last straw that breaks the camel’s back.” Some of the best, too, of the stories, are those which announce themselves with least ceremony, and with a delightful touch of the unexpected. There is something very charming in the reply of the Texan Bishop to whom Lady Gregory was expressing her disapproval of charitable bazaars. “Yes,” he said, “I am strongly opposed to bazaars. The worst thing about them is the amount of duelling and bloodshed by which they are followed.” The following, too, has much of the magic of the imprévu:—

A correspondent tells me that Kinglake was recently startled by a lunatic who came to say that his late wife had appeared to him in a dream, and directed him to find and convert William Alexander Kinglake to Catholicism at once.

Kinglake replied that even in Heaven he would expect accuracy, and that his name was Alexander William Kinglake. This, and a steady gaze, so froze his visitor that he withdrew.

Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff’s letters from friends in England—though here, too, the book suffers from a too lenient censorship—contain not a little that is interesting, hidden away, however, in a good deal of what is the reverse, and showing somewhat tantalizing signs of containing more interesting matter than has been allowed to appear. One or two of his correspondents, however, are almost invariably good reading, and we wish for more of them than is given us. But, indeed, the whole two volumes suffer from the twofold fault of giving us less than we could wish of what we like, and more than enough of what we could spare.

THE LAWS OF ENGLAND.

The completion of the publication of the ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF THE LAWS OF ENGLAND, edited by Mr. A. Wood Renton, in twelve volumes (Sweet and Maxwell, 1898), is an interesting and important event, not only in connexion with legal literature, but with English law. It marks a change which has been noticeable in the character of law-books for some years past. The day of the production of important standard works, which may almost be called monumental and which continue in edition after edition to hold a place as recognized authorities, has come to an end. The new works now being produced are chiefly commentaries in some form or another on recent statutes, or small and unimportant books on branches of law already contained in treatises which have an established reputation. Thus, the stage at which our legal literature has arrived is one at which it is natural that English law as a complete body should be presented in a single and complete work. The evolution of new principles, the amplification of those which, while well recognized, have to be applied to changed conditions of society at the end of the nineteenth century has, broadly speaking, ceased. Case law is now concerned more with details than with principles, with the construction of the numerous statutes which the industry and the un-systematic efforts of Parliament have placed in confusion on the statute-book. There could not, therefore, be a more fitting time to put into the hands of all who are concerned with English law, whether in Great Britain or abroad, a work which embodies the changes which have been accomplished in recent times, and enables it to be regarded as a whole.

Whether this work will mark the beginning of a new epoch of which the consolidation and the more systematic presentation of English law will be the chief feature may be doubtful. We are inclined, however, to think that events are tending slowly, but with some sureness, in that direction. And in another way this Encyclopædia is noticeable. In no other country in the world would so important a work as this, which contains in brief, yet sufficiently ample, space the whole law of England, have been carried out by individual enterprise. It would have been published by the State at the public expense. It is a striking object-lesson. For while Mr. Renton and his colleagues have successfully completed this large work, the attempt of the Judges to simplify and revise the rules which govern the procedure and practice of the High Court has been abandoned. The success of those who are responsible for the Encyclopædia and the failure of the Judges—the most inefficient organizing body of Great Britain—show clearly that the only way in which English law can be reduced to a systematic form will be by means of a permanent commission of lawyers with a free hand, whose work will be revised neither by Parliament nor by the Bench.

And, whilst we are touching on form, we may allude to two shortcomings in this work which might have been avoided. The headings are in some instances too numerous and not sufficiently capital. As one instance there is this:—“Excess of Jurisdiction.” We doubt if any one who wished to know something of what may happen if a Court of law exceeds its jurisdiction would ever seek for it under the head of “Excess.” Nor, indeed, can it be said that this particular branch of law should be noticed by itself. Another criticism which should be stated is that the editor, in his desire to make this Encyclopædia comprehensive, has included in it some unnecessary terms. We take two as examples—one is “Excellency.” This, it is explained, is a title of honour, and then follows a description, very proper in a general dictionary, which fills nearly half a page. Another is “Thalweg,” a term which is at the very most merely a foreign word which has found its way into some diplomatic documents. We might give other instances, but these suffice to show that the editor has been rather too liberal in his inclusions.

Of course, the future of this work must be affected by the tendency of English law to which we have already alluded—namely, the increase of judicial decisions on statutes, of which an instance may be seen by any one who will take up the last January number of the Law Reports for the Queen’s Bench Division. Here he will find that twenty out of the twenty-five reported decisions turn on the interpretation of statutes. On the one hand its value is increased as a compendium of non-statute decisions; on the other, it is ephemeral when we consider the constant change which modern social conditions cause in the statute law, and the many decisions on these points which must continue to increase and to overwhelm, both in law books and in reports, the slenderer number of statements of legal principles. We may see this well illustrated under the two important heads of “Water-way” and “Water Supply.” Under the first hardly any modern cases are referred to. We find the old common law and decisions up to about twenty years ago are the bases on which this branch of law rests. We are sent to such well known and almost picturesque cases as Gann v. The Free Fishers of Whitstable (1865) and Winch v. The Conservators of the Thames (1872), which latter decided that a towing path is prima facie only for the purpose of towing barges and vessels. When we turn to “Water Supply,” we find the law rests on numerous modern statutes, we lose the air of the old Court of Common Pleas and breathe that of the Committee Rooms. Every case turns on the construction of an Act of Parliament, not on legal principles. The same characteristic, in a different form, is to be found in the decisions on commercial law. They are concerned with single words in commercial documents, often almost with special facts; the main principles of commercial law were long ago expounded, before the present generation of Judges came to the Bench. It is easy enough, therefore, when we peruse the various headings of the Encyclopædia to understand how the present trend of matters which require judicial decisions must in one sense weaken the character of judgments. It is impossible to deliver luminous statements of legal principles upon two words in a charterparty or an obscure section in a statute. Ingenuity rather than breadth is required of the modern Judge; the learning of a Willes is of less use than a knowledge of business and a capacity to make some kind of sense out of antagonistic portions of two Acts of Parliament. It is useless to regret this fact. It is a necessity of the time, and therefore it is all the more desirable that there should be placed more especially before the student a work which will enable him to find the governing decisions of earlier days stated in clear terms. For in the mass of modern decisions and statutes we are apt to lose sight of those primary legal principles which are now more valuable than ever—since they are the only certain guides in the midst of a wilderness of legal decisions which would tax even the memory of a Macaulay or a Blackburn. Whether it will ever be possible that those portions of the law of England which may be described as stereotyped shall be included in some work similar to, but more limited in its scope than, this Encyclopædia is one of those points upon which we may have hopes and hopes only. Whether or not Mr. Renton's work will help towards this desirable event remains to be seen. That he has shown both the desirability and the feasibility of including in one work, at any rate, large portions of the law of England cannot be doubted. And no one can doubt that, as things are, this Encyclopædia is a most valuable addition to our legal literature, for as we have already said it presents English law to us as a whole. Specialization in these days is a necessity of the legal profession as of the man of business, but its tendency is to narrow the jurisprudence of a country. A work which enables the lawyer to survey the entire field of English law must necessarily have a broadening and educative influence as well as a practical use.

THE NEW THACKERAY.

The Works of William Makepeace Thackeray. With Biographical Introductions by his Daughter, Anne Ritchie. Vol. XI.—"Philip." 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ in., xlv. + 640 pp. London, 1899. Smith, Elder. 6/-

In the introduction to this present volume Mrs. Ritchie draws upon the inexhaustible well of her own recollections for incidents connected with the foundation and development of the Cornhill Magazine, and of the years '59 and '60 generally. We have long since learned something of the difficulties that Thackeray encountered in his new adventure, of the many thorns that beset his editorial chair—Trollope's notes on the subject alone give a vivid picture—but naturally Thackeray's daughter has much more to tell.

The Cornhill was first planned and talked of in the spring of 1859. Hitherto magazines had stood at five shillings or half-a-crown, but publishers were evidently awakening to the value of a shilling periodical. Macmillan was published two months before the Cornhill, and Temple Bar about a year later. We gather that Thackeray invented the title for the magazine. "It has," he said, "a sound of jollity and abundance about it."

In an early letter (November 1, 1859) on the subject of the coming periodical, Thackeray sketches the general idea, and adds, "At our social table we shall suppose the ladies and children always present." This "domestic note" appears to have been insisted on by the new editor. It led to his returning a story to so valued and discreet a contributor as Anthony Trollope with a little sermon on the text of virginibus puerisque; it also brought about some of the most interesting correspondence quoted in the present introduction, showing the way in which the editor refuses his friend Mrs. Browning's poem, "Lord Walter's Wife," and how Mrs. Browning defends her point with great tenderness and spirit. Other letters from Milnes, from Carlyle on the story which he could not write about the Garde française and the English at Fontenoy, from Sir Henry Thompson about his article called "Under Chloroform," from Motley, Dr. John Brown, the author of "Rab and His Friends," and from Landseer, with illustrations, all help to give this introduction biographical value.

"A Shabby Genteel Story" is included in this volume, and although Mrs. Ritchie tells us nothing of the sad circumstances which attended the writing of the story, she gives with regard to "Philip" many of those touching incidents which seem to linger about all Thackeray's work. In one letter he says:—

Philip is unfortunately going into poverty and struggle, but this can't be helped; and as he will, entre nous, take pretty much the career of W. M. T. in the first years of his ruin and absurdly unprudent marriage, at least the portrait will be faithful.

He hardly knew, we suppose, how much of himself he really managed to put into his books. At length "Finis Philippi" is noted in the diary.

"Philip" was finished [says Mrs. Ritchie] on a Thursday, and on Friday we made holiday. That Friday was a red-letter day for us all, and how well I can remember it! The sun shone, the shadows lay soft upon the lanes and commons as we drove out with our ponies from London towards the open country to Orleans House, where there was a garden party. The gardens were in their prime, and those of Orleans House one glow of beautiful, bright colour. Along the walls were garlands of flowers, and then more flowers everywhere. A theatre stood in the centre of the lawn, where some well-known actor from Paris, a jocrisse in shirt sleeves, was beguiling fallen Kings and Queens and causing them to forget their troubles in a roar of laughter. Beautiful ladies, music, fun, charming weather, all combined for this festival. There was something exhilarating in the dignified and cordial hospitality of the Duke in exile, making everybody glad to be there and proud to attend his sylvan court.

So Mrs. Ritchie's picture goes on—Mrs. Norton in shabby clothes, but looking more like a Queen than anybody else, is talking to Thackeray, who says of the Duke, "He has everything for him, looks, noble manners, birth, learning, fortune—and misfortune."

Most people who care for the more serious side of Thackeray's writings will regret that "Philip" did not have the success it deserved, and agree with Mrs. Ritchie when she says, "To me it seems to contain some of the wisest and most beautiful things my father ever wrote."

Frederick Walker's illustrations, despite all the praise they have received, do not show to advantage, especially as regards characterisation. Mrs. Ritchie writes in a delicately reminiscent vein about one of them:—

The picture of Philip in church always seems to me to be a picture of our pew in St. Mary Abbott's as it was in my youth, full of peaceful organ notes and hopes which have been unfulfilled. But I think the realities, and even many of the disappointments of life, have been better than ever were the childish dreams of those early days.

In every page of this interesting introduction there is some subtle suggestion of "peaceful organ notes and hopes which have been unfulfilled," which is one of the charming characteristics of Mrs. Ritchie's style.

THE MIRROR OF PERFECTION.

St. Francis of Assisi, The Mirror of Perfection. By Brother Leo of Assisi. Edited by Paul Sabatier. Translated by Sebastian Evans. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ in., xvi. + 232 pp. London, 1898. Nutt. 2/-

The English-reading public have now before them a translation of the biography of the most remarkable religious reformer of the Middle Ages, written down within six months of his death, by his bosom friend, Leo the Friar, and finished "at the most holy place of St. Mary of the Little Portion on the fifth of the ides of May in the year of our Lord 1228." In this "Mirror of Perfection of a brother minor, to wit, of the Blessed Francis," we may, as the biographer Leo quaintly puts it, "most sufficiently behold as in a glass the perfection of his calling and profession." We are indebted to both publisher and translator, but we confess to thinking that such good printing and paper were worthy of a better cover. It is a disappointment to take up so precious a life's history as this is for lovers of St. Francis and to find that it is enshrined in a cover of unsuggestive design and unworthy workmanship. But the disappointment of the binding finds an echo in the preface. It might have been hoped that it would explain how it came about that Paul Sabatier had unearthed from the various manuscripts of a later and larger life these veritable fragments of the original biography by Brother Leo; by what process of sifting he was led to conclude that in them, when pieced together, he had the consecutive biography of "The little poor man," by St. Francis' bosom friend and confessor; how the Mazarin Manuscript had helped Sabatier to date the life; and, generally, one expected something of the lucid explanatory notes, preface, and appendix, of the French edition. Of course, the French publisher, Fishbacher, may have put some prohibitive tariff upon the translator for rights of translation, or may have forbidden anything but the use of the bare text. Be that as it may, any one who has that French edition in hand and then turns to this English translation will feel a little like the possessor of a picture without a frame, or a Della Robbia without its garland of wreathed fruits and flowers.
